Jesus did the Will of God. "For I am come down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me." John 6:38. For other statements on this point read John 4:34 and 8:29; Matt. 26:39 and its parallels; and many others that will occur to you. We find the same teaching stressed in the Epistles. Note this from St. Paul in Gal. 1: 3-4. Our Lord Jesus Christ, who gave himself for our sins, that he might deliver us out of the present evil world, according to the will of our God and Father." We are not putting it too strongly when we assert that the ruling and dominating principle of Jesus' life was doing God's will. This principle motived and energized all he ever said and did. According to John 6:38 this principle was the reason for the incarnation. According to John 4:34 this principle inspired Jesus' marvelous ministry of service. According to the quotation cited above from Paul the sacrificial death of Jesus follows from his devotion to the will of God.

The great temptation in the Wilderness attests Jesus' loyalty and devotion to the will of God. No alternative course of action in life was open to him. This is the one supreme teaching of the temptation, namely, that for Jesus DOING THE WILL OF GOD is the highest good. Henceforth he gives himself unreservedly and patiently and against the bitterest opposition to this one task. For him it meant the joy of service and the cup of suffering. "Obedient even unto death." Phil. 2:5-8. Jesus did the will of God. Of that we are certain.

Jesus revealed the will of God to men. As Jesus did the will of God he revealed it to men. What Jesus taught men is the will of God. What Jesus did reveals the will of God. What Jesus began to do and to teach as indicated in the gospels is continued in the work and teaching of the Apostles as recorded in the Acts and the Epistles. Acts 1:1 and especially John 14:26 and 16:12-13. But it is certainly unnecessary in this connection to maintain by elaborate proofs the truth of the statement that Jesus revealed to men the will of God.

The Disciples and the Will of God

Jesus imposed upon his disciples the doing of the will of God. He made the petition referred to at the opening of this discussion central in the prayer he taught them. It is thus made for men, as it was for Jesus, the supreme good. He himself warned men that entrance into the coming kingdom is conditioned upon doing God's will. To a careful and consistent reader of the N. T. nothing can be clearer than the Apostles and the immediate followers of Jesus regarded the doing of God's will as the one purpose of life. To render this obedience dangers were braved and life, liberty and property forfeited. Error was combatted with a zeal that could not be daunted. And a holy enthusiasm sent men everywhere preaching the words of eternal life. In the striking language of another, "The word of God was alive in every Christian of the apostolic age." For this doing of the will of God, this unfaltering obedience to it in every detail, no substitute could be brooked. No attainments of moral living, no smooth words of worldly wisdom however enticing, not even membership in an established religious community which had once born the seal of God,—NOT ONE of these can take the place for the early Christian of the doing of the WILL OF GOD. Philosophy and wisdom, morals and religion, one and all and other than as revealed in Christ are but powerless and fruitless rudiments of the world. Only obedience to the will of God availed with the true N. T. Christian of the first days of our era.

Can we who seek to live and exemplify the teachings of the N. T. be satisfied with anything less? If the Apostles and early Christians dared make no substitute dare we do so? Are non-Christian morals or substitute religions of our day any better than they were of Paul's day? Is not this proneness of men who profess to be disciples of Jesus to offer something else than the doing of God's will the real cause of the failures so frequently attributed to the gospel?

Men Have Not Yet Done the Will of God

I have thus been led to the consideration of the sad confession that as yet nothing like a wide and genuine attempt has been made by mankind to do unreservedly the will of God. From the Apostles who sealed their faith in Jesus Christ with their blood until now there have lived multitudes, I am happy to believe, who sincerely did the will of God. And yet,—well, in spite of the millions of professed followers of the Son of God we find a vast portion of the fairest lands of this old earth deluged in blood. One can not help suspecting that for years that have grown into centuries the devil has been using the art of camouflage in a manner that must be highly pleasing to himself. The spurious, the false, the almost-but-not-quite genuine has been so successfully hidden under the guise of the real and genuine faith of Christ that doubtless many quite earnest and sincere, though mistaken and deluded, men and women have been led astray.

Wherein Have Men Failed?

I have doubtless said enough to raise the inquiry, Wherein have men failed to do the will of God? I am far from setting myself up as a judge of other men. I am here undertaking nothing other than the sounding of a warning. In pointing out a few striking instaces of failure I may sugegst others to your mind and thus we may be mutually aroused to preach a more vigorous and complete gospel. I shall not elaborate here but shall be content with the mere statement. I shall only add that I believe I am absolutely right in this contention.

First. Jesus Christ taught that men should place the interests of the kingdom first. "But seek ye first his kingdom and his rightcousness."

Second. Jesus Christ taught that men must be born again. "Except one be born of water and the Spirit, he can not enter into the kingdom of God."

Third. Jesus Christ taught the sacredness of property. He taught that his disciples were stewards not owners. See the parable of the unjust Steward.

Fourth. Jesus Christ taught that men should love one another, even their enemies. He not only said, "Love thy neighbor," but also, "Love your enemies."

Fifth. Jesus Christ taught regard for the poor, the weak, the unfortunate and the outcast. This teaching is illustrated in his whole career but especially in his attitude toward women and little children.

Sixth. Jesus Christ taught what Spirit should dominate and control his disciples. He taught how freely God would give this Spirit if his disciples only asked him. He called this Spirit THE HOLY SPIRIT, mark that word. cf. Rom. 8:9.

But why say more? "For in many things we all stumble." James 3:2.

From the Editor's View-Point

Americanizing the Immigrant

The "Melting Pot" in America has not succeeded in making Americans out of all who have passed through the process. The formula may be all right in theory, but it has not always worked out in practice.

We have heard and seen frequent discussions of the duties of the church toward the immigrant, and special emphasis has been laid upon the necessity of furnishing them the high ideals of the best types of Christianity which is very good in itself. The church may have been neglectful about this obligation in the past and it may not be fully awake to its opportunities at the present, but there are some things that the church can not do that go far toward making Americans out of the aliens who seek homes among us, and these things the state must do.

Only recently we saw in one of our newspapers the account of the arrest of a man in Ohio for pro-Germanism who was born in America forty years ago and who has lived on the farm where he was born all these years, but who is still unable to read or speak the English language. No one can imbibe the true American spirit without being first able to understand the language of an American, but we would lay a part of the blame at the door of his parents, a part of it at the door of a church that conducts a parochial school in a foreign language and a part of it at the door of a state that gives the franchise to men who can not speak the language of the state of which they are a part.

Years ago we had a family of German neighbors who insisted that their children should speak nothing but the German language around the home, but one of the small boys said to the writer: "but when we are off by ourselves we talk English." Here the parents were in error and the children, while seeming disobedient, were right. They sought to become Americans. Some years ago we were called upon to conduct the English service at the funeral of a member of a German church because the pastor could not preach in English and many of the younger relatives and neighbors could not understand the German. In conversation with the German pastor we learned that though he had come to America as a young man and had received his theological training in an American seminary, he had not tried to acquire a speaking knowledge of the English language because he thought he "would not need it." He acknowledged his error, but it was then too late to correct it entirely in his case; but no such a school should be allowed to continue in America. Of course in a few years we will see that it is only a passing frenzy that is abolishing all teaching of German in our High Schools and Colleges, and undoubtedly after the frenzy has passed the study of this language will again be given a place in our schools, but the state should insist upon all immigrants, especially those that seek citizenship, learning to speak the language of the country whose protection they claim.

Labor Laws

The first labor law of which we have any record is that recorded in the book of Genesis and says: "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread." This ancient labor law has been found essential to the wellbeing of society on many occasions. The Apostle Paul found it necessary to recommend the enforcement of this ancient law by some of the early Christians to whom he ministered and his advice to the church was: "If any man will not work, neither shall he eat."

People sometimes seem to forget this divine law and rather expect to be cared for by the society to which they contribute no productive labor. In the early days of the American colonies Captain John Smith found it a most effective method to overcome laziness among some of the colonists to enforce this ancient law, and a sentence of a few days without bread never failed to make a man measurably industrious, if nothing more. That there are still people who disregard this divine law is evident on every hand and quite frequently marked examples are brought to our notice . Only a few days ago a fifteen year old boy was arrested for burglary and his defense was: "The world owes me a living" and he felt he had a right to help himself to the products of other people's labors.

In these days of stress and strain there is no reason why any ablebodied man should not be productively employed, and yet there are large numbers of such that seem to have no occupation or profession other than that of loafing. To overcome this condition which is evil on its face, the Akron, Ohio city officials have drawn up an ordinance which will compel every ablebodied male resident between the ages of 18 and 50 years to go to work at some productive employment or go to prison. It is not enough that a man shall be able to show a bank account sufficiently large to provide for his own needs, he must show a labor card stating that he is employed in some productive labor for at least thirty-six hours per week.

This may seem like a curtailment of one's personal liberty which is supposed to be one of the foundation principles of the American government; but any personal liberty which proves a menace to society must be treated in a manner that will result in the greatest good to the greatest number; otherwise government becomes disorganized and instead of being democratic in form it becomes anarchistic. No man has a right to live at the expense of society if he is able to care for himself and no man has a right to live off of the profits of other men's toil unless he himself contributes something to the toiler's welfare or to society that is equal in value to what he receives from it. A wealthy loafer is as much a parasite upon the social body as is an ablebodied tramp or pool-room habitue.

The law of life is a law of labor and we have full sympathy for the city council that takes steps to compel all its male citizens to get busy at some productive employment. With such a labor law we are in hearty agreement.

Devastations of War

Situated as we are more than three thousand miles from the seat of war it requires considerable stretching of the imagination to try to even construct a mental picture of the devastation wrought in the path of the terrible "Hun." Compared to he trail of modern warfare Sherman's march "From Atlanta to the Sea," left a path of roses in its wake. Our newspapers and magazines have attempted in picture and in story to help us grasp the real situation and the real conditions in the war stricken countries of Europe, and we have seen the pictures of razed villages and destroyed cathedrals; we have seen the work of destruction as it has come upon the peaceful valleys and the fertile hills and have been told of the terrible upheaval of the earth and the vast craters opened by the dropping of shells of such force and power as the world never before dreamed of. Productive gardens and well-kept orchards have been turned into mines and quarries of sand and concrete that ruin them forever for the purposes for which God made the world. These things have been told to us and some of our countrymen have seen them with their own eyes. Others have laid down their lives in this far distant land for the cause of liberty and still other thousands shall be called to make the supreme sacrifice; but this is not the only devastation of war. Other less spectacular results will obtain in the lives of many of the millions that have been called to the service. Interrupted lives, broken plans will all mean disaster to vast numbers of our American boys. We are told that the war has already brought to our colleges a loss of 40,000 students, hundreds of professors and $4,000,000 income. Many of these 40,000 students, even though they may escape death in the great struggle, will find it impractical to again take up their college work after their return from the war and thus their entire career is sacrificed as one of the devastations of war. These are some of the results of any nation wide or world wide war that can never be properly estimated, and for such losses and such devastation the ones responsible for the war must give account as well as to account for the physical destruction wrought.

The Duty of Brethren in the Present Crisis

By J. L. GILLIN, University of Wisconsin

As I have already intimated, scarcely anything in this country will be the same after this war is over as it was before. Without a doubt, this war has raised anew the whole question as to the attitude that our people should take toward war, and especially toward the present war. There is no doubt, according to the principles which have held from the beginning of our organization to the present, that the church does not sanction the bearing of arms by its members. In previous wars, in which our people had to face the question, provisions were made to respect their conscientious objections to the bearing of arms. With the outbreak of this war, the same question has come to the fore again. In the course of the last year, this matter has been taken up by the Government and provision has been made for the conscientious objector. The President of the United States has laid down the conditions upon which conscientious objectors to war may escape military service. These conditions are summarized in the Survey magazine of March 30, as follows:

"The President's order puts upon the same footing persons who have been certified by their local boards to belong to recognized sects opposed to war, and persons who have not been so certified but do object to participation in war because of conscientious scruples. He defines the 'the non-combatant' service into which all such persons may be put. This includes: (a) Service in the medical corps, wherever performed; (b) Service in the quartermaster corps in the United States and also certain specified activities in the rear of the zone of operations; (c) Any engineer service in the United States, and certain specified activities, mainly concerned with construction and repair, in the rear of operations. In so far as feasible, assignments of conscientious objectors are in the future to be to the medical corps, but each individual may request assignment to some other non-combatant branch.

"It is made the duty of each division, camp or post commander, 'through a tactful and considerate officer,' to present to conscientious objectors the opportunities open to them. A certificate of assignment is then given to the objector. This certificate is thereafter to be respected as preventing the assignment of its holder from non-combatant to combatant service, though the holder may request assignment from one branch of non-combatant service to another.

"Persons who still refuse to accept non-combatant service under military authority, because of conscientious scruples against war, are not finally disposed of by the order. On April 1, and monthly thereafter, the names of such individuals are to be reported to the Secetary of War, who will 'from time to time' give further directions as to their disposition. Pending such directions, they are to be segregated as far as practicable and placed under the command of 'a specially qualified officer of tact and judgment.' This officer is to be instructed to 'impose no punitive hardship of any kind upon them;' neither is he to allow their objections to be made the basis of any favor or consideration beyond exemption from actual military service.

"The order further stipulates that sentences imposed by courts-martial for wilful disobedience of lawful commands shall prescribe confinement 'in the United States disciplinary barracks or elsewhere,' but not in a penitentiary. This does not apply to deserters. The Secretary of War, is, moreover, directed to revise the sentences or findings of courts-martial heretofore held and to bring them to the attention of the President, if any be found at variance with the provisions of the order.

It is thought possible that, with respect to persons who may refuse, on conscientious grounds, to accept non-combatant service under military authority, legislation now pending before Congress may be applied to them. One such bill authorizes the secretary of war to grant furloughs 'for such periods as he may designate' for the purpose of permitting men 'to engage in civil occupations and pursuits.' This would open the way to letting objectors engage in agricultural work, Red Cross activities and such social service as that of the Friends' Reconstruction Unit.

"Another matter left open by the order is the disposition of objectors who have complied with the law up to the point of entraining for camp. A number have done that, notifying their local boards that they could not conscientiously entrain, but saying that they could be found at home. Whether such men will be treated as deserters and court-martialed and imprisoned, is not finally determined. Neither is it known whether objectors who accept non-combatant service will be required ot bear arms for defensive purposes. Such training is required in the medical and quartermaster cops.

"The order seems to make it clear that men who deny the riglit of the government to force them to any service whatever, whether in th army or on furlough, will either be court-martialed and imprisoned, segregated, or discharged—as in some cases already—— as 'mentally unfit for service.'"

Unless our people are going to be open to the charge of cowardice and lack of patriotism, it is their duty when they are called to the service of the country to respond without making strenuous endeavors for exemption. Our church will be forever disgraced, and ought to be, if, under these conditions that now face our country, and the provisions made by the Preident for the conscientious objector, they refuse to do their share in this hour of the country's need. We enjoy all the rights and privileges of citizens of this country. Therefore, if we are excused from bearing arms, certainly we are under obligation to perform a service for the country that may be as dangerous or even more dangerous than carrying a gun in the front trenches. Otherwise, we are cowards, and slackers, and men lacking in loyalty. This country stands for the privilege that men may worship God according to the dictates of their own consciences. This country protects us in the exercise of that privilege. This country is face to face with a government that does not permit the exercise of that right. Therefore, our people should see to it that they do not show themselves in a light that will look like cowardice or lack of patriotism. In my judgment, those of our young men who are of draft age, ought to welcome the opportunity to serve their country in these non-combatant lines. And any congregation which will encourage any of its members to seek exemption from non-combatant service is recreant to its duty and deserves the contempt of all right thinking men.

Moreover, since we, as a denomination of non-resisters, have been accorded special privileges on account of our conscientious scruples against war, we ought certainly to volunteer with our money. In these times, if we do not do more than our share with our money to help this country in its vital struggle, we certainly shall be open to the just charge of seeking to escape from service in order that we may take financial advantage of the situation. The only way to escape from that cahrge is to come forward with our money for the country's need in the shape of Liberty Loans, Red Cross and Y. M. C. A. subscriptions more heartily than those who not only are giving their money but their sons to the service of their country. To do less would be to deserve the opprobrium that is justly visited upon slackers.

Striving to Enter In

BY REV. W. H. JORDAN

"I wonder how many people will be saved," said a man to Jesus one day. It is a question almost as old as the race. Jesus, who was able to answer definitely, did not do so, but warned him and warned us of the fact that many would never find eternal life.

"Strive to enter into the strait gate," said Jesus. "Crowds miss the strait gate and elbow one another as they drift or rush toward the wide gate and the broad way that leads to destruction. Few ever see the little gate. It is so small that a man cannot get through so long as he clings to his selfishness, so long as he is full of pride."

"Strive" is a most expressive word. It is to "agonize." Agony is one of our most emphatic words for intense pain and struggle. We had no word like it and had to borrow this from the Greeks. We also borrowed another while we were in the borrowing business—"antagonize"—where we struggle against. The Greek also has another word—"sun-agonize," where we strive together to accomplish anything.

But we have many, many words in our common, everyday speech which suggest effort in achieving. This list is as suggestive as it is incomplete. Contend, contest, strive, pull, pull against, press toward the mark, push, tug, struggle, endure, persevere, grapple, labor, toil, drudge, work hard, bend to it, buckle down to it, never turn back, never give up, cry, run, repent, work day and night, leave no stone unturned, go through fire and water, move heaven and earth.

It is Paul determining to keep under his body. It is Martin Luther fighting sin in flagrant forms. It is the violent man taking the kingdom by force. Striving to enter the narrow way is no child's play, it is a man's work. It is seeking with all the heart. It is knocking with a determination to be heard. It is sacrifice. Dr. Judson tells of a native woman who faced the question of giving up her necklace of jewels for Christ. She took them off her neck, and as she looked at the sparkling gems, tears filled her eyes. That necklace was the most precious thing she had. A soul battle, and then a victory, as she exclaimed, "Yes, I love Jesus more!"

It is a mastery of the soul's forces with Jesus in command, breaking into the Hindenburg line of opposition. It is David courageously attacking Goliath. It is living the teachings of Jesus rather than the selfish, soul-destroying teachings of Nietzsche.

Jesus has set the signal of danger across the path of every man. Few find the way. Many lose it. Do not the "few" and "many" make up the mass of mankind? In what class are you?

"Strive to enter in at the strait gate." The things elsewhere do not satisfy. The traveler in the desert with tongue parched with thirst, and hungering for food, caught sight of a bag, and seizing it, exclaimed, "Thank God, here is bread!" Tearing it open, what was his disappointment to find it filled with jewels. Casting them from him in bitter disappointment, he said, "It's bread I want!" Yes, there is no substitute for bread. The narrow ways leads to life.

Jesus went so far as to utter the prayer of a lost man. After prayerless years in Broadway and Vanity Fair, when the gateway leading to life had stood open continually, he discovers it closed, and with a voice of alarm he cried, "Lord, Lord, open unto me!" It was certainly earnest praying, but prayer too late. "Depart, I never knew you," was the only, the awful, answer to his useless cry.

Some may say, It is selfish to try to save yourself. Is it? Is it selfish for the child to get an education? Of what service can he be until he is trained? Is it selfish for the farmer to make the most of his farm? For me to make the most of my own home? Will we not be better able to serve others as we fit ourselves for the best service? Are men who think so little of the offered salvation of Christ as refuse it, the men who are doing the most to uplift men? Who builds churches, colleges, hospitals? Who goes down into the slums to seek the lost? Who goes even to the regions beyond to rescue men? Who are willing to spend and to be spent, to minister rather than to be ministered unto, but those who have saved themselves by accepting the precious offers of the Saviour? Strive to enter, and enter now. Today. Don't miss the date God set for repentance. "Today, if we will hear his voice, harden not your heart."

Remember, the door is open. Jesus has so declared. "I am he that openeth and no man shutteth, and shutteth and no man openeth. Behold, I have set before you an open door, and no man can shut it."

And we have thought of the regions beyond the gate? The little gate leadeth to life. Nor did Jesus mean life in heaven in the endless future, merely, but life here, heaven in daily life, for it is a path of life, narrow, yes, but not too narrow for me to walk with Christ. There was only one narrow way by which a child could learn the multiplication table, but he could make no use of it until he knew it. And when once we have found Jesus, we do not feel the least hampered though ten thousand other people have found him.

Again, in this narrow way we have the holy fellowship of the spirits of just men made perfect. Many shall come from the east and the west, and the north and the south, and shall sit down with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom.

If I think the thoughts of Shakespeare, and Milton, and Wordsworth, and Ruskin, I shall know their joys as well. I shall realize a sense of fellowship.

And we are finding more doors beyond, wide open doors. Only our own neglects will bar the doors against us. May we, like Paul, have eyes to see the doors of opportunity.—The Presbyterian.

Clearing the Doctrines

Not long since there was a tendency to ignore or belittle the Scriptural doctrines. Men were more prompt to assume and assert speculative formulas. There was a general tendency toward the reduction of truth, the value of truth. This was one of the extreme teachings of Germanism. This was Nietzsche's position. It put itself in the more popular form of no creed. This is passing. Men are bowing to truth and appreciate more fully its effects on human character and responsibility. The creedless spirit is not so bold. He has nothing to offer in the present crisis, and he is more conscious of his own need and his own failure to meet it. The most fundamental and etsting fact of the Christian religion is the resurrection. If a man will face and accept this fact, he is in line for the whole articulated faith. We have read a number of books of a writer we admired as a man. They were reckless. He stopped at the destruction of nothing. We met him afterwards. We formed a mutual friendship. He ventured the assertion that the difference between us was only one of interpretation. We replied, not of interpretation, but of the facts. Do you believe in the resurrection of the body? He replied, "I most surely do, and I give you my hand on it." We again replied we stand on the same fundamental rock; there can be little difficulty of agreement. We have never noted a denial or a belittling of one of the great essentials of the Christian faith since. We are led to believe that the thought of ten million young men, the flower of Europe, being cut off in the prime of their young lives, had pressed home upon him the need of the resurrection, and the truth for it. It had led him to re-examine the evidences, and he found them so full and the fact so refreshing, that he received it with both head and heart, with gladness and joy. A man must be petrified who does not wish for the resurrection of the dead, under present times. He who does wish it may find it, and he who finds it cannot fail to believe in and love Him who secured it. When one loves him and knows the power of his resurrection and the fellowship of his suffering, all the other blessed truths take their place, and one joins with Thomas in that blessed confession, "My Lord and my God." This finding the way back is on the increase, and there is a growing joy in the present darkness and sorrow.

The Church Vote

What an amazing change in sentiment the last few years have manifested in regard to the influence of the church upon political action! A Philadelphia lawyer remarked the other day that even ten years ago, the support of seven saloons was enough to guarantee the nomination and election of almost any candidate for political office, and politicians, as a class, referred contemptuously to the "Church vote" as a negligible quantity. But, today, the support of even one saloon is looked upon as a liability rather than an asset, and the support of seven churches is hailed as a sure omen of success. A new time has dawned, when political leaders are going out of their way to conciliate religious leaders and to attempt to persuade them that the candidates will be in line with the ideals for which the church stands.

Just at the present time, the church is facing a supreme opportunity in the matter of the great temperance reform. What is done now will not only count double, but may count a thousand times more than it would a few years hence. The exigencies of the present war situation have opened the minds and hearts of our people to the menace of the liquor traffic as never before. Marvelous victories have been won. Already eleven states, by their Legislatures, have ratified the Federal Prohibition Amendment, and the prospects are bright that within a year or two, twenty-five more will join this roll of honor, and will be found ready to abolish from our land an institution that has been the source of much sorrow and shame. Now is the time for every member of the Church of Christ to stand up and be counted. In the doubtful states, where the traffic has been strongly entrenched, the vote of every citizen will count mightily in the primaries and the election of this year, when Legislators are to be chosen who will have the right to dispose of this problem. The influence which the church is exerting in this direction is seen, for example in the State of Pennsylvania, where every candidate of the leading parties for the office of Governor who has the slightest chance for nomination has declared, in advance, his support of the Prohibition Amendment. So every candidate for Senator or Representative ought to be expected to declare himself and then it is the duty of the followers of Christ to vote and with the friends of righteousness, rather than with the friends of unrighteousness. We will never have a better chance to win out in this great reform than we have right now. May the men and women of the Reformed Church do nobly their part in achieving a glorious victory!—Reformed Church Messenger.

Teaching Religion by Example

Many parents are anxious about the religious life of their children—as they should be, for religion is one of the most important assets that a child can possess. But it is not an asset that can be be handed down from generation to generation. It must be "experieced" by the individual for himself. A child may talk about the religion of its parents, but it will all end there unless the child has come into possession of the precious thing for itself.

Several years ago, when President Wilson was the head of Princeton University, he delivered an address upon the relation of young people to the church and made this remark about the influences that often determine the entrance of children upon the religious life:

"Religion is communicable, I verily believe, aside from the sacred operations of the Holy Spirit, only by example. You have only to ask yourself what is the effect of a profession of religion on the part of a man who does not live a religious life. You know that the effect is not only to communicate religion, but to delay indefinitely its influence. It is certainly true that we are not to judge religion by those who profess it but do not live it. But it is also true that if those who profess it are the only ones we live with, and they fail to live it, it cannot be communicated except by some mysterious grace of the Holy Spirit himself. So that no amount of didactic teaching in a home whose life is not Christian will ever get into the consciousness and life of the children. If you wish your children to be Christians you must really take the trouble to be Christians yourselves. Those are the only terms upon which the home will work the gracious miracle."

Here is a wise word and it is commended to all those who desire to have their children enter into the Christian life: "If you wish your children to be Christians you must really take the trouble to be Christians yourselves." That's fair enough. And the test of real Christianity comes often in the home rather than in the church or in the community, and there is no one in the home who is quicker to discern the quality of one's Christian life than the child of that home. It is hardly fair to say to the child, "You go and become a Christian." It is better to say, "Come, let us try to be Christians together."—The Christian Advocate.

A Righteous Protest

Our protest concerns chiefly two things with which we as a nation are vitally connected and largely responsible for. The first is the continuation of the manufacture of beer and wine in this country for beverage purposes, and the second, for this nation to send food stuffs to allied nations, making food material here scarce and high priced, while our allies allow liquor to be manufactured and thus using thousands of tons of grain and fuel, with which many soldiers are being debauched and rendered inefficient "to do their best" in the present world conflict.

As regards the first point we have frequently pointed out editorially the inconsistency of our government to urge conservation of food by housewives, and in fact by all classes of people, excepting brewers of beer and the manufacturers of wine and their patrons. We are glad to know that at this writing there is a bill pending before Congress at Washington, D. C., looking toward the prohibition of beer and wine making during the war. We sincerely hope the bill will carry. If it does, and the President signs it so that it becomes a law, we as a nation canconsistently appeal to the allied nations who depend upon America for food in the future, that food stuffs will be supplied only when liquor making among them is prohibited. That would usher in an era of unusual enthusiasm and would increase army and navy efficiency to a marked degree. It would be an economic achievement that would augur much for all allied nations.

We believe the present time is the most opportune to accomplish this most desirable victory; for it would reflect great credit on these nations and would be the harbinger to usher in an era of good feeling and unobstructed fellowship in a worthy cause, for which so many prayers have been offered and so many laudable efforts have been made, lives sacrificed and great amount of money expended. What a blessing to thousands who are now in the thralldom of the drink habit. What an object lesson for the rising generation when temptation from open saloons is removed. Temperance people must stand together in this gigantic struggle, personal opinions should be surrendered to the desired goal of having a saloonless nation. Petty contentions must be crowded into the background and a bold front assumed. United we stand but divided we fall. Let us work for liberty and a stainless flag. —Evangelical Messenger.

Churches and Church Membership

Washington, D. C., May 2, 1918.—During the ten-year period ended December 31, 1916, the total church membership in the United States increased from 35,068,058 to 42,044,374, or by 19.9 per cent; the number of churches, from 212,230 to 228,007, or by 7.4 per cent; the number of ministers, from 164,830 to 191,722, or by 16.3 per cent; the number of Sunday school scholars, from 15,337,811 to 20,569,831, or by 34.1 per cent; the number of Sunday schools from 192,722 to 207,789, or by 7.8 per cent; and the number of Sunday school officers and teachers, from 1,746,074 to 2,049,293, or by 17.4 per cent. These data, which constitute a few of the significant facts developed by the Census Bureau's recent inquiry relating to religious bodies, are contained in a statement issued by Director Sam L. Rogers and compiled under the supervision of Mr. William C. Hunt, chief statistician for population. The statistics presented are preliminary and subject to later revision, but are substantially correct.

The total number of denominations covered by the statistics was 2001, an increase of 13 over the number reported for 1906. This increase is the net result of the consolidation or dropping out of 16 small denominations and the addition of 29 small denominations, the latter comprising some which were actually in existence in 1906 but not then brought to light and others resulting from consolidation of formerly independent churches, reorganization within existing denominations, etc.

Church Membership

Of the 42,044,374 church members reported, 15,742,262, or 37.4 per cet, were Roman Catholics; 250,340, or six-tenths of 1 per cent, were adherents of the Eastern Orthodox churches (mainly Greek Church and Russian Church); 359,998, or nine-tenths of 1 per cent, were members of Jewish congregations; and the remainder, 25,691,774, or 61.1 per cent, comprised the membership of the various Protestant churches, together with that of a few bodies, such as the Latter Day Saints, the Spiritualists and others, not usually considered as belonging to any of the groups named.

In comparing the figures just given, it should be borne in mind that the Roman Catholic and the Eastern Orthodox churches include in their membership all infants and the children who have been baptized, whereas the Protestant churches do not, as a rule, receive young children as members; and that in the case of some of the more orthodox Jewish organizations only the male incorporators of the institutions or those who have bought shares or memberships in them are treated as members. The foregoing percentages, therefore, overstate the relative strength of the Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox churches and understate that of the Jews.

The canvass showed 9 denominations which had a total membership of more than 1000,000 each and an aggregate of 32,468,732, or 77.2 per cent of the entire membership reported for all religious bodies. These organizations, with their membership, were as follows: Baptist, Northern, 1,227,448; Baptist, Southern, 2,711,591; Baptist, National (colored) 3,018,341; Disciples of Christ, 1,231,4004; Methodist Episcopal, 3,718,396; Methodist Episcopal, South,

2,108,061; Presbyterian in U. S. A., 1,613,056; Protestant Episcopal, 1,098,173; Roman Catholic, 15,742,2662.

The aggregate membership of the several Baptist denominations (North, South, Colored, and 14 others) was 7,236,650; of the various Methodist denominations (Methodist Episcopal, Methodist Episcopal—South, Methodist Protestant, African Methodist Episcopal, African Methodist Episcopal Zion, Colored Methodist Episcopal, and 11 other Methodist denominations, 5 of which are white and 6 are colored), 7,165,986; of the Presbyterian denomination (Presbyterian in U. S. A., Presbyterian in U. S., United Presbyterian and 7 others), 2,257,439; and of the 21 Lutheran denominations, 2,463,265.

Ministers

The total number of ministers reported, 191,792, comprised 20,287 Catholic priests, 356 priests of the Eastern Orthodox churches 719 Jewish rabbis and 170,359 ministers of other churches, mainly of Protestant denominations. The percentage of inrease in number of ministers during the ten-year period, 16.3, was somewhat less than that in membership, 19.9. The average number of church members to each minister for all denominations in 1916 was 219. For the Roman Catholics, however, the corresponding average 776, was much larger.

Sunday Schools

The canvass showed 207,789 Sunday schools, with 2,049,293 officers and teachers and 20,569,831 scholars. These totals comprise 195,276 Sunday schools, with 1,959,918 officers and teachers and 19,951, 675 scholars, conducted by church organizatons, and 12513 undenominational and union Sunday schools, with 89,375 officers and teachers to each denominational Sunday school was almost exactly 10 and the average number of scholars was a small fraction more than 100; whereas in the case of undenominational and union Sunday schools the average number of offifficers and teachers was a little more than 7 and the average number of scholars not quite 50. The number of scholars in the Roman Catholic Sunday schols, 1,853,245, was equal to 9.3 per cent of the total for all denominational Sunday schools. This proportion was very much smaller than the corresponding one, 37.4 per cent, which Roman Catholic church membership represented of the total. This digerence is due in large part to the fact that the attendants at Protesant Sunday schols are very young children, and in many cases he parochial school takes the place of the Sunday school. Moreover, as already pointed ou,t the total membership of the Roman Catholic church includes all infants and children who have been baptized, whereas that of Protestant churches consists almost entirely of youths and adults.

Devastation and Death in Assyria

Mar Shimun head of the Assyrian Church has been slain, according to a cablegram received by the State Department at Washington yesterday. This same cablegram brings word that the Russian troops in Persia have been completely withdrawn from the region west of Lake Urumia. Fighting is still going on between the Mohammedan tribes and the Assyrian Christians. Severe famine conditions prevail and it is feared that most of the Assyrian men may be killed and the women and children left desolate and unprotected.

Mar Shimun is the first political head of a nationality who has paid the supreme sacrifice in this war. The kings of Belgium, Servia, and Montenegro and former Czar of Russia are still alive, but the civil and religious head of the Assyrian Christians has fallen. To his people he was both King Albert and Cardinal Mercier; and the Assyrian Highlanders who mourn his loss are a gallant remnant who perhaps at this very hour are defending their women and children against armed Mohammedans.

In 1903, when a boy of sixteen Mar Shimun was selected to become Catholicos or patriarch, to succeed his uncle Ruwel (Reuben) Mar Shimun, who was on the point of death. He was consecrated Catholicos on the 12th of April of that year. His later development brilliantly justified the hopes set upon the youth. In 1915 he was physically very handsome with red cheeks and black hair already sprinkled with gray. To all he showed the fine courtesy traditional in his family; and to his own people he was fatherly.

He was educated by native teachers and by members of the mission established by Archbishop Benson of Canterbury at the patriarchal seat, Qudshanis (Kochannes) in Kurdistan. As 138 Catholicos of the East he maintained the ancient tradition, Consecrated from birth to the service of God, like the Nazarites of old he never ate meat in his life. In Lent he and his flock underwent a most rigid fast for fifty days, Sundays included. He is in every way a model to his people, who almost worshiped him.

"I was an hungered and ye gave me meat"

Benajmin Mar Shimun was the eldest of five brothers. One of these, Hormuzd, was a student in Constantinople when the war broke out; he was carried to Mosul and has not been heard from since. Another, Eshia (Isaiah) died amid the hardships of the summer of 1915. David has been the leader of the Assyrian forces in holding the border against the Kurds; his son, brought up as a Nazarite will, if approved by the people, normally become the next patriarch.

Next to Mar Shimun in influence was his eldest sister Surma. Finely educated in English and Syriac by the Archbishop's Mission, she became a recognized authority on canon law and church history, and at the same time used to show hospitality to the visitors, who formerly flocked to the patriarchate twenty-five to a hundred at a time.

The late Bishop Collins of Gibralter visited Mar Shimun in 1907 and was deeply impressed by the patriarch and his people. He wrote: "The poorest Syrian of the mountains has preserved a national dignity, courage, and a freshness which are lovable."

Harried Out of the Assyrian Highlands

Before the war, the Assyrian Christians lived within a great triangle, extending from near Mosul on the Tigris straight north to Lake Van, thence southwesterly to the starting point, Mosul. Including 35,000 in Persia, they number altogether about 125,000 souls.

In January, 1915, the Turks captured the city of Urumia and held it 'till May. The defeat of Halil Bey at Salmas, Persia, in May made it possible for the Russians to relieve the Armenian city of Van and to re-enter Urumia. The next Turkish offensive, in June, was an attack, led by the Vali of Mosul, against the Highlanders of Mar Shimun.

The Assyrian Highlanders, inhabiting an ancient mountain home of liberty like Switzerland, defended their narrow valley against the invaders with the utmost valor. The Turks had with them some mountain artillery, so that they were able to batter down the resistance offered by he castles and churches. At length the Assyrians were forced to abandon their valleys and to take refuge for three months in the fastnesses of almost inaccessible mountains. Here amid the clouds they preserved their freedom; but they ran short of supplies. With a handful of trusty warriors their brave Patriarch Mar Shimun betook himself through untold perils to the Russian lines at Salmas, Persia, to secure assistance. The fall of Warsaw, however, had so weakened the Russians that for the moment they were unable to render effective aid; consequently Mar Shimun was forced in November, 1915 to lead his needy flock down to the plateaus of northtwestern Persia. They scattered throughout the plains of Salmas and Urumia. Here they did not find food enough to go round; and they lacked houses and winter clothing. Some of them crowded into barns and tried to keep warm; others slept out in the bitter cold. In this high altitude, where snow is plentiful, the suffering was intense; and within three months fifteen percent of the refugees had died of disease or of starvation.

In January, 1916 Mar Shimun visited Grand Duke Nicholas, commander-in-chief of the Russian Army of the Caucausus, who received him with the honors due to the head of a church and of a nationality. The Russians requested the Assyrian Highlanders to help defend the border against the Turks and Kurds. As late as October, 1917 the Assyrians held the Castle of Chal, only fifty miles from Mosul. But the withdrawal of the Russian forces has brought great disaster to the Assyrians leaving Persia to self determination threatens thousands of refugee women and children with extermination; but America can save them.

As early as 1915 America began to help feed and clothe 60,000 refugees, in the plains of Urumia and Salmas. As the time went on conditions grew worse and despite the systematic relief carried on under the auspices of the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief, here in America, in raising of money and planting seed corn, the supply of foodstuffs in Persia is still inadequate; the last cablegram dispatches have brought reports of terrific famine and of an increasing death rate from starvation.

The total mount of money appropriated by the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief, of which Cleveland H. Dodge is Treasurer, for relief work in Persia up to April 3, 1918, is $1,931,732.48. The money has been cabled through the State Department has been given out in the form of food and clothing to the most destitute refugees, by the American relief workers.

Paul Shimmon, personal representative in America of the late Mar Shimun, on hearing of the latest calamity in Persia expressed a profound sense of his race's loss in the death of the Patriarch. He said, "The 5000 Nestorian Christians who have made their home in America are in deep mourning for their racial and religious head. They are also very anxious about the safety of their relatives in Urumia and Salmas. Mr. Shimmon has a daughter, mother and three brothers, and many other relatives in present peril; nearly every Assyrian family in America is in similar anxiety. Bishop Burch of New York, Honorary Vice-president of the Assyrian Committee was deeply pained on receiving the news of the death of the Assyrian Patriarch."

Officials of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions expressed their deep solicitude for the sufferers; and at the offices of the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief, 1 Madison Avenue, New York, the Executive Secretary, Mr. Charles V. Vickrey expressed his sorrow at the death of Mar Shimun and gave immediate assurance that all American relief workers in the district would remain on the field. "The cablegram just received," said Mr. Vickrey, "does not diminish, but rather increases the necessity of relief work in that section. It will be noted in the cablegram that it is the Syrian men who are in danger of extermination by death and that thousands of women and children will be left destitute, dependent upon American aid for food and shelter. All of our relief workers, including missionaries, physicians and teachers remain on the field. They have lived for years among the people, know their language and are held in high esteem by all. We feel assured that they will stand at their posts and other American workers will be sent to relieve these just as soon as conditions make it possible."

When to Begin the Care of a Baby

BY MRS. MAX WEST

Mothers are just beginning to realize that the better care which babies must have if 100,000 of them are to be saved during Children's Year should commence before the baby is born. Every year three times that number of children under five die and are lost to the country before they have lived much beyond infancy. A large part of this vast multitude of young Americans perished needlessly, because many of the deaths could have been prevented by proper and sufficient care.

At what age do most of these preventable deaths occur? What are the proven methods by which babies' lives may be saved? From the answers to these questions mothers will appreciate the special work for children which they can do during Children's Year.

The first and largest number of deaths among little babies is due to what are called the prenatal causes. This group includes the babies which were born prematurely, or too weak to survive, perhaps with some defect of the body which forbids their living, and also those who are so injured by the birth process that they can not be saved. All of these causes of death are effective either in the period of pregnancy or at childbirth itself. The babies' lives can be saved only if their mothers have proper care at these most important periods.

The essential features of good care for expectant mothers are proper and sufficient food, rest, freedom from overtaxing forms of work and from worry, medical supervision of the general condition and prompt attention to small ailments as they arise. A prospective mother needs a light, nutritious diet of digestible foods such as she likes and her appetite demands. Fried and greasy foods, heavy puddings, and all heavy or underdone pastries, or an excess of any one article should be eliminated from her diet, as well as anything which she does not readily digest. It is also important that the expectant mother should drink a sufficient quantity of water each day.

During the last eight weeks before the baby comes the mother should as far as possible be spared all forms of heavy and taxing labor, in order that her strength may be built up in anticipation of the coming demand upon it. The baby's proper development also depends largely upon the mother's condition at this time, since the baby gains half his weight in the last eight weeks of pregnancy. The mother's ability to nurse her baby depends largely upon the care she has during these last weeks and immediately after confinement.

The mother should be under the care of a good doctor as long before the birth as possible in order that he may watch for and correct any untoward symptoms that may arise. It is exceedingly important that the ailments of pregnancy be dealt with in the beginning before they develop into more serious matters. At the first appearance of swollen hands and feet, or persistent headache, or pain in any part, or hemorrhage, or of spots before the eyes, a good doctor should be called.

It is much easier and far cheaper to see that mother and baby have the right kind of food and proper care during the brief period before birth than it is to undo the results of improper food and care at this decisive time. This is a need which we in this country must soon face as England and France have had to do. It is said that in Paris pregnant women had never been so well cared for as in the first months of the war.

The Children's Bureau, Washington, D. C., will send to any one asking for it a pamphlet giving simple directions to mothers-to-be. The Bureau will upon application furnish information to associations or communities as to starting prenatal clinics or consultation centers for mothers, where the services of a good doctor are made readily available for all mothers.

The establishment of such centers is one of the ways in which communities can give their children protection. Indeed, if all the mothers in a community realize how important such clinics are for the well being of their children, and combine in forwarding efforts to establish and maintain centers where mothers can go for advce before their babies are born and to which they can take their children for expert examination they can help in work that is of vital importance to the purpose of Children's Year, to "get a square deal for children, and save 100,000 babies."

REVIEW OF
The Thought and Work of the Church

Another church has voted to include the Evangelist for each family in the congregation, but the pastor informs us that they want to wait until they are sure they can make up the necessary amount of money before the announcement is made so we will withhold the name until another report is received, but we have no fear in regard to this church for it is made up of people who are pretty sure to do what they set out to do. We will most certainly accord them a hearty welcome when their name is added to the Honor Roll. In the meantime there are a number of other churches that should be busy in their endeavor to get on the Roll before the meeting of General Conference.

The church correspondent from the La Verne, California congregation reports a feast of good things recently enjoyed by that congregation in the way of a series of special meetings conducted by P. E. Lyon, wife and son of Pasadena. Five members were added to the church as a result of the meetings. All the different departments of the church at La Verne are active in their labors.

Brother Whitted and his congregation at Portis, Kansas, have the right idea in regard to looking up nearby prospective mission points. Recently the Portis church loaned their pastor long enough for him to hold a short meeting at Hill City. As a result of this loan six precious souls sought the salvation a full gospel offers and a number of them will be baptized at Portis. After serving the Portis church five years Brother Whitted has concluded to seek another field of labor and the Portis church will seek another pastor. Brother Whitted has been a faithful pastor at Portis and the Portis Brethren have been loyal workers with him. We trust satisfactory arrangements may be made whereby the good of all may be assured.

A. L. DeLozier has long had a desire to do something tangible for the Italian immigrant, but has not found the way open until just recently. He has just begun a work in the Italian colony in Allentown, Pennsylvaia. From his report we take it that this is a work the protestant churches should be greatly interested in, and we can certainly give Brother DeLozier the support of our prayers, if we can do nothing more. We sincerely wish him abundant success in this, a new venture for the Brethren church. Brtoher DeLozier has also the privilege recently of mingling with the Italian and Spanish speaking soldiers at Camp Crane. It may be difficult for some of these foreign speaking men to comprehend the real situation into which they have been thrust by the exigencies of war, and the ministry of a few men like DeLozier should be of great help to them.

M. A. Witter reports the progress of the work at Waynesboro which has been very satisfactory in spite of a number of losses by removal. These are days of great shifting of the population of the countries and many churches are feeling the effects of it. Some profit by the changes, but we fear the larger portion of them lose because too many will not look up church homes in their new places as promptly as they should. During the month of March Brother Witter received four members into the church by baptism.

E. M. Riddle, secretary of the Maryland-Virginia conference has an urgent message for the churches of that district in this week's Evangelist. Information regarding trains and railway connections is given that all prospective delegates should heed. If any possible way can be found to spare the time the editor wouud like to visit this conference as we feel that a closer bond of fellowship between this district and the Publishing House might thus be formed and the loyal pastors who support the work might be encouraged and helped.

Recently Brother Jennings gave a general report of his labors in the Fort Scott, Kansas Brethren mission. This week Sister Webb, the pastor completes the report. In spite of the adverse conditions under which the meetings were conducted the church was greatly strengthened and nine members were added to the church by baptism. The workers in this congregation feel greatly encouraged.

Dr. Gillin of the University of Wisconsin has favored the readers of the Evangelist with another statement concerning certain phases of the great war and of the part the noncombatant Brethren people may have in it. Horrible as the war is, and as much as it is to be regretted, yet it seems that under existing circumstances there is no escape from it, and there is a work that Brethren who are opposed to taking up arms in carnal warfare can and must do in support of the government of which they are a part. Brother Gillin points out some of these things.

J. L. Kimmel, secretary of the Brethren missionary board of Indiana says a few things to the churches and their pastors in Indiana that may seem just a little severe, but the situation in which this Indiana board finds itself calls for plain speaking and also for prompt action. The work this board is trying to do is done in the name of the Lord and certainly the Lord is not pleased when his work lags.

We are sure our readers have been wondering for some time why Brother Hubbard does not report the work at Nappance, Indiana. Frequently it does not pay for a pastor to be in too great haste about reporting his work as he enters upon a new field, for sometimes he is compelled to change his mind about some things and then he wishes he had not been in such a great hurry that report. Brother Hubbard waited until he had some understanding of the field he had entered, but now after six months he is able to give a good and an intelligent report. Seventeen members have been added to the church during this period, some of them coming from the meetings held at Gravelton and Union Salem by Brother P. J. Jennings and the others as the result of Brother Hubbard's labors in Nappanee. The Nappanee Sunday school and the prayer meeting are not willing to take back seats for any other Brethren church of similar size or even some of the larger ones.

L. G. Wood makes an interesting announcement to the various Prayer Bands of the church this week. These bands are to keep in touch with the Gribble party of missionaries in Africa in different ways, one of them being through prayer and intercession. Brother Wood also has an urgent request to make of the Sunday schools of the conference district represented by him as director of Sunday school promotion. It matters not how good the work of each school is, unless they are willing to "tell it out" in the reports sought the other schools of the district can not get the benefit of their enthusiasm.

As Brother Beachler has just gone into Pennsylvania to conduct the College Endowment campaign for that district we have no report from him this week, but in the meantime Dr. Furry wishes to very forcibly express the appreciation of the faculty, students and the board of trustees of the College to the Indiana churches for the magnificent manner in which they met his challenge As Dr. Furry says, other districts will not dare do less than Indiana has done.

One of the Brethren churches that is reaping some benefit from the great shifting of population of these days is the First Brethren church of Washington, D. C. This is certainly the opportune time for the Washington church to put forth its greatest efforts. With the coming of Brethren people into the capital city in the employ of the government and coming from east and west it will keep Brother Lyon busy looking after them, but we have an idea that Brother Lyon likes to be kept busy.

In a recent number of the Evangelist W. J. H. Bauman reported the work of the Long Beach, California church, but this week he reports from Morrill, Kansas where he has "gone back home" for a time. This is familiar ground to Brother Bauman and we are sure our readers will enjoy his reports from sunny Kansas as much as they did from the far western coast.

Around the Editor's Table

The Day of All Days

One of the features of modern life that spells success is system and organization. More is made of system in the business world today than ever before and the business firm or corporation that has the best worked system, other things being equal, is the one that is going to win.

For a number of years now church workers have been attempting to introduce some of the system of the world with its greater efficiency into the work of the church, and organizations have multiplied in an almost incredible manner. Undoubtedly much of this organization has been good, in fact we may safely say most of it has been good, but we must not forget the old saying concerning the possibility of there being sometimes "too much of a good thing."

The many organizations in every department of the world's work whether it be done through the church or through some other organization are all clamoring for recognition and a very large number of them are asking that special days shall be set aside for them until almost every day has become a special day. Commenting on this condition an editorial writer in the Christian Endeavor World says: "We are dazed with the 'days.' Think of it: Humane Day, Flag Day, Mothers' Day, Army and Navy Day, Children's Day, Labor Day, Tree Day, Horse Day, Peace Sunday, Father's Day, Day of Prayer for Public Schools, Prison Sunday, Apple Day, Bird Day, Child Labor Sunday, Day of Prayer for Students, Bible Day, Baby Week, Rally Day, Anti-Cigarette Day—you can easily double or treble the list.

"Soon we shall have all the fifty-two Sundays occupied, and preachers will have their year's topics laid down for them in advance; and all the week-days too, for that matter.

"These are good causes, but this method of calling attention to them has been so overworked that it no longer works."

While such elaborate preparations are constantly being made for these special days we are made to wonder what preparation has been made for the "Day of all Days," the Judgment Day? Any one of the special days that have been listed for observance by the churches and the people may be neglectd or even ignored occasionally and no great harm may result, but the day of all days must be met and reckoned with. The word of God says: "It is appointed once unto man to die, but afetr this the JUDGMENT. The day of death is as sure to come as the day of birth, and the day of judgment is as sure to come as the day of death, so it behoves all the people whom God has made to get ready for that great day. Rain storms, blizzards or a shortage of fuel may prevent one's observing some of the special days listed on the church calendar as they have been set apart by those in authority over us, but there is no power on earth to prevent one's presence before the great Judge on that one great Judgment Day. It is the day of all days, and apart from the power given us by the life and death of Jesus Christ no one could stand faultless before the throne on that great day. It is a question of being ready, ready through accepting the pardon God offers through his only Son, Jesus Christ.

Dying Churches Restored to Life

All of us have known churches to die out and after everything has been abandoned we are prone to say: "It is too bad, it seems that something should have been done to save that church and yet it appeared impossible." Impossible? Is anything impossible when God is reckoned with?

When we consider the membership of the Brethren church, and also the extent of its organization, it may seem to some of us that we have more than our share of dying or abandoned churches, but I think our body will compare favorably with some of the other church organizations. The name of a denomination seems to have but little to do with the matter of abandoned churches; but practically all church workers might profit by studying the methods of one man who took charge of a dying church and with the help of the Lord made it a most mighty factor for good in the community where it was located.

This chanced to be a Congregational church, and for quite a while its only pastoral service was that which theological students of a nearby school could give it, and the church was badly run down. The congregation was small and the church was in debt; and the majority of the people advised closing the church and selling out the property. However TWO members stood like Caleb and Joshua and urged that they possess the land for the sake of the children that might be cared for in the Sunday school.

What One Young Man Did

A theological graduate was again invited to fill the pulpit for one Sunday and he met an audience of twenty-five in the morning and fifteen in the evening. But he made a favorable impression on the few who heard him and he was finally invited to become their pastor. Now after four years he has a membership of one hundred and eighty, the majority of whom are active working members. The Sunday school now has an attendance of about two hundred and fifty, and he conducts a popular Bible class on Friday nights. There are constantly being added to the church new converts to the cause even though the church is surrounded by a foreign population. And this church has grown strong enough in the four years to help in the support of three other city missions in the same city. The children of the foreign population are most active workers and about ninety-five per cent of them carry their Bibles to Sunday school. Thus it is seen that the Word of God is honored and that it has been a mighty factor in building up this congregation.

Opposition From the World

Just across the street from this church is located a moving-picture show that is open seven nights out of the week. In many places it is claimed that the Sunday night "movies" have robbed the churches of their young people for the evening services. This young pastor has happily hit upon the plan to say NOTHING about the opposition across the street, but he has his church hold an open air meeting in front of the church on Sunday nights and from one hundred to one hundred and fifty earnest people gather to sing and speak and to do personal work. During these street meetings not a word is said about the moving picture show, but they constantly draw from the crowd that attends the show, and obtain many workers and members in this way.

Spiritual Growth

For the last year the pastor has been so occupied with work that he has not had time to give his talks to the mid-week prayer meeting, but the meeting is conducted without him and lasts one hour and a half each night and the meetings, we are told, are filled to overflowing with praise, prayer and testimony. Until this pastor started these prayer meetings with the asisstance of just two men and no organ even to help in their song service, the church had not had a prayer meeting for years. It is not at all difficult to imagine a church dying out rapidly where no prayer meeting is maintained. It is our conviction that spiritual poverty more than financial weakness is a large factor to be considered in dealing with dying or dead churches.

Physical Improvements

Spiritual growth is sometimes indicated by physical improvements and it was the case in the church under consideration. This church found its work handicapped by lack of accommodation and in the four years' time spent fifteen hundred dollars for improvements to its own building and present indications are that the operation will have to be repeated. No church fairs or rummage sales were held to help secure the money, but the scriptural plan was followed in giving as the Lord prospered them.

Now instead of receiving help from the mission board as they formerly did they not only support their own pastor and assistants, but support five native missionaries in the foreign field, and their Endeavor Societies are supporting eight boys in a mission school in Africa. Such is the substance of the story of a dying church that was saved by a consecrated young man, as told by Howard W. Pope in a recent number of the Christian Endeavor World. Are there not dying Brethren churches that might be similarly redeemed?

Items Gleaned from The Missionary Review of the World

Y. M. C. A. Growth in India

"The regular work of the Young Men's Christian Association in India, notwithstanding the war, is progressing in the chief centers. The number of Indians of strength and ability in secretarial positions has increased to nearly 150; the Americans number seventy and the British seventy-five," says "Association Men."

In several provinces of India there are twenty-seven cantonments with their Association huts and service. Wealthy Hindus and Mohammedans are giving liberally in support of this work.

The war has stirred India to the depths. Caste is ruthlessly breaking down in the Babel of tongues and of races which has been brought about through necessary military commingling. Commercial development had already done much to disturb India's stagnation and to beget a national race consciousness. These the war has greatly intensified and accelerated. A new India has come to life with its insistent demands and its imminent perils. Lord Willingdon, the Governor of the Bombay Presidency, writes: "Personally, I believe the Association has done much and perhaps more than any other institution to bring about a better understanding, warmer sympathy and truer confidence between all races who come to this country."

A Request for a Bible Class

Social freedom, without the restraining influence of Christianity, is a dangerous thing for Indian women, in the opinion at least of one of the leaders of the Brahmo Samaj. He came to a secretary of the Young Women's Christian Association in Calcutta, and asked her to open a Bible class, in the life of Christ, among the women of his community. When questioned as to his reason for making so unusual a request he replied: "We are afraid of our new women. They have freedom from exclusion, and advanced ideas, yet they have not the safeguarding influence that we see in the lives of Christian women. It is for this reason that we feel that a class in the life of Christ would be of value to them."

Another Criminal Settlement

Readers of The Review are familiar with the experiment of the Government of India in reforming criminals by settling them in villages of their own under the supervision of missionaries. The Government said that if 25 per cent. of the criminals would be honest it would pay to have them in the settlement instead of sentencing them to jail.

One of these colonies reports that, so far, 100 per cent. have proved themselves to be honest. Although the colony has no written laws, there is a code of unwritten laws. In the control of the colony self-government is carried on in accord with the following principles: (1) The settlers must understand that he that will not work shall not eat. (2) So far as possible work is provided for the settlers, and "now it is up to them to make good." (3) All the rules and regulations of the settlement are comprised in the two verses: "All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them; for this is the law and the prophets." And the other is like unto this one: "If a man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual, restore such an one in the spirit of meekness; considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted." So far there have been about 150 converts and they have proved to be very enthusiastic Christians.

League of Missionaries to Moslems

The membership of the confidential circle of workers in India, known as the Missionaries to Moslems League, is not large, but that is its very source of strength, because the bond of union established is one of faith and prayer and sympathy. For five years it has concentrated thought and effort on the problem in India, and doubtless stimulated many outside of its membership. The present secretary is the Rev. John Takle, Brahmanbria, Bengal.

Pathan First-Aid Treatment

Do the people of the Punjab need medical missions? Read this: A young Pathan girl, fifteen years old, with her right arm shattered by a bullet, was brought to a hospital of the Church Missionary Society in the Punjab, near the borders of Afghanistan. The missionary doctor thus describes the Pathan method of treating the case:

Her father's enemy had shot her as he could not get the man himself, and her father, greatly distressed, brought her to us one day last June. Round the arm next the flesh was the body of a cock split open, and bound on the wound when freshly killed, feathers outside. Around her body, to which the arm was again bound, cock and all, were the skins of two goats recently killed. This June with the temperature at 114 degrees, the child had been carried for twenty-four hours on a rough bed in the sun's heat. Such is the first aid rendered by the Pathan. The girl recovered under treatment, although the arm was at first very septic.—C. M. S. Gleaner.

Festival to the Water-God in India

One is reminded of the description in Psalm cxv of the "idols of silver and gold, the work of men's hands; they that make them are like unto them," when hearing an account of a recent celebration of the Gurunathan Festival in India, when thousands of people assembled from a radius of two or three hundred miles to propitiate the god of water, who is supposed at this time of the year to visit the country in floods. For days before the appointed festival processions of men and women march with brass pots of holy water; rockets are exploded day and night, both to salute the god and summon the people, and decorations line the roads, as flags are used with us to welcome a distinguished visitor. On the appointed day, the silver god is carried to the festival ground and placed under the shade of a tree, with spears arranged on either side for protection; while priests stand ready to receive offerings of cocoanuts, chickens and camphor. Mingled with all these ceremonies is the thought of material gain and pleasure. All manner of amusements, booths for selling and gambling devices are well patronized. It was among all these enormous crowds of benighted people that the Tamal missionaries, evangelists, teachers and Bible women came to hold open air services to tell the gospel story. Even the little children from the Mission Orphanage had a part in these services. Many of the listeners bought Gospels and returned to their own villages, some near and some far, perhaps never again to hear the Message of Life.

Women Physicians for Siam

Three members of the teaching force of the Harriet M. House School for Girls at Bangkok, Siam, have gone this last year to Manila, Philippine Islands, to take up the study of medicine and nursing, two of them to fit themselves to become the first women physicians in Siam, and the third to become a trained nurse. One of the young women medical students is the sister of a graduate of Harvard University, who is soon to return to Siam as a civil engineer. The other is the daughter of the Attorney-General of Siam. They go to Manila at their own expense and have very ambitious plans.

A Siamese Giver

Towkay Sam, a Siamese Christian at Wai Neo, Siam, has, on his own initiative, planted an orchard, the produce of which is to be used entirely for the support of Christian work at Wai Neo. He had already given a chapel.

Parodies of Christian Methods

"One cannot fail to notice how distinctly Confucianists seek to parody divine things," Mr. Darlington of the China Inland Mission at Wanhsien, Szechuan, writes: "Especially is this so with regard to our hymns of praise. In the Buddhist temple adjoining our house, a Confucian school was opened and the boys were daily taught to sing 'Kong tsi (Confucius) loves me, this I know,' to the time of our sacred little children's hymn. Our methods of evangelism are being copied in like manner. The Buddhists are now printing tracts on the moral virtues of their leader, and posting these in conspicuous places about the city.

"A large temple has been opened in the city and numbers of priests from other parts have come along to conduct a forward movement. They are endeavoring to produce a revival of the Three Religions of China, and already thousands of people have gone along to take part in these idolatrous rites; and now the city is being systematically worked by women devotees, who visit from house to house, and by their godless and superstitious ministry beguile unwary souls. When you consider that to counteract this movement we have only two foreign ladies and one Biblewoman who can give any measure of their time to the work of visiting in this city with its 240,000 inhabitants, it surely is a call to great searching of heart on the part of some at home." —China's Millions.

China's Confidence in America

"Four years ago a company of Chinese men came into my study," says Rev. Edward H. Smith, of the American Board, "and spread out a document in Chinese, and said, "This is a deed. We have for generations in our mountains a Buddhist monastery. We now want your missionary society to take over this endowed monastery property to support in our village a Christian school, as we have driven out the monks.' Probably this is the only one of the 4,500 American schools that is supported by the endowment of a Buddhist monastery! For the last two decades God has been bringing China and America together. The admiration and love that the Chinese people —from the highest official to the lowest coolie—feel toward the people of America are expressed in a great number of ways. The Chinese governor of our district is paying subsidies out of his own private funds for some of our schools just as an expression of the confidence the Chinese have come to feel for America. We must make the most of this opportunity to link closer the white and yellow races. There is no other basis for world federation or the brotherhood of mankind than the teachings of the blessed Book.

News From the Field

Indiana's Achievement—An Appreciation

At the annual meeting of the Board of Trustees of Ashland College in June, 1917, The present Endowment Campaign was launched. Suffice it to say that the movement was launched with considerable fear and trembling. Every member of the Board fully appreciated the size of the undertaking and knew that the Board had proposed for itself a task difficult of accomplishment. It was also recognized that the war was on and that manifold appeals would be made by the government and various educational and moral agencies. To some the time appeared altogether unpropitious if not unpatriotic for an undertaking of this character. To others the time seemed more opportune than ever. After the mort careful consideration the movement was launched. Before the meeting of the Board a few persons had reached the conclusion that the success of the movement depended very much if not wholly upon the person called to conduct it. The Board was quite unanimous in the conclusion that the present solicitor was the logical man to call to the task. Brother Beachler had at the time under consideration a call to the Secretaryship of the Laymen's Missionary Movement in the State of Iowa. The present call was presented to him together with the pledge of support of the Board of Trustees and was finally accepted. The movement was formally launched during the General Conference of 1917.

A number of reasons indicated that the beginning of the campaign should be made in Indiana. The results already announced by the Secretary show that no mistake was made. While the canvass is not wholly completed in the State the figures show that the State has already gone considerably 'over the top'. In the light of the conclusions there can be no question whatever concerning the loyalty of the Brethren of Indiana to the institutions of the church. Their splendid achievement gives to the cause of Brethrenism a brighter future than many persons had been anticipating. During the past year or two the statement has been frequently heard and doubtless more frequently made that the Brethren church had no future. At a time like ours when the larger bodies were pooling their interests and when doctrinal standards and practices were everywhere minimized what hope could there be for a body of believers as small as ours? But if the achievement in Indiana proves anything at all it does prove that to the members of the Church Brethrenism does enshrine a truth that we dare not yield and for whose support and extension we must give and give more liberally than we have been accustomed. Is it saying too much to say that with the achievement of Indiana not only has a new standard of giving been set in the church but a new day opens out before us. Indiana's loyalty to the principles and practices of the Brethren church is unquestioned, and one of the goals of the Four-Year Programme has been reached. Let the example of Indiana be followed by the entire brotherhood and a new day has come for the church.

It is a pleasant duty as President of the College and writing for the Board of Trustees of the College to express our appreciation of the results reached in Indiana. At the next meeting of the Board of Trustees formal notice will be taken of the contribution, and some worthy expression of appreciation communicated to the proper persons. The income from the amount contributed to date will suffice at present to cover the cost of an instructor in the College. If all our Conferences meet the pace set by Indiana a new day will open for Ashland College. Hitherto we have been handicapped by lack of resources. Standards have been proposed that we have been unable to reach because our resources would not permit. Our present equipment is not adequate to the work we are attempting to do. Because of the willingness of the Instructors to remain here at lower salaries than could be secured elsewhere and because of the most economical conduct of the institution we have been able to meet our expenses from year to year. Despite the fact that the current year is a most severe one the report to be offered to the Board at the next annual meeting is one in which we can take pardonable pride. At this moment a number of the larger religious bodies are conducting Emergency Campaigns for funds to enable their educational institutions to meet deficits that have accrued the past year or two. There will be no need of such campaign among us. It is to be hoped that our people will appreciate this fact and be the more ready to follow the example set by Indiana. If the several Conferences of the church will follow the example set by Indiana, and they dare not do less, Ashland College will be placed upon a surer foundation than ever before and will be in good position to claim a place among the more pretentious educational institutions of a denominational character in this country.

W. D. FURRY, President.

Portis, Kansas

At our last council meeting which was held the last Tuesday in March the church voted to give the pastor leave of absence for ten days or two weeks that he might give a few services to a little nucleus of Brethren in Graham county, near Hill City, Kansas.

The following Tuesday we took our leave and started a brief fight against the foe in the aforesaid field. The people were hungry for the Word and good crowds greeted us each evening. We remained with them for twelve services. This was a very brief meeting, but God blessed us us in making us instrumental in bringing six precious souls into his fold. To him be all the glory. A number of these will come to Portis for baptism soon, and the others will affiliate themselves with the Methodist people. This field should be taken for the Brethren. The outlook is good.

With the coming of fall we are closing our labors with the Portis people, having served them for five years. In these years the work has made a wondeful growth. A spirit of unity and peace prevails and I bespeak for my successor even greter success in making the work reach out into broader fields of usefulness.

The church is on the look-out for a new pastor with S. H. Brumbaugh, Portis, Kansas, as chairman of the ministerial committee.

This will leave the writer open to consider any other field among our Brethren who find themselves shepherdless. May the good Lord put his hand upon us and lead us to that field, where we can be of greatest service to him. May the blessings of God continue to be upon us all.

A. E. WHITTED.

La Verne, California

Another spiritual feast has been ours and no one who knows not Dr. Lyon can know how great a feast. For two weeks Dr. E. P. Lyon, of Pasadena, a converted Hebrew, has been with us and such soul-stirring, forceful and yet simply told messages on the old infallible Book he has brought, a premillenialist, a deep thinker, a "stand-patter" on the Bible, are some things which characterize him.

He was assisted by his wife, a preacher, too, who gave addresses to girls and women and recited some beautiful poems, and his son, Donald, who plays the violin feelingly.

The Church of the Brethren invited us to join them in a Sunday evening service in their church so their membership might hear Dr. Lyon too. Needless to say we accepted this unusual invitation. A convincing sermon was given on "The Second Coming of Our Lord." We are happy over five new members—three being converts.

Now for the Sunday school! Our average attendance for the first quarter this year has been 122 with the average collection at $4.89. The banner attendance was 152. Last year's first quarter shows 109 for the average attendance and $2.53 for the average collection. The Sunday school goals set at our New Year's meeting for this year were average attendance of 120 with fifteen won for Christ. Five of that fifteen were won the first quarter. A very interesting Easter program was given and the Foreign Missionary offering was around $115.00.

Our dear Brother Percy Thomas, one of our soloists, leaves this week for camp, being drafted. The Intermediate S. C. E., is planning a farewell for him. May God bless and guard the boys all over the denomination who must go. Our prayers shall surely follow Percy.

A live C. E. rally of the San Gabriel Valley Union was held at our church last Sunday. The conferences were interesting and instructive.

A brand new year book containing all things of interest about the church, its officers, faith, aims, etc., is in the hands of each member. We find it a very handy thing to have.

We are happy in his service. May it be so with us all.

Opening of An Italian Mission

707 Jordan Street, Allentown, Pa.

Many readers of the Evangelist are aware that we came to Allentown intending to open an Italian mission. Upon coming here, I saw immediately that it would be difficult to open a work among the Italians. However, I immediately made the acquaintance of a few leading members of the colony.

Later I taught English in the home of one Angelino. This brought me into touch with still other Italians. But the men began to work nights and our class was discontinued almost a year ago. Since then I have made only occasional visits to the colony. At last I almost concluded that it would be impossible to open the work to which I felt led.

The acquaintance with one man in the colony deserves speciali meition. The man is Prof. John Di Meglio, who in Italy was a magician of ability bordering on the Keller and Thurston type here. Since coming to America, Prof. Di Meglio has been obliged to discontinue his art because unable to speak English. At the present time he teaches music among the Italians and is employed in the Bethlehem Steel Works.

But the chief thing about Di Meglio is that he is a protestant (evangelico) and was so in Italy. When I first met him he expressed his desire that a work be opened among his people here.

After several talks about this work from time to time, I at last went to him a few weeks ago and said that I had come to Allentown to help the Italians and that I must have a place in which to open the work. A few days later he told of a room in the most conscipuous part of the colony. Soon I had it rented and immediately put up bulletins in Italian and English to the effect that a Sunday school (Scuola Domenicale) would be opened at 3 p. m., the following Sunday, or April 21st.

Meanwhile I printed mottoes and scripture verses in both languages, and otherwise prepared the room. I then mimeographed several copies of the Sunday school lesson in Italian and English.

When Sunday, April 21st came, I was all prepared, but lo! it was pouring down rain. Nevertheless five of our church people and I went to open the new Sunday school at 3 p. m. To our great surprise we had twenty-six children and four (4) adults for our opening. 30 in all.

This beginning is no evidence of the success that is to attend our efforts, but it certainly shows the willingness of the Italians to be helped. But whether the beginning be small or great, the Italians are un-evangelized and should have the gospel.

The hope of evangelizing them lies largely in the children. Faithfulness and time alone will bring results. I remember the opening of the Italian Methodist mission at Altoona in 1904. I visited it in 1909 and found it to consist largely of children, but when I was there in 1917, I found a nice body of loyal young men and women. They are the wee boys and girls of 1904. The Methodists have faithfully cared for them spiritually all these years and they are now strongly indoctrinated in that faith.

In 1900 the Church of the Brethren raised over $25,000 for the relief of the children of Western India when the famine was on. In a year or two they began to gather in those children and today they are loyal young men and women, just as thoroughly Dunker as any in America. It has taken time and patience to get this following, but this is ever the story of missions.

We cannot expect Rio Cuarto, Argentina to fully come to its own until the small children of 1909—(when Yoders went down there), become young men and women.

So it has been my prayer that the Brethren church may some day have a generation of Italians thoroughly indoctrinated in the Whole Gospel truth.

The Italian work will require some study and preparation on account of the prevalence of Socialism among that people. Almost every Italian working-man to whom I have spoken in Allentown is a Socialist and scarcely believes in a revealed Word of God. Now we must start somewhere with these men, and this will mean prayer and thought.

For the present, no financial aid is asked in this work, since the Lord has laid it upon our hearts to make a sacrifice in testing it out.

But one thing we do humbly ask of you: YOUR PRAYERS FOR THE UN-EVANGELIZED ITALIANS OF ALLENTOWN.

ARTHUR L. DELOZIER.

Waynesboro, Pennsylvania

The work at Waynesboro has not been reported very frequently but it is moving along harmoniously and is making progress. The month of March saw four added to the church by baptism at the regular services. These were the first accessions for the year 1918. The total additions for 1917 were 36. All but ten of these were added by the two splendid revivals by Brethren Jennings and C. E. Kolb. But so many were lost by removal that the net gain in resident members for the year was only 8. Many of those moving away have gone to Baltimore where there are now enough Brethren to form the nucleus of a Brethren church in the city.

All of the auxiliaries of the church are doing good work. The S. S. C. E. has a live Mission Study Class with eleven members, and has recently added quite a number of new members to the society. They are working hard for the Banner position and will probably reach it. The Sunday school and Christian Endeavor both lack a few points of the front line position but have not yet given up the attempt to win their respective goals before the end of the conference year. The choir is working faithfully and is a great help to the regular worship and are geatly appeciated in the special pograms.

The Easter offering was over 50c. per member in the church offering alone without the Sunday school, and the S. S. C. E. and some organized classes which took memberships in the F. M. S. All of the missionary goals will be reached as will also goal 12 for the superannuated ministers. We feel sure of goals 2, 3, and 4, and 16, but will have some hard work to reach 1, 6 and 9. Just now we are looking forward to the visit of Brother Beachler at whose coming we will do our best with the College Endowment.

The church very kindly voted the pastor a raise in salary at its last meeting. This came unsolicited and is very much appreciated.

M. A. WITTER.

To the Md. and Va. District

The date for the Conference has already been given, May 28, 29, 30. The program has been placed in the hands of the printer.

The program alone will not make a good Conference, but with the presence and loyal support of all conected therewith and every church in the district represented, we hope for a profitable meeting at Mt. Olive, Va. From what Brother W. S. Crick has revealed through correspondence, he and his people are planning definite things for the success of the Conference, so let every church have at least one delegate, so that a little haven of the Four-Year Program will be taken to every lump.

As to Railroad Connections. All persons coming via N. & W. will leave the train at PORT REPUBLIC where they will be met by the committee to be transported to the church, 4 miles distant. The trains at Port Republic are due as follows:—South Bound, 5:00 A. M. and 12:30 P. M. North Bound, 4:45 P. M. and 10:25 P. M. All persons coming over the B. & O. and Southern will leave trains at Harrisonburg and take the C.-W East Bound to MONTEVIDEO where they will be met by the Committee and transported to the church, 2 miles distant. These trains leave Harrisonburg at 10:00 A. M. and 3:40 P. M.

E. M. RIDDLE,
Linwood, Md. Secretary.

Fort Scott, Kansas

Sometime has passed since there has been a report from Fort Scott. However, I am glad to say we are not sleeping, but going forward in the Master's service. Recently we had the privilege of having Brother and Sister Jennings with us for a short series of Evangelistic services. Though many things were against us, yet we feel a great victory was won.

First, we had no time to prepare for the meetings. Brother Jennings was to have given this time to Falls City, but as the Fort Scott Brethren have had no special services for several years, and there seemed no one else whom we could secure in the near future, they kindly consented to let him come here and they do without the special meetings, (Is not that brotherly love?) We thank them for it. I received a letter saying, "Next Tuesday Brother Jennings will be with you to begin the services." We tried to plan and advertise as best possible.

Second, the town was full of whooping-cough, mumps, measles and a number of cases of small pox, so those who did not have sickness in the family were afraid to go away for fear of "catching something." On their arrival I had one measles patient in my home and before they left both children had the measles, so I had to miss some of the meetings and was able to do only a litle visiting. When they left, we felt the work had just begun and could they have remained two weeks more I believe we would have reaped a great harvest. However, as a result nine were baptized and added to the church; three being the heads of families and two went to other churcehs. On Wednesday evening over thirty of our members reconsecrated their lives to the Master and his service and the church. This we count a great victory.

Our Sunday school and S. S. C. E. are doing good work. Sister Jennings organized the Sisterhood of Mary and Martha with 15 members. Also we soon hope to organize the C. E. and do our part in fulfilling the Four-Year Programme. "Not by might nor by power but by my Spirit, saith the Lord."

Pray that we may be lead by his spirit in all things. Yours for Service,

MRS. M. C. WEBB.

To the Churches of Indiana

The following is a list of the Brethren churches of Indiana as reported to the last General Conference and their State Missionary apportionments:

Burlington	36 00

Poplar Grove
New Highland

Seven churches given here without apportionments are churches that did not report at all to Conference last year. One church reported but did not give their membership at all. Eight churches did not report their membership at all and some of those that did report did not report much more than half the members they really have.

We have a very, very poor way of getting statistical reports and I am sure that these reports do not properly represent us. They are too low as a rule.

Giving statistics is a sacred thing and should be so considered by those who have the authority to give them. This year to reach the goal of our Four-Year Programme it becomes necessary that each church pays 30c per member for State Missions.

I take it for granted that you have already paid your Foreign Mission apportionments. If you have not you should do so at once.

We must add 30 per cent to our membership and I am sure that we can if we have accurate reports. I do not mean to say that none of these reports are accurate. I certainly think some are—but I can assure you that I have sufficient reasons for saying what I do not like to say, and what perhaps no one else would say, but unless these reports are made more full and more accurate we will not have the 30,000 reported in 1920.

Brethren, the State Mission Funds are exhausted and the Missionaries are not paid. Seven months of the Conference year are gone and but a very few churches have paid.

Can you not help us at once?

J. C. KIMMEL, Sec'y of M. B.

Nappanee, Indiana

It was hard to leave the kind Conemaugh, Pennsylvania people after nearly five years of earnest, hard effort together as pastor and people. But the best of ties must be broken while here on earth, but thank God never broken in HEAVEN. They bade us good-bye with a token of thier love and esteem. A purse was given to us of large proportions, which delighted our hearts. This was only one of the many things that were done to cheer our lives the last few days of our ministry with them. I only pray that Brother Smith may lead this good, kind, thoroughly indoctrinated church on to higher ground. They deserve the best that it is possible for him to give to them. Their church is a beauty, and praise God, nearly paid for. And they are more alive to every interest of the church general, every year. Just take note for instance what they did at the Christmas time for Kentucky. First place, if you please in the whole brotherhood. I am truly proud of you, dear people of the Conemaugh church, and may God ever keep and bless you in all your efforts.

On October 1st, we came to our present location, and are earnestly engaged in the Master's business. A royal reception was given us by the church. All the other 10 churches were represented either by pastor or some layman. It was truly a heartfelt welcome that was given us. And now after six months upon the field we are able to give a report that is encouraging. Seventeen have been added to the church by baptism, letter, relation and reconsecration. Four of the number were converts of Brother P. J. Jennings at Union, Salem and Gravelton. It was my privilege to baptize seven from our own meeting held a few weeks ago in the First church here in town. We had expected to hold our revival in February, but were hindered on the account of the coal situation; so we had to hold the meeting the last two weeks of March and the first week of April. And if Satan has anything else that he could throw in the way to hinder us I would like to know what it could be. Yet eleven were brave enough to confess their blessed Lord, and strive to live for him in the midst of such great stress and strain as we are passing through today. God hasten the day when this shall all cease, and Christ may be crowned LORD OF ALL in deed and truth. We have recently changed our gallery in the church so as to accommodate our increasing crowds. Especially this was needful for our Sunday evening services. The Alexander Mack class, which I have the blessed privilege of teaching, went to work with vim and vigor collected the money, paid the bills, and then turned over a goodly sum toward our little church indebtedness. Say this is surely some class with 106 men enrolled, and if we keep up the attendance as it has been for the past 6 months we will average more than 60 for the conference year.

Our prayer meeting is a wonderful place of blessing. One hundred sixty-seven has been our highest mark reached, while one very, very stormy night last fall we had 49 present. But because of the severity of the storm the pastor was surprised to find any one present at all.

Our S. S. C. E., Sisterhood, Christian Endeavor societies, both Senior and Junior, and the Sunday school are doing great work. Not one lagging in any sense whatever. We lack but one point in the work of our Four-Year Program. And now we are after that one with all our might. We not only expect to bring up this one, but WE WILL DO IT FOR HIM, JESUS, OUR BLESSED SAVIOUR.

Trusting in him for strength we look forward to the accomplishment of great things for him, and the advancement of his kingdom in this part of his vineyard.

We beg an interest in the prayers of the entire brotherhood, that in these last days, perilous days, that we may be found true and faithful unto his coming.

L. O. HUBBARD.

Roanoke, Virginia

The Sunday school cause has been making good progress in the Maryland and Virginia district. But I am sorry to say that all the schools have not reported yet.

I have sent out requests, and plead for reports, that we may know where we are, and have something encouraging for district conference, (May 28th and 30th).

Will those who have not reported as yet please report at once? Those schools who have reported, if you have gained any points in the standard since reporting please advise me of that gain.

Let EVERY school be represented by delegates at the Conference. May we make this Conference a great "Rally Day" for all workers in our district, that we may get hold of our opportunities and hold to them until the challenge of our "Four-Year Program" grips us as never before.

MY LAST VISIT TO "CAMP CRANE"

As you perhaps know, we have in Allentown the Ambulance Corps for the U. S. Army. Our camp was recently named "Camp Crane." I have made frequent visits there "looking up" our boys who come from Brethren homes all the way to the Pacific coast. Recently, however, a new motive took me to camp and I had an afternoon that was both interesting and instructive.

Several days ago our papers announced that a number of Mexicans, Indians and half-breeds had come in, and that most of them spoke only Spanish.

Arriving in camp, I met a soldier and asked: "Where are the Mexicans and Indians located?" Going to the barracks as he directed, I soon saw the dark-skinned men of whom I had heard. After listening to their Spanish awhile, I approached and said :"Yo tambien habloe espanol," I was soon getting almost all the practice I wanted.

My attention was soon drawn to a man who spoke broken English and put in lots of oaths for "good measure." When I had spoken a few words to him in Spanish he asked my nationality. I told him I could speak Italian, French and Spanish. "Si'io sono Italiano." We immediately abandoned the tongue of Cervantes for that of Dante. He invited me into the barracks where we talked for more than an hour. The Indians stood on one side and I heard one remark to another: "They are talking 'Italiano." I looked over at one of them and asked: "Do you speak English? (Habla Ud. Ingles?) He answered in the negative with a lazy shake of the head. I added: "You will soon learn it here." My Italian friend said: "No! tiene cabeza dura." (He is too dumb, literally "he has a hard head"), and the Indian grunted a sort of "Si."

By this time a big stout fellow had arisen from a cot and was standing near us. He asked in English: "Are you Spanish?" I told him I was not, but that I could speak it. He said: "I can speak German and Danish." "Jawohl," I said, "Ich kann ein wenig deutsch sprechen." "Yes boy," said he, "but I am too loyal to the stars and stripes to speak the —oath —language."

I left those barracks in time to join a little group of Italians who were conversing under a tree,—soldiers too. They were complaining about discrimination against them because they couldn't speak English, and later one of them told me that he could scarcely speak a word of it. Just then about seventy-five Italians, fresh from Philadelphia and still in civilian clothes, marched by.

Soon a cultured looking man came up, and in excellent Italian asked: "Did you see that lawyer with whom we were speaking a moment ago?" The man at my side answered "No." "Well, the interpreter is looking for him. He has been put to work with pick and shovel and we are going to protest."

Finally all were gone but one man and myself. I asked if he had enlisted and he answered in complaining tones: "No. Where the capitalists send us, we must go. Too many people, and the world's population must be reduced."

Then I bade him "a rivederci," and added that I would try to call on him and the other Italians soon again. He said: "Gran Piacere"(great pleasure), and I walked away asking myself the question most seriously: "What can be done for these Italians and the Mexicans, etc?"

That question is still ringing in my ears and I am praying for an answer.

ARTHUR L. DELOZIER.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

With the editor's permission I will try to finish my letter of last week.

First,—permit me to mention some more names. They belond to the same list referred to in my last. I refer to members who have accepted positions here and who have not failed to identify themselves with the interests of the church in Washington. All who thus show a personal interest in the "Brethren" cause here, add encouragement to our efforts, and we certainly appreciate it more than we can tell. Now you are waiting for the other names. I begin with Ohio. Some of you know that I have a "warm spot" for Ohio for different reasons. One reason is my pastoral relations in that state for nearly five years. Growing out of that relationship one of our children decided to reside permanently in the Buckeye State. And so we take pleasure in naming additions from that dear old state. The name next in order represents another addition from Brother Bell's congregation, of Dayton, Miss Elsie Miller. We appreciate her faithfulness very much. Next, it is with pleasure, too, that I record the name of Miss Rae Bellis, a late arrival from New Jersey, representing the Sergeantsville congregation, where, a few years ago, it was my pleasure to hold a pastorate upwards of three years, during which time Miss Bellis was received into the church. She is now holding a good position under Civil Service and is located within a few steps of our church. Right here let me throw out a little hint to any who may think of coming to D. C. Please do as Miss Bellis did. She made a "bee line" to the parsonage, and Brother Lyon seems to succeed each time in getting folks "hard-by" the church home. I only regret that so few have given me a chance. The great majority of our people have located seemingly without making the church the first consideration in locating.

And now I come with another name, better still, and these from New Jersey, too, and they sound "mighty good," to the pastor, and you will understand it all of course when I tell you that one of them happens to be my daughter, Mrs. Porte. She was "caught away" from us for awhile, but we can forgive her now, since she is returning to her native city plus a husband, who is also a member of the Brethren church and who has accepted a position in the Agricultural department. In this particular case, if you will excuse the personal element, I might add that the loan made to New Jersey looks quite good to the pastor in D. C., a case of getting back the principal with compound interest. (I guess the husband will forgive me for counting him as interest—at any rate he surely was interested.)

And now I must name another contribution to the work. This time it happens to be from the "Hoosier" state." He arrived in December, his church letter following a few days later. I got him located within two doors of the church, his name, Dallas B. Dillon, from the Church of the Brethren. It is with sadness now that I state that he is now in the Garfield Hospital of this city, and dangerously ill, however, we rejoice to say that we entertain hope of recovery from the latest report on his condition.

Next, we are pleased to report the name of Brother T. L. Stultz, of Virginia. I think he comes from Brother Shaver's congregation, and seems to manifest great interest in the work. I wish also to mention the return of Brother Newcomer and wife from Hagerstown, Maryland, after an absence from this city for several years. Brother Newcomer has agreed to look after the interests of the church in connection with the extension of the Brethren Evangelist, and reports steady progress in that direction.

We rejoice that, in the good providence of God, we are able to report the addition of so many who are thus giving evidence of devotion such as we have been praying for, for years. Let me again request that you all continue to pray that God may touch many other hearts, and thus lead to still greater encouragement—to his work in this representative city. Again I find that my letter is long enough. I will likely mention other names in the near future, unless the readers of the B. E. would prefer to omit personal mention.

Possibly I should mention one other matter. The papers have spread far and wide throughout the country the report that to find lodging in Washington at this time is almost a physical impossibility. Let me say that it is quite difficult to rent houses, but by very special effort rooms may still be rented, here and there, over the city. For families that may anticipate coming, it is, in most cases, actually necessary to buy a property in order to get a place to live.

I shall be glad to help locate any more of our people who may decide to come, if they will but give me word to that effect.

News from Morrill, Kansas

Thirty-eight years ago this spring the writer became a resident of this beautiful and prosperous little city. About 20 years of his earthly pilgrimage has been spent here. About 15 of these years were spent in pastoral church relationship when in 1883 the unhappy division in the then German Baptist church occurred, he had the honor of organizing the first Brethren church of what is now known as the Kanemorado Conference district, embracing four states. About 60 members of the German Baptist church took the more progressive attitude and thus became the first congregation in this district.

This church, just now, is without a regular pastor. The writer, being here on a visit, has agreed by request, to supply his former pulpit relationship until a regular pastor can be secured.

This kind reception and call fills his heart, not with vanity; but with courage, joy and gladness. Coming, as it does, from his old time friends and parishioners.

Now, ye idle Brethren pastors, if you are willing to preach and to live the old time gospel as handed down to our age by the ancient Prophets, Christ and his Apostles, here is an open door, and worthy opportunity for you. Here is a band of Brethren who will do the right thing by you if faithfulness is practiced on your part.

To the Missionary Prayer Band Leaders of Maryland and Virginia

The first direct report from our African missionaries,—The Gribble party—has been mailed to the Prayer Band Leaders (Managers) according to the best information we have. If any mistakes have been made, in the mailing list, please advise me and I will correct the same before the next report is sent.

It is hoped that all the Prayer Bands of this district will be called together, to hear this excellent report, and make it the basis of much prayer and thanksgiving, to God for his manifested leadership, over this party of our own number.

Are We Where God Wants Us to Be?

ROMANS 12:7, 8

By Harry Toler

Being where God wants us to be is certainly one of the most important subjects that can engage our attention. Especially is it important for a young Christian to start where God wants him to start and to be where God wants him to be. Of one thing I am certain—He wants the young Christian to be a soul winner.

To operate a railroad it is necessary to have section men, tower men, car repairers, machinists, firemen, brakemen etc. And so with God's work. He has to have ministers, evangelists, singers, Sunday school teachers, and so on. Each one of us has a personality of his own and God has a place for each one of us. It seems to me that one of the main things in a Christian worker's life is to be natural. If we try to imitate some one else, we are not ourselves; we are just an imitation.

If we should start down the railroad track and meet a man driving spikes and who was dressed as a conductor, with white collar and shined shoes we would immediately know that there was something wrong with him. Say, brother, let us get into the place God wants us to be and then our work will be a success. No two faces are alike and no two persons have the same modes of expression, and an imitator is a laughing-stock for the audience. I remember going to a vaudeville performance before I was converted, and saw a fellow trying to imitate a colored man. He resembled neither a Negro nor a white man; he looked like something a school child had tried to draw when in about the third term in school.

The soul winner should realize the true value of a soul. If I should go to work for a produce firm and did not know the price of the articles bought and sold I would not get very far. Before I could take a position as a traveling salesman I would have to learn the prices of the articles I was to sell. Brother, sister, what did this salvation which we are going out to offer, cost God? John 3: 16. "For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

A salesman should know the value of the articles he sells to the prospective purchasers. The soul winner should know the value of the gospel to the prospective convert, and should be able to persuade the sinner of his great need of this wonderful salvation and arouse in him a desire to have it. Brother, what is this salvation worth to you? What is it worth to me? What is it worth to this sin-cursed world?

"What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul? Or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?"

A dying Christian mother did not say, "Take good care of the bank account;" or "Look well after the farm;" but "Bring up the children in the fear of the Lord, and meet me in heaven." This salvation which we preach is the greatest thing in this life and in the life to come.

Time After Time

Two boys stood close behind a number of workmen busily engaged in constructing a building. "That seems like nice work," said one to the other, observingly, as he watched a mechanic, with well-aimed blows force, nail after nail into place.

"Yes, I should like to be a carpenter, but I could never have the patience to hit the same nail so many times," answered the other boy.

midway, and smiled. "You would never do

The workman paused, his hammer lifted for a mechanic, then, he said, "since it is only repeated effort that brings good results."

This is true along any line of work you may pursue. The art of accomplishing a task skillfully is not learned in a day, but often represents years of steadfast toil. This ought not to discourage us, however, but rather to increase our desire to succeed. It is true that "no great thing was ever lightly won."

A boy who, early in life, sets about his work, whatever it may be, in earnest, is likely to accomplish wonderful results.

"That son of yours is a born farmer," remarked one man, approvingly, to another, as he noted the energetic manner in which the lad performed his task.

"John always does his level best at everything," was the reply.

That is really the secret of the whole matter—our level best, and stopping at nothing short of it. Lately a man who had distinguished himself in war was being entertained in a home where a bright-eyed lad sat at his feet, eagerly listening to the conversation.

"Well, my boy," said the gentleman,, "of what are you thinking?"

"Sir," was the answer, "I mean to be a great soldier like you." '

"Oh," he said, as he laid bare a hidden scar, "are you willing to pay the cost?"

Time after time are we to perform the duties assigned us. Our work may not be marked by human eye, and it may seem of minor importance, even to us; but if it in it is thrown the energy of heart, of will and of mind, some day it will count, and the one talent will have been multiplied as the great Giver intended.—Selected.

Both young people were recently students in Ashland College. Mr. Pontius, whose home is Elkhart, Ind., volunteered in a Base Hospital Corps and was recently transferred to Fort Sevier, South Carolina. Mrs. Pontius has been a student in the Local Normal School and has also engaged in teaching. These estimable young people have the best wishes of a host of friends for a happy married life. May God bless their lives of devotion and sacrifice. Ceremony by the writer. W. S. CRICK.

HERR-MILLER—At the home of the bride's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Chas. E. Miller, on February 20, 1918, Mr. Albert H. Herr and Miss Vivian F. Miller were united in marriage by the undersigned. The bride is a member of the Brethren church of Dallas Center, Iowa. The young people will live in Dallas Center. We covet for them a happy, prosperous life together. R. W. PORTE.

Our Dead

MILLER —Elizabeth A. Miller first saw the dawning of earthly light on October 7, 1841, and passed to behold the dawning of heaven's glory on March 26, 1918, aged 76 years, 5 months and 19 days.

She was married to Samuel Miller, December 22, 1864, to which union twelve children were born, nine of whom grew to maturity and eight of whom remain to revere her memory. The union was broken by the death of the husband and father in 1892.

Sister Miller was a charter member of the Gretna, Ohio Brethren church, and always one of its loyal and consistent members, her death leaving but one remaining charter member of that organization. Not only was she well and favorably known in her own church and community, but her quite regular attendance at both State and National Conferences gave her a wide acquaintance in the church at large.

"Mother Miller's" translation occurred at the home of her daughter, Mrs. Dan Mohr, at Ada, Ohio, where she had gone for a visit. The funeral services were conducted at the Miller homestead near Bellefontaine, Ohio, where the deceased spent over forty years of her earthly pilgrimage. Dean J. Allen Miller, of Ashland, who had known her for more than twenty-five years, spoke the words of comfort and exhortation to the sorrowing family and neighbors at the memorial services on March 29, 1918. Brother Miller was assisted in the service by Brother W. R. Deeter, her pastor. The body was laid to rest in the Huber cemetery, near DeGraff, Ohio, to await the resurrection of the dead and the reunion of the redeemed.

The confidence of the family, even in the midst of their sorrow, lies in the statement made by a friend in a communication of condolence that she "was a good woman and a Christian." Her example and her counsel were ever true to the precepts of her faith, and her children's children even now rise up to call her blessed. May the same God who sustained her through her long earthly pilgrimage sustain us to bear the parting for the little while until we meet at the throne.
DYOLL BELOTE.

LEWIS.—Mrs. John E. Lewis was born in Ashland county, Ohio, February 21, 1857, and died at her home near Ashland March 27th, 1918, aged 61 years, 1 month and 6 days. It was on March 27, 1856, that John E. Lewis and Mary Armstrong were married. To this union were born four daughters and six sons, all of whom are living. Brother and Sister Lewis have lived in Ashland county all their married life. Sister Lewis was a member of the Ashland Brethren church and was faithful to her trust. She was a good woman. Beloved by her neighbors and friends and the idol of her family. Patient and painstaking in all her efforts to help those she loved, ever forgetful of her own personal desires in her service for others, and by her glad and buoyant spirit ever inspiring others to nobler efforts, thus she lived among us. The services were held at the home and a very large concourse of neighbors and friends gathered to do her memory honor and to sympathize with the friends. May the Lord graciously bless all the family.
J. ALLEN MILLER.

STEELE.—Isaiah Steele went to his reward April 10, 1918, aged 61 years. He was a member of the Brethren church for many years, but held his membership with the Church of the Brethren at the time of his death. Funeral services were held in the North Liberty, Indiana Brethren church on April 13, by the undersigned.
C. C. GRISSO.

WOOD.—John M. Wood was born in Indiana on January 22nd, 1863. He moved with his parents, to Kansas in 1872, where he grew to manhood. About 12 years ago he moved with his family to Sultan, Washington, where he has resided until death, which occurred March 30, 1918, at the age of 55 years, 2 months and 8 days. He confessed Christ about 18 years ago and united with the Primitive Baptist church, in which faith he continued until the call came. He leaves behind a wife, three children and two brothers. The wife and children, and one brother were with him when the summons came, the other brother is the writer.

First Things First

Professor Drummond has written well upon "The Greatest Thing in the World." This is love. Our attention has likewise been called to "The First Thing in the World." This is faith. Paul declares that of faith, hope and love, the greatest is love. This is true. But if the greatest is love, the first is faith. Without faith there can be no love, no repentance, no obedience. For beauty or usefulness the tree may be more important than the root, but the root must be first.

These are days when men's souls are tried. Foundations are being shaken, systems abandoned, nation overthrown and crowns shattered. The scriptures speak (Heb. 12:27) of "the removing of those things that are shaken, as of things that are made, that those things which cannot be shaken may remain." There has never been a time when there was greater need to dwell upon "The Primacy of Faith." Our churches are on trial. Our religion is on trial. Not before the world only, but before the bar of our own hearts. To see our boys march away to war, willing to give up their lives that the blunders of kings who have been fired by the demon of destructiveness might be overthrown, requires great faith in the eternal fitness of things. Evidently, it is no time for the men of our churches to lose their heads. It is a time when, Good-Samaritan-like, every one should be helping to make it easy for the boy at the front as well as for the mother at home. The temptation to "pass by on the other side" is as foreign to our religion now as it was when the Son of Man rebuked the self-righteous priest. We can open our hearts, and with them our purses and say, "Take care of him; and wahtsoever thou spendest more, when I come again, I will repay thee."

A great writer has said, "As we rise above the animal nature, with its instincts and appetites, to a higher plane of being, faith is the basis of all excellence. In the earliest dawn of intellectual existence what inspires and rules the child? Faith. It trusts before it reasons, and would trust evermore were it not cruelly assailed by falehood and deceit, shattering its beautiful and simple faith and compelling doubt and distrust at every step. So far is it from being true that faith is an arbitrary thing, when God asks men to believe, to come to him in full assurance of faith, he is simply seeking to restore them to the primitive integrity of their nature. Faith is the substance, the foundation, that which upholds the dignity of individual life, the order and security of the social structure and civil government. What would man be were his power to believe annihilated? Without a brute's infallible instincts, with senses much feebler and less acute than belong to the inferior animals, shut up within the narrow domain of sensations, man would necessarily degenerate into the lowest barbarism. His power to rise depends upon his power to believe. Faith unlocks to him the experience of the past, the stores of human knowledge and wisdom, put him in fellowship with the invisible and real, and pour into his soul the inspirations of history, philosophy and religion."

Over against this sound teaching, place the "assured results" of the Germanized college professor who sits in his easy-chair and doubts everything and sneers at faith. What has such ever accomplished? He is "fooling with religion." Faith is the bed-rock of the government's stability. Business enterprises go to wreck and ruin when men lose faith in their fellow-man. The banks will have to close their doors when the faith of the people disappears. Faith is universal; faith is mighty. "But without faith it is impossible to please him: for he that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him." (Heb. 11:6). "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved, and thy house." (Acts 16:31). "For if ye believe not that I am he, ye shall die in your sins." (John 8:24) .

God does not trifle with man. As he approaches the kingdom of grace, he seems to say, "None but those who are honest, and have the utmost confidence in the sacrifice of the cross to save them from their sins can ever enter here. If you do not wish to believe in me and my plan to redeem the world from sin, go your way and take the consequences." Faith rests upon testimony. God has given us testimony enough—enough to move the mightiest intellects toward God—and now holds a sinful world accountable for a lack of faith in his Son. Of course, scriptural faith has its moral and personal elements. It is not a mere head acceptance of the truth. "With the HEART man believeth unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation." A man's sins may make him blind and deaf to testimony. I read to him a page of English history and say, "Do you believe this?" "Yes," he says without the least hesitancy. Why does he accept it so readily? Because it does not make any difference to him whether it is true or false. I read to him a chapter in the life of Christ, and say, "Do you believe that?" And he replies, "I am not sure that I do." Why does he hesitate here? Because if he accepts it as true, he must change his life. He must become a different man. He must quit certain habits and leave certain companions. So he begins to assert control over his faith. He discounts evidence and refuses to give it full power. And so the heart steps in to dictate to reason. Moral issues are involved. He does not care to square his life to harmonize with his better self, and he says I am not convinced. And here is the very trouble with a great deal of faith today. It is barren, it is dead, it is the faith that even the demons in the pit possess, and yet they are demons. "Thou believest that there is one God; thou doest well; the devils also believe, and tremble." (Jas. 2:19). The demons go one step beyond some men: they believe, and shudder; while some men only believe. But the shuddering does not save the demons. The same writer fixes the difficulty: "For as the body without the spirit is dead, so faith without works is dead also." The faith that saves is an active faith. It lives and moves and a man in sympathy with it arises to do. The faith of Noah was such that he "moved with fear," and prepared an ark. Faith is faith when it moves men.

The Grace of God

It is said of a noted English preacher of several centuries ago that upon an occasion when he beheld a load of prisoners who had been condemned to death on their way to the place of execution said: "There goes myself, but for the grace of God."

This was a very humble way for this great preached to express his full dependence upon God for his saving power and to state his conviction that apart from this power of God to save all men are guilty before the throne and worthy of death. In the light of this interpretation of the doctrine of the grace of God all Christians may truthfully say what the old preacher said. But as many cruelties have been practised by those who claimed to be acting according to the WILL of God, so even now there are those who mis-interpret the grace of God. Because they want to do a certain thing and because they know their acts are not approved by mankind in general they seek justification for their course in life by asserting that it is the grace of God

Our attention has recently been called to a statement by the Kaiser in which he says: "I represent monarchy by the grace of God." To a people who are simple minded and childlike in their intelligence such a statement coming from the lips of their ruler may seem like sacred words; but to others who have tasted of liberty and have learned differently in the school of experience such a statement seems either blasphemous or an expression of the supremest egotism.

It is not difficult for us to believe that the Kaiser represents monarchy by the SUFFERANCE of God, but for us to admit that it is by the GRACE of God is an altogether different matter. And as it is in the case of the Kaiser we are fearful there are a good many people who mistake the sufferance of God for the grace of God. This is not because God himself does not make the distinction clear, but because of the egotism of the one who thinks that God could scarcely manage the universe without his willing assistance. The grace of God may account for all the good that comes to us, but it is the sufferance of God that allows men of evil minds and of cruel acts to continue in their lives of evil and wickedness; but even then they must all face the judgment seat and give account for the deeds done in the body.

The Price of a Meal

There is a tendency among people to complain about every advance in the cost of anything when they must buy and an accompanying tendency to rejoice over an advance in the price of anything they have to sell. Of course this is true to human nature and it may be something that no amount of argument or persuasion can overcome, but nevertheless there are a few facts connected with the question under discussion that can not be gainsaid.

Those of us who occasionally eat a meal in a hotel or restaurant have noted with some degree of uneasiness the gradually decreasing of the quantity of the dishes served as well as the advance in the price of the same. There is that natural tendency to lay the blame for the advance in the price on the other fellow entirely and to take none of it to ourselves. It is true that few hotel keepers and restaurant proprietors are conducting their institutions as a work of charity any more than the day laborer or the professional man or the farmer engages in his work for charity's sweet sake, but not all institutions that are trying to feed a portion of the American people are to be classed as "profiteers" even though they have been compelled to advance their charges.

One of the problems that has been confronting the colleges and universities of America the last few years has been that of feeding the students that come to them at a price the students are able to pay. A student would not be a natural born American if he did not "kick" at the board he gets in dormitory and hall, but there are a few facts that should be impressed upon his mind early in life, and one of these is that while he is not responsible for his coming into the world he is responsible for the manner in which he uses the opportunities the world has to offer him since his coming, and another is that the world "owes him very little" until he has contributed something to its welfare and has thus put it under obligation to him. The world, especially the educational world, is contributing to his welfare constantly more than he can possibly return to it unless he shall devote his life to active work in behalf of mankind.

It has recently been stated that the Yale dining-hall has run $50,000 behind in the past few years, and that Harvard and Princeton are also in the same condition. Somebody besides the students or their parents is paying for the meals supplied these students, but we dare say that fact is very little appreciated by the student body or by the parents of the same. All students in attendance at our colleges and their parents as well are under great obligation to others who make it possible for them to receive their higher education. The members of the Brethren church should appreciate the fact that Brethren people who are not sending children to college are making it possible for other Brethren to educate their children in a college owned and controlled by the church of their own faith. We think by the time Brother Beachler concludes his campaign for the permanent endowment of Ashland College our brotherhood will have a pretty general knowledge of this fact and we hope they will come to appreciate it and will come to realize that the principle involved in the advance of the price of a meal is the same principle that has to do with every phase of life, even in the matter of the increase in the cost of education.

The Patriotic Brewer

It may be wrong to even intimate that such a being exists for we have our doubts about such a possibility, and yet we would not be too sweeping in our accusations, and it may be possible that a man can be loyal to his government according to accepted standards and yet fatten upon the misery and poverty his business causes. However the possibility must be exceedingly remote and the evidences are rather against it.

On every hand we are told that "food will win the war." As a consequence we have a right to expect that every loyal supporter of the government will do all in his power to conserve the foodstuffs of America. Without saying anything about the great waste of sugar and grain in the manufacture of beer as these supplies may be purchased in the open market we are still convinced that the brewers of America are unpatriotic.

The state of Oregon is one of the great hop-growing states of the country and many acres of valuable and fertile land are devoted to hop culture. The call for increased food production has inspired many of the owners of the hop ranches in Oregon to devote their land to better purposes, especially to the growing of grain; but they are under contract to grow hops for the great breweries of America, and these brewers, especially the German brewers of New York refuse to release the contracts which the hop-growers have asked them to do. If the Oregon hop-growers were to do as the government of these German brewers does they would regard these contracts as "mere scraps of paper" and would thus end the matter. But the American people are not built that way. The American ideal is to keep the provisions of a contract even though their keeping involves bankruptcy, but since the state has the power to seize whatever it needs to successfully carry on the war for democracy we would like to see it seize these contracts held by the brewers of New York and declare them void and thus give the people of Oregon an opportunity to convert their rich acres to better purposes than that of growing hops.

The American government was exceedingly patient in its dealing with Germany before the severing of diplomatic relations, and it has been mercilessly criticized for such patience, but now that America is in the war we fail to understand why it is so patient with enemy aliens that are not only located in our country but who are also giving all the aid they can to the enemy. In such a class the German brewers who insist on making their beer regardless of the consequences may be classed.

Doctrinal Preaching

There is no need to state that the tendency of the modern pulpit is away from preaching doctrine. It is also very apparent that the church nominally does not possess the stability, conviction and firmness that once characterized her work. The drift of religious modernism is to popularize her message and to make it please the natural mind. This has led to topical preaching: The discussion of events and subjects that will catch the world's ear. Today as a result we have a misplaced Bible in our pulpits and homes, and there is gross ignorance concerning its teaching.

The Bible is a doctrinal book—The Mosaic religion was founded upon doctrines, which were continually rehearsed and kept fresh before the mind in the daily duties: The sanctuary worship and social relations.

The church of Jesus Christ was founded and established upon certain great doctrines presented by Christ and affirmed by his disciples: These doctrines are inseparable from his church and to depart from them, means departure from Christ.

Back to the Bible

Back to the Bible was the call of the founder of our denomination and to this we owe our existence today. No preacher, or layman can be loyal to the principles of the Brethren church that does not stand for the Bible in its entirety as the message of God. BACK TO THE BIBLE is the call that should be sounding from every Brethren pulpit in the land, in calling men from the shams, fads, theories and fancies of a drifting age. Man needs to know God and his plan; they need to know Jesus Christ and his salvation; They need to have the question of their soul answered as to life, death, the future. The Bible alone is the book that answers.

The Brethren Church

The existence of the Brethren church depends upon her faithfulness in declaring the doctrines of Christ. We are a DOCTRINAL CHURCH and if we are to propagate ourselves it must be done through doctrinal preaching. Eliminate doctrinal preaching from our pulpits for twenty years and there will be no Brethren church.

What is the Matter with Some of You?

As the director of this department of our FOUR YEAR PROGRAM; I am surprised to learn through reports that some of our churches are not reaching the goal on the sermons we have announced. For this, I can see no excuse. The deity of Christ and his resurrection from the dead are two of the most vital things to Christianity: Dismiss these and you have a "Made in Germany Christ." A religion with no salvation. We have the right to expect that every pastor of our denomination preach on the subjects announced who is loyal to our cause.

The Place of Prayer

Prayer is the SOUL BREATHING—Exhaling self and inhaling God. To not breathe means death. Prayer is GOD'S GREAT WIRELESS and every redeemed man is a wireless station and operator. By prayer we can communicate to all parts of earth and connect with God's throne. PRAYER IS A LIVEWIRE TO GOD'S GREAT POWER HOUSE, that moves men and the world Godward. A prayerless church member is a spiritual corpse—A prayerless church is a slumber room for the Devil.

Rebuild Your Altars

Make God's house, "THE HOUSE OF PRAYER." Make your prayer meeting service a meeting place with God: Rebuild the FAMILY ALTAR in your home and make your house a dwelling place for God. Raise your children to honor God, to love his word, to know how to pray. Pastors preach this everlastingly and make the prayer service the best service of the church.

A Departure

This may be called so by some; but I desire to add one new item to my work as Spiritual Director and that is, to honor God with your money. I know of nothing that will quicken a man or a woman's interest in God's cause more than to invest their money in his work. Giving is just as much an act of worship as praying. No man can expect spiritual blessings from God that withholds support to his cause. A religion that does not reach the pocketbook will never save a soul. Giving is both an act of worship and a source of blessing.

The Tithe

Before the law the tithe was considered holy unto God. The tithe was incorporated in the law by Moses and demanded. In Malachi, God speaks of being robbed in the withholding of the tithe. Because of the dispensation of Grace, are we expected to do less than under the law? The most spiritual men and women I have ever met have been tithers and I have yet to find one who has honestly tithed, but has testified to the blessing God has given. The miserly Jew tithes—The polluted Mormon tithes—the deluded Seventh Day Adventist tithes; Can it be we think less of our religion than they? TEST GOD'S PROMISE "Bring ye all the tithes into the storehouse of God and PROVE ME now herewith, saith the Lord of hosts, if I WILL NOT OPEN THE WINDOWS OF HEAVEN, AND POUR YOU OUT A BLESSING, THAT THERE WILL NOT BE ROOM ENOUGH TO RECEIVE."

W. S. BELL.

Put Your Giving on a Regular, Proportionate Basis

For many a year the question of raising church funds has been mulling along, discussed with no very vital enthusiasm and allowed to sink into oblivion except in times of temporary crisis.

Then came 1914 and the Gerat War. People gave more than they ever dreamed they could; they kept on giving not only money but lives and time and service. And out of the travail that it cost has emerged a new idea, or rather a revival of a century old theory of Christian stewardship.

On every hand one hears the call to give in some worthy cause. It may be war work, it may be some missionary enterprise, but in any case the motive is unselfish, the object the bettering of some unfortunate state of affairs. More and more people are feeling not, "How much shall I give of my money?" but, "How little of the Lord's money which I have in trust for him need I use for personal wants, and how much can I divert to the Lord's uses?"

That is stewardship. Never was there a time in the world's history when people were more ready to carry it out, with hearts softened by war's great calamity, and spirits tuned to the real verities in life.

Today marks the churches' opportunity to reach the hearts of men, but no work is possible without funds to back it. Seeing its opportunity, therefore, the church is faced with the two-fold problem of first inaugurating a general stewardship movement to increase giving, and then of wisely administering those funds.

Present methods have proved their inefficiency. Systematic habits of proportionate giving are the solution for lax church finances and for lax principles of giving on the part of the individual member.

Not confined to any one denomination, this movement is taking in all denominations with varying rapidity. We find it incorporated in such enterprises as the Men and Missions Movement, the Five Year Program, and more recently the Million Dollar Campaign of the Northern Baptist Convention, the Southern Presbyterian Stewardship Campaign, the Methodist Centennial Campaign for Eighty Million Dollars and others of like import.

The Laymen's Missionary Movement is planning to emphasize this year the principles and need for the practice of Christian Stewardship. A special committee has made a thorough investigation and report on the whole question, and there is general agreement that the time is ripe for this special emphasis. From the committee's report this statement of principles is taken: :

1—God is the owner of all things.

2—Man is a steward and must account for all that is entrusted to him.

3—God's ownership and man's stewardship ought to be acknowledged.

4—This acknowledgement involves the setting apart, for the extension of the Kingdom of Christ, of such a definite portion of income as is recognized by the individual to be the will of the divine owner.

Christian Patriotism

BY PROF. L. L. GARBER

"Be just and fear not:
Let all the ends thou aim'st at, by thy country's Thy God's, and truth's; then if thou fall'st, O Cromwell,
Thou fallest a blessed martyr."

Of this man of that, it is sometimes said, "He is too good a Christian to be a good patriot." Such a statement may seem a contradiction, yet it has not always been without substantial truth. Men are sometimes pained at what they see done under the name of patriotism, and after the spirit of Madame Rowland might exclaim, "O patriotism, how many crimes are committed in thy name?" Patriotism is, in fact, a flexible notion, varying in content and nobleness and worthfulness of sentiment all the way from the highest expressions of devotion to a great cause down to the narrow and selfish egotism embalmed in Johnson's famous saying, "Patriotism is the last refuge of scoundreds."

Patriotism is new with every age. This stream of sentiment from which heroes of every time have drawn inspiration, is constantly changing its character, adding new elements, fertilizing ampler fields of human endeavor, and extending its influence to more varied and diversified interests. In the past, its dominant note has been narrowness and exclusiveness: "We are the chosen people; the other are Gentiles." "We are the superior race; the rest are Barbarians." In that elder day to be a Roman was greater than a king." Thus patriotism embodied and expressed exclusiveness, racial prejudice, and narrow nationalism, and hence was provincial, sectional, racial, rather than democratic, cosmopolitan, universal, and Christian.

In Washington's time, patriotism emphasized the "rights of man." For this idea the "embattled farmers stood and fired the shot heard round the world." For this the Revolutionary Fathers wrote, fought, and gave themselves. This patriotic sentiment has been a great moving idea for more than a century and is working a transformation in the government of the world by democratizing peoples and nations.

A generaton after Washington, patriotism emphasized intellectual freedom. For Emerson it meant culture and distinction of mind: the right to think untrammeled by custom or tradition or precedent; the right to express one's self to be free intellectually as well as politically,—sentiments which pervade the famous address, "The American Scholar." This aspect of patriotism, the strength of the contention for freedom of speech and of the press, is aptly suggested in a statement from that stout defender of all forms of liberty, John Milton; "Give me liberty to know, to utter, and to argue freely, according to conscience, above all liberties."

During the Civil War period, patriotism signified to the soldiers of Grant and Lee, loyal devotion to theories of government. Echoing up and down the continent, were the words of Webster, "Liberty and union, now and forever, one and inseparable." In harmony these are President Jackson's famous toast, "The Federal Union; It must be preserved;; and Lincoln's immortal words, "Government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from the earth." Similarly, Longfellow has beautifully expressed this sentiment in,—

Thus too, sail on, O ship of State!
Sail on, O Union, strong and great,
Humanity with all its fears,
With all the hopes of future years,
Is hanging breathless on thy fate!

To the great business leaders of the last generation, patriotism meant industrial greatness; the conquest and conversion of nature and her resources to the uses of man. This passion, as the others, has not been without a distinct and valuable contribution to human welfare. It has bound the nations together in a unity of steam and steel, broke down national barriers, helped to dispel national prejudice and to create a unity of humanity which is a strong influence toward bringing into being the coming republic of common sense.

A decade ago, reaching into the present, patriotism took the form of a reaction against a selfish individualism. It demanded the curbing of individual ambition and the consideration of the social welfare. It demanded justice, fairness, and sympathy in the exercise of power and in the use of wealth. It demanded fair and equal opportunity for women, for the child, for the unattached and unorganized man. Out of this sentiment were born those numerous movements looking toward the amelioration of the hard and distressing conditions of life by providing better homes, better wages and working conditions, and a more useful and more widely extended and democratic education.

While the patriotism of the past was not often positively anti-Christian, and usually contained a major element of the spirit of Christianity, it yet lacked that broad and universal sympathy which Christianity demands. It emphasized, too, chiefly the rights of men and of states. Christian patriotism while not neglecting the rights of men and nations, will stress individual and national duties. In the heat of this diviner patriotism the narrow and self-centered nationalism as well as the individualism of the past will be consumed. Christian patriotism, which is just now receiving an immense impulse as an outgrowth of the present great war, will know no nation as a supreme and absolute sovereign, no race as a superior race, no rights and privileges incompatible with the common brotherhood of humanity and with the spirit of Jesus and the gospel of Love. The spirit of such a patriotism is well embodied in a short poem by James Russel Lowell, entitled,

"The Fatherland"

Where is the true man's fatherland?
Is it where he by chance is born?
Doth not the yearning spirit scorn
In such scant borders to be spanned?
Oh yes! his fatherland must be
As the blue heaven wide and free!

Is it alone where freedom is,
Where God is God and man is man?
Doth he not claim a broader span
For the soul's love of home than this?
Oh yes! This fatherland must be
As the blue heaven wide and free?

Where'er a human heart doth wear
Joy's myrtle wreath or sorrow's gyves,
Where'er a human spirit strives
After a life more true and fair
There is the true man's birthplace grand,
Here is a world-wide fatherland!

Where'er a single heart doth pine,
Where'er one man may help another,—
Thank God for such a birthright, brother,—
That spot of earth is thine and mine!
There is the true man's birthplace grand,
His is a world-wide fatherland!

The Red Cross Spirit

"Get the work done; never mind who gets the credit." That is the spirit in which the American Red Cross work is being done in France, according to the testimony of observers who recently have returned to this country from "Over there," and it speaks volumes for the cause in which the organization is enlisted. The same spirit, it may be said in all truth, animates the directing organization over here, and it should be the spirit in connection with the work of every chapter and every auxiliary.

Addressing the members of the Red Cross family at national headquarters, just after his return from France, George W. Simmons, of St. Louis, manager of the Southwestern Division, declared that the organization in France is the greatest aggregation of high grade men possible to be gotten together. "No amount of money," declared Mr. Simmons, "could induce men of that class to come together and do the kind of work they are putting through. They take the job, no matter what it is, and, most characteristic of all they do, they care not who does it. All are working for one great end; just one happy family."

Undoubtedly it is just this "happy family" idea that accounts for much of the wonderful success that has attended the Red Cross work in Europe since the United States entered the war. Without the esprit du corps which has impressed itself on all who have been brought in contact with the organization through tours of inspection and otherwise, the efforts to relieve the suffering in France would have been little better than a conglomeration of well-intentioned blundering instead of the record of achievement that has called forth the praise of generals and statesmen far and wide.

Leaders, of course, there must be in any great undertaking. This war, especially, has demonstrated that even the most popularized democracies must concentrate unusual powers in the hands of their leaders; but it is demonstrating as well that the leader who directs his energies with thought of the credit he is to get out of it, who lets personal ambition enter the equation with the good of the cause, is mighty short-lived. Fortunately the Red Cross leadership has been of the sort that has inspired good fellowship and co-operation all along the line. And that tells the story of success.

There is a positive lesson in this for all the Red Cross units that go to make up the great whole. Let the spirit of France—the spirit that has taken hold of the American Red Cross organization that is in France—be infused throughout all the branches and all the chapters over here. Then the work so gloriously begun will be still grander, and there will be glory in the completed work for every Red Cross member. There will be pride in the realization that it is "Your Red Cross."

A Call to Prayer for Mother's Day, May 12

The time has come when Mothers' Day should mean something more than a beautiful sentiment. We, who in the past, have worn the white flower in memory of the mothers who are no longer with us, should, today, think of the mothers all over the world who are wearing the red flower of courage, and are bravely giving their sons "that democracy may not perish from the earth."

If the mothers of the world were gathered together on this Mothers' Day, the dark skinned mother of India would not understand the speech of the French or English or American mothers, but their hearts would be united in the same prayer that their boys might bravely fight, and come home with honor. May we not ask of God on this Mothers' Day that he will grant the mothers Spartan hearts, that they may with high courage stand behind the men who are fighting for freedom and the sanctity of the home?

The mother of yesterday was a woman who loved her Bible and knew how to pray; a man with a praying mother carries ever with him an invisible shield which will protect him in the hour of temptation and stand as a wall between him and cowardice. The mother of today should leave her children the same heritage. These are the days when the thrilling Old Testament stories should be told to little children, so that they may realize that the hand of God is over men in the hour of battle. There is no holier altar in the world than a mother's knee. Prayers learned on that altar will never fade from the mind or soul. On this Mothers' Day may we not hope that the mothers of America will determine to make prayer a vital part of their lives and the lives of their children?

The National Women's Prayer Battalion is an organization formed for the purpose of calling the nation to prayer. It came into being as a result of a visit which the founder, the Reverend Eva Ryerson Ludgate, paid to England. The English women who had suffered unspeakably told her that prayer had been an unfailing source of comfort to them, and she determined to band together, for prayer and comfort, the women of her own country who had men in war service. That the organization is meeting a vital need is proven by the fact that there are now thousands of women who have signed the Covenant card and have pledged themselves to daily prayer.

The Prayer Battalion gives the minister a point of contact with the woman outside of the church, who has a service flag in her window, as well as with the woman of his own congregation. It makes the service flag a real emblem of prayerful service, and it is hoped that there will soon be a Prayer Battalion in every church in the United States.

A Call for Prayer and Conference on Behalf of Russia's Millions

To the Lord's People Everywhere:

The revolution in Russia has resulted in throwing open to the Gospel the largest country, with its largest population of white people in the world. There are 182,000,000 people in Russia, and yet there are not as many Evangelical workers there as in the city of Chicago alone. Many are eagerly waiting for the Gospel. When recently one of the leaders of the "Dom Evangelia" Mission in Petrograd, immediately after returning from Siberia, went with his choir and workers to the large Square directly in front of the Winter Palace, and conducted for the first time in the existence of that city an open air Gospel Service, large numbers of men and women assembled. After the Message was delivered the people turned to the preacher and said: "Where have you been so long? and why did you not tell us this before?" "I was in Siberia," was the reply.

Never since the beginning of Christianity has such an immense population of our own white people become accessible to Missionary Enterprise. Our Evangelization plan must embrace not only the hundred million native Russians, but also the seven million Jews, the twenty million Poles, the thirty million Ukranians, millions of Mohammedans (Tartars, Kurds, Kirghiz, etc) Armenians, Roumanians and Greeks, besides these the Bulgarians, Servians, Croations, Montenegrins and other related Slavonic peoples.

The propaganda of Atheism and Materialism is already assuming awful proportions. There is no time to lose. The Greek Orthodox church is rapidly losing its grip upon the hearts of the people, and before long large masses of simple religiously inclined Russians may be led astray into complete infidelity. Millions of the people are looking for something different. What is it to be? Atheism, or the Gospel? If the latter, then, because of existing conditions in Europe, AMERICA MUST ASSUME CHIEF RESPONSIBILITY for meeting the need, else this greatest Missionary Opportunity of the Centuries may be turned into the most abysmal failure.

The greatest immediaate need is the printing and circulating of at least a million copies of the New Testament and a large supply of the very best Russian Evangelical Literature. Then several hundred Evangelists, Colporteurs and Christian Workers must be trained and equipped for service in Russia. Already one hundred Russians in America have offered themselves for soul-saving service in their native land and are now in training, and there are also hundreds of converted and educated men in Russia who have suffered for their faith and who now need to be rallied and encouraged.

As a very vital factor in the realization of a comprehensive Evangelization plan for Russia we must immediately undertake the thorough Evangelization of the Russian and other Slavonic people in our own country and Canada, in order that they in great numbers, being converted and trained here, may return to their native lands fully equipped for effective service. Last but not least the united prayers of God's people everywhere must be offered up in behalf of these long neglected multitudes.

We feel that the time has now come for the assembling of Evangelical Leaders and those whose hearts are moved, for a general meeting of prayer and conference. God seems to be leading very definitely in this direction. Accordingly we, the undersigned, send out this invitation to all who are stirred by the Spirit of God to assemble for the First General Conference in Behalf of the Evangelization of Russia to be held from June 24th to June 28th in the City of Chicago, at the Moody Tabernacle, corner North Avenue and N. Clark Street.

A Choir of about fifty students from the Russian Bible Institute of Philadelphia are expected to be present to sing their beautiful Russian hymns during Conference week. Russian speaking and other Slavonic Evangelists and Missionary Workers of the Chicago Tract Society will also give their aid.

Ministers and friends who find it impossible to attend, but who are moved to have some part in this work, are urged to arrange special prayer service during the Conference week, and all Evangelical Ministers are requested to preach special Missionary Sermons on "Russian Mission Sunday," June 23rd. Material of interest in connection with the Evangelization of Russia, will be sent to Ministers, Sunday School Superintendents and Bible Class Leaders upon application.

Any friends unable to attend, but whose hearts are stirred to take some financial part in this work, can send their gifts to Mr. A. M. Johnson, (President of the National Life Insurance Co., of the U. S. A.) the Treasurer of the Conference, 29 S. La Salle St., Chicago, Illinois.

All inquiries and communications regarding the Conference should be addressed to Rev. Jesse W. Brooks, (Superintendent of the Chicago Tract Society) Chairman Conference Executive Committee, 440 S. Dearborn St., Chicago, Illinois.

Among the well known Evangelical Leaders who have signed this Manifesto calling the Conference are the following:

Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, Moderator of the Presbyterian General Assembly; Rev. W. H. Griffith-Thomas, Toronto, Canada; Rev. C. I. Scofield, Philadelphia, Editor, Scofield Reference Bible; Rev. Francis E. Clark, President World's Christian Endeavor Union, Boston; Rev. Cortland Myers, Pastor Tremont Temple, Boston, and many others.

Curious Ways of Doing Business. The Story of an Old-Time Doctor

Dr. David Little, of Hampstead, cognizant of the fact that Lemuel Coomb's trip to the Grank Banks had been a failure, thinking to help him, at the close of the month sent in his bill for one dollar for professional services in attending the birth of a son which had arrived while Coombs was at the Banks. It was a way that the doctor had of helping those who needed assistance, and the possibility that one might take offence never occurred to the good doctor. Coombs, decidedly poor and absurdly proud, was furious.

"Blame your old pelt, doctor!" roared Coombs the following morning, chancing to meet the doctor in front of the general store and post-offiffice. "So you think that boy o' mine is worth just about a dollar, eh? If you wasn't on the shady side o' sixty, I'd give you a thrashin'."

"Never mind the sixty years," thundered the doctor, jumping out of his buggy and throwing off his coat; "we'll have it out right here."

The crowd gathered, but Coombs backed away. Two very good reasons probably caused him to think better of his threat—the fact of the doctor's years and the recollection that the doctor was exceedingly lively with his fists before a punching bag- exercise which the doctor kept up year after year. The crowd jeered Coombs; and, as the doctor put his coat on once more, he was questioned as to the cause of the flare-up.

"No use talking 'bout a fool," growled the doctor, whipping up his horse.

A young physician, fresh from the medical school, presently came to Hampstead, and hung out his shingle. Coombs was the first to summon him. The following evening he took occasion to express his opinion of the young doctor.

"Likely chap, this Dr. Parker," he said, addressing the usual group of loungers at the store. "Right up to date. Has new ideas that are worth something."

"Drives a smart hoss," vouchsafed Leander Kemp, looking up from the stick he had been whittling. "Guess he'll get round to the sick folks a bit faster'n Doc Little, but maybe the sick folks won't get out an' round quite so lively."

"We've had him," said Coombs with considerable deliberation, "and I'm thinkin' that he's just as smart as his hoss."

'Sickness up to your house? questioned Kemp.

"Well, not exactly sickness, but wife has had headaches; so I called Dr. Parker."

"Mm!" commented Kemp, "better try him out on smallpox or appendickcitus."

Everything connected with the young doctor was calculated to attract attention—his big brass sign, his elaborate office, his somewhat loud city clothes, and his fast-stepping horse. He was the exact opposite of Dr. Little. The latter well along in years, wore a shaggy beard which was rarely trimmed. His clothes were inclined to be shabby. His trousers were always bagged at the knees. It was no uncommon sight to see him driving along the country roads in his shirt-sleeves. Timothy Landers delighted to tell of the time when the old doctor came post-haste, not only in his shirt-sleeves, but wearing a ragged and badly soiled pair of overalls. He laughed when he pictured the doctor; but he choked up when he related the story of the doctor's all-night battle with death, a battle which the doctor won, a battle that gave back to Landers his only boy.

There were those who followed Coomb's lead, those who seemed to forget Dr. Little's long life of service. Forgotten apparently were the numerous times when the old doctor had struggled with the grim visitor and kept him at bay. It was to be expected, of course. Dr. Little realized that he was growing old. He admitted to himself that the old must give place to the new, but somehow it hurt him just the same.

There being but the two physicians in Hampstead, in direct ratio to the new doctor's increase of patients so diminished Dr. Little's practice. Inside of three months from the coming of Dr. Parker Dr. Little was obliged to draw upon his slender bank-account in order to meet current expenses. It was not a pleasant thing for a man of his years to do.

The lines deepened and multiplied about the old doctor's eyes, and there were those of the stamp of Kemp who noted the fact. Kemp got a sliver in his finger, and promptly presented himself at Dr. Little's office.

"Huh!" growled the doctor, twitching out the offending bit of wood; "next time get your wife to take it out with a needle."

Kemp handed the doctor a dollar, and the old man flew into a rage. No charity for him! He saw through it all, and the next instant he gripped Kemp's hand; and Kemp, looking up, found himself unable to speak when he noted the doctor's quivering chin.

Dr. Parker called his colleague over the telephone one evening. "Dr. Little, Lemuel Coomb's wife is pretty sick," he said, getting connection. "Of course I can handle the case all right, but you know it's the custom of us city doctors to call in another physician for consultation when a case is really serious."

"I'll come!" snapped Dr. Little shortly, hanging up the receiver.

The whole situation was patent to the old doctor in an instant. Dr. Parker, unable to cope with the case, had called him to share the failure; but that did not cause him to hesitate. He had known Coombs from boyhood, and realized that the loss of his wife would be a terrible blow to him. In less than five minutes he was on his way. A quarter of an hour later he arrived.

A hasty examination, three or four terse questions put to Coombs, who stood wringing his hands at the foot of the bed, and the old doctor knew that the grim reaper was near at hand—unless—the doctor paused and ran his fingers through his shaggy beard; he looked at the sick woman, and then his eyes sought Coombs—unless a city surgeon, a great doctor whom he knew by reputation, could be brought there that night.

"When Dr. Parker comes, tell him that I'll return about two o'clock in the morning," he said, addressing Coombs. "I have an important case which will keep me until then."

At eight o'clock, half an hour later, he was at the station, had put up his horse at a neighboring barn, and was awaiting the night train for the city fifty miles distant. There, pacing the platform, he figured the whole matter out. He knew the great surgeon's fee—five hundred dollars; knew that Coombs could not settle for it, probably never would be able to settle for it; but he knew that the great doctor would return with him to Hampstead, for the five hundred dollars would be paid in advance.

At eleven o'clock that night the East greeted the West—Dr. Little's gnarled right hand gripped the nicely gloved hand of the great surgeon.

"You are needed in Hampstead tonight," were the old doctor's first words. "The train leaves at twelve o'clock; you have not a moment to lose."

"The case?"

"Operation. I'm a doctor. I know of you by reputation. You have been very successful in similar cases."

"A doctor!

The surgeon's eyes took in the man before him, from the crown of his head to the soles of his shoes. He noted that the man was collarless, saw the ragged trousers.

"My fee is five hundred dollars, sir," he said, glancing at his watch.

The old man pulled a soiled checkbook from his pocket, and, seating himself at the table, hastily wrote out a check for the amount named.

At two o'clock that morning Dr. Little drove into Coomb's yard, and, tying his horse, led the way to the house. There he found that Dr. Parker had come and gone, leaving word that there was no necessity for him to remain, inasmuch as Dr. Little would be there presently, and he undoubtedly was perfectly capable of handling the case.

For an hour the door to the sick-room was closed to Coombs; then the surgeon softly opened it. He motioned to Coombs, but checked the latter at the threshold.

"Not now; not until daylight, young man," he whispered. "Your wife will live."

At eight o'clock that morning the great surgeon bade Coombs adieu. "I leave your wife in charge of Dr. Little, a remarkably capable physician," he said in parting

Coombs, too full for words, his frame shaken as by a mighty sob, walked silently with him to the gate.

On the way to the depot the surgeon stopped at the bank and cashed the check which the old doctor had handed him the previous evening. He noted the fact that the teller before cashing it opened a ledger and closely scrutinized the page. A picture of the fisherman's humble home flashed before him, and then the truth dawned upon him. Stepping to the desk, he picked up a deposit-slip, and, filling it in for five hundred dollars, inserted Dr. Little's name. A moment later he handed the teller the slip together with the bills which had been passed out to him less than three minutes previous.

The tide turned. A very large proportion of those who had flocked to the new doctor returned to their old physician.

"I hear thet young squirt of a doctor is goin' to quit the town, come fust o' the month, Dr. Little, remarked Kemp, meeting the physician one morning.

"Sho! That's too bad," replied the doctor.

"Not much loss to the town, I guess," laughed Kemp. "All hos an' shingle."

"That's where you wrong him, Leander," said the doctor. "I have taken note of several serious cases which he has handled, and in a general way he's done remarkably well. The town can't afford to lose him."

"That's Doc' Little all over," chuckled Kemp, pursuing his way. "Nigh ruined by thet young whipper-snapper, an' now he's praisin' him up."

Dr. Little did more than praise his colleague. He had taken notice of the fact that the young doctor had been very successful in the handling of pneumonia cases. Three days after his conversation with Kemp he had a most alarming pneumonia patient on his hands, and he promptly called Dr. Parker in consultation. The patient recovered, and Dr. Little was loud in his praise of the young doctor's knowledge.

The first of the month brought a surprising sight to the townspeople of Hampstead—a very modest shingle beneath that of Dr. Little, announcing the office of Dr. Parker. The same day brought a decided surprise to Dr. Little, the monthly statement from the bank acquainting him with the fact that he had on deposit five hundred dollars more than he had figured on.

"Something wrong here," he said, turning to the teller. "You've credited me with too much money. Deduct five hundred dollars, and make it a balance of forty dollars, and it will be correct."

"Not today, doctor," replied the teller, grinning. "There was a deposit made of five hundred dollars by the doctor who cashed that cancelled check which you have there in your hand."

"Those city doctors have a curious way o' doing business," growled the doctor, his eyes glistening. "Guess they ain't all like him, though," he added huskily.

"That's curious, too," replied the teller; "that's what he said about you."—C. E. World.

REVIEW OF

The Thought and Work of the Church

OVER THE TOP AND BEYOND. Yes, that is what we can now say about the increase circulation campaign for the Brethren Evangelist. We had set our stake at the FOUR THOUSAND mark by August first, 1918, and last week we printed 4,075 copies of the paper, something that was never done before in the history of the publication.

We went "over the top" with the aid of the Conemaugh, Pennsylvania church, L. Garvin Smith, pastor, from which we received a list of one hundred and fifteen NEW subscribers, with a check enclosed to cover the amount. This list with the number of subscribers already on the list places Conemaugh fourth in the group of churches with the largest number of subscribers, Johnstown, Waterloo and Lanark only being ahead by the narrow margin of from two to twelve subscriptions. Pennsylvania is coming right to the front in this campaign and Conemaugh is close on the heels of Johnstown, and when the time comes to take up the matter of College Endowment we predict that Conemaugh will lead Johnstown a merry race; but we say: "Go to it," for it is a worthy cause.

While we have reached the goal for the Evangelist for 1918 the battle is not yet over, and we may be forced back to our first line of defense unless still other Brethren and other churches come to our help. Because of the campaign in a number of the churches that had not yet worked out the problem we have been somewhat lenient with subscribers who have allowed their subscriptions to expire without renewing promptly. This matter can no longer be delayed and we are now carefully revising our mailing list and sending out PERSONAL notices to all delinquent subscribers. We trust every one, without a single exception, may feel inclined to renew promptly, but that is almost too much to hope for and very likely we will be compelled to drop fifty or one hundred names from the list as is done every year, for the list is constantly changing. We must call upon the pastors whose churches have not yet adopted the Budget System for the Evangelist to look after their delinquent subscribers and to urge them to renew immediaetly. If we lose any number now it will require that many more subscriptions to keep our list up to the 4,000 mark until the meeting of our General Conference. We have put our hand to the plow and we dare not turn back, we must go forward and the list MUST increase rather than diminish. Who will help? Other churches are still working on the Budget Plan and we hope to add them to the honor Roll before many weeks.

In our mails one day last week we received four letters from our missionary party to Africa. These will be published, one or two per week until all have been printed. This week we give to our readers one of the letters from Sister Myrtle Mae Snyder who tells of their trip fom Walfish Bay to Brazzaville, French Equatorial Africa. Other letters will tell of many interesting events of the trip up the coast.

From a postal card received from B. T. Burnworth we learn that the Lanark Illinois Brethren are busy building a new church. We do not know anything of the particulars, but what we do know about the Lanark Brethren is that when they do anything it is not done half-way, and we may expect to have a report of a most worthy achievement at Lanark. Considering the stressing times through which the entire country is passing it is a manifestation of no small degree of faith for any congregation to begin a worthy building program.

Brother Charles A. Bame is now busy on a farm at Onekama, Manistee County, Michigan, and will be until fall. All correspondents are notified to write him there. Through some kind of a delay the copy for the Four-Year Program page did not reach us in time for the Evangelist last week, but this week the page is occupied with suggestions for a doctrinal sermon by W. S. Bell. We hope that all upon whom Brother Bame calls for material for the Program page may respond promptly that there be no delay about the matter. This is the "biggest" thing the Brethren church has undertaken since its organization and all should co-operate to make the Program a success.

H. H. Wolford makes another brief report of the offerings received by the Board of Benevolences of the Brethren church. It is the plan now to make these reports monthly so as to keep this matter before the brotherhood in a more practical way.

J. B. Lambert calls our attention that the name of the Sunnyside, Washington Sunday school or Christian Endeavor was omitted in the report of the offerings made on Ashland College night as recently reported. Incidentally we may add that Brother Lambert is now a Bachelor of Divinity, having received that degree from Bonebrake Seminary last week. Congratulations, Brother Lambert.

J. A. McInturff gives our readers a most interesting report of the work at Goshen, Indiana since he has arrived on the field. This is a well worked field, that always responds to proper cultivation and annual harvests may be expected. Fifteen members have recently been added to the church and a number of church letters have been granted. It is a pretty good plan to keep these matters straightened out by the congregations. All the departments of the church at Goshen are active and because of their consistent activities something is always being done for the kingdom.

A. P. Reed is numbered among the most faithful church correspondents of the entire brotherhood. If other church correspondents or pastors would be as faithful in reporting the work of their local congregations there would never be any dearth of church news for the Evangelist, and incidentally Brother Reed has an occasional word of commendation for the editors and once and a while a criticism, but we like his criticisms, as they are always given with the idea to help and not to condemn or to hinder. Good work has been done in the First Brethren Church of Los Angeles by Brother Lowman who has been acting as supply pastor, but who is now engaged in a missionary evangelistic campaign at Fillmore, California.

The only suggestion we have to make to Brother Goughnour about his reports from Waterloo is that he should come to our columns more frequently so our feeble minds may not become confused in trying to comprehend all the good things that are being done in that wonderful Christian plant in Waterloo. From a church like that we should have monthly reports that other churches might catch some of the inspiration and maybe in a small way adopt some of their plans and methods of efficiency. On decision day in the Sunday school twenty-one pupils decided for Christ and the church, and at the Ashland College rally two splendid young men consecrated their lives to active Christian work. Brother Goughnour is trying to keep this church a front line church in every way and the reports of the work indicate that he is meeting with a large measure of success.

Brother A. E. Thomas who has given the entire winter to Evangelistic work, and whose work has been greatly blessed in the Brethren church has now returned to his home in South Bend, Indiana for the summer. Any church that may be looking for an evangelist for next winter may write him at this place.

The Brethren at Milledgeville, Illinois will hold their Communion service on Sunday evening, May twelfth, at seven o'clock. The Highland, Pennsylvania church will hold its services on Saturday evening, May eighteenth, and the Ashland Brethren church will hold its Communion service in the College chapel on Sunday evening, May nineteenth.

The Power of the Gospel

On one occasion the Apostle said: "I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ for it is the power of God unto salvation," but it is doubtful if even the Apostle knew the extent of that power. He may have seen in it the fulfilment of the law that had held him in its bondage all his previous life and he may have felt the liberty that was his because of the forgiveness of his own sins for which faithfulness to no law could atone; but that is the far-reaching effect of the gospel and its power to transform lives for centuries to come.

Recently a hymn-book was published in the Belgian Congo with two hundred and fifty selections and one of the strangest features of the work is that more than one half the hymns were written by the men whose fathers were cannibals near the mission station, twenty-five years before. And yet some people do not believe in missions.

Just at the present time a great deal is being said about how the church has failed and even how Christianity has failed. While the application selfish men may have made of the teachings of Christianity has not kept the world out of the great war from which all mankind is now suffering the effect and power of the gospel have been so marked in the advance or progress of civilization among primitive people that any one of common intelligence must admit that the gospel has succeeded gloriously. The one instance of its transforming power as stated in the incident related of the Belgian Congo district in Africa should be sufficient to convince the most skeptical that no false claims have been made for the power of this gospel, but while this incident is one of the most striking it is not an isolated one for in practically every heathen land where the gospel story has been told by faithful missionaries similar marvelous results have been obtained.

Neither the gospel nor Christianity has lost any of its inherent power and if any failure is to be attributed to it it is because of the misapplication on the part of men and not because of any weakness in the gospel plan of salvation for the world.

War Gardens and Christian Service

We have just seen a brief item in one of our exchanges bearing upon the matter of "war gardens" that consists of a few terse points that are as applicable to Christian service as they are to that of growing vegetables in one's back yard.

The first objective as mentioned by the contributor is: "The greatest amount of good vegetables for the least expenditure of time and money." Is there any better plan to follow than that in engaging in Christian work? While we know the whole world needs the gospel and it is the duty of the church, or of the Christian people to give it that gospel, yet as it is impossible for us to give the gospel to the whole world at once is it not good reasoning to say we should use our limited means and our limited number of laborers where we can get the greatest results from the expenditure of the men and money we have at our command?

The second statement of the writer is: "Adaptation to your special needs, and to conditions of your garden spot, such as climate, soil, shade, moisture, labor, and seeds used."

There are a great many points of similarity between these things considered in garden making and the things that pertain to profitable Christian service. All Christian service is not missionary service, it is not always the breaking up of "raw prairie." There are places in practically every community where conditions are not exactly the conditions of a wilderness, but where the seeds of Christianity that will produce the greatest crops need to be selected with care and all other conditions need to be considered in the planting. In some spiritual gardens the seed that needs to be planted is that of faith. It would be folly to plant the seed of world-wide missions in a field that is poverty stricken in its faith in the atoning Savior, but when once the soil has been prepared by growing a good and abundant crop of faith in Jesus Christ as the Son of God and as the only hope of salvation, then there may be a rotation of crops and the seed of world-evangelism planted with some prospect of receiving a crop.

The third thing to be remembered in gardening is: "Your experience in gardening, and just what you desire to grow. Remember that what you don't know about gardening, possibly your neighbor does." A good many people undertake to do Christian work along lines in which they have had no previous experience and without consulting with others who have been engaged in similar service and then, when their labors are not successful, lay the blame at the door of Christianity when the blame rests upon themselves and their lack of knowledge of the needs of the occasion or of the proper plan to pursue to meet those needs.

The closing paragraph of the item is a most appropriate one and contains a truth that should be pondered well by any one who desires to engage in any kind of Christian service. This paragraph is: "The more you learn about gardening, the stronger becomes the desire to plant and tend a garden. Intimate knowledge of vegetables and flowers also inspires a greater love for them, and when they become an object of affection they are quite sure to receive the care and attention they so richly deserve." Is it not equally true that the more one learns about Christian works and the more intimate one becomes with the results of a careful planting and a careful cultivating of the seed of the gospel the more interested one becomes in active service for the Master? Some of these things we learn by doing and the reason we do not love them is because we have not done them.

The Armour of God

The more the world finds it necessary to invest in armaments of steel and concrete as a means of defense against the attack of hostile neighbors the more are we made to feel that the whole worldly system of government is wrong, and that what the world needs more than anything else at this very moment is the defense that is entirely of God, a faith in him and in his sovereignity that will give strength to all who will acknowledge his kingship. The world today needs the "breast-plate of righteousness," it needs to have its feet shod, not with shoes of steel and iron, but with the sandals of the "gospel of peace," and it needs to be armed with the "sword of the spirit." This is what the world needs, but since it does not have these things in any exceedingly marked degree it may be that God is using the very "wrath of man to praise him" in the great conflict, and that out of this struggle will come a sincere desire upon the part of the nations to take God at his word and to depend more upon his care than upon the strength of armies and navies for protection.

It is claimed for the Word of God that it is "sharper than any two-edged sword," and with this quality it should prove a mighty means of defense as well as a means of attack which should succeed in pulling down strongholds which the world has built up. The most successful missionaries to heathen lands have ever found the power of the Word a means of safety and defense. One of the mot striking instances is that related of a missionary to Africa who lived among a suspicious and hostile people. On one occasion one of the natives attacked the missionary's black servant, cutting open the boy's head . The missionary was told that the natives were coming up to kill him and all that were in his house. He went down unarmed to see them. His very boldness impressed them. He talked with them, pointed out that he had never done anything but good to any of them. He washed the wounds of the man who had attacked his servant. He proved to the people that he loved them and was willing to serve them. They had never seen anything like this before. They became his friends, listened to his message, and he won them through the Word, that is, through practising what the Word teaches, and in this he proved that this Word is powerful, "to the pulling down of strongholds." May God speed the day when all the nations of the earth will come to recognize this power and place their trust in God and depend upon his armour as a means of defense. This the whole world needs including that portion we call civilized as well as the heathen world.

Missionary Personals

Rev. John Van Ess, of Busrah, Persian Gulf, is in New York on deputation work for the Foreign Mission Board of the Reformed church. The British Government of Mesopotamia has ordered 2,000 additional copies of the grammar which Mr. Van Ess prepared, and he has been asked to prepare a second volume for the use of more advanced students.

Miss Mary L. Matthews, an American Board missionary at Monastir, has remained at her post while shells and bullets have rained down upon her dwelling. With much difficulty her friends persuaded her to make a visit to Salonica for rest and change.

Major-General N. Hibiki, Mr. K. Yamamoto and Mr. M. Masutomi constitute the first deuptation of the Japanese Y. M. C. A. to the Allied Armies. They have spent a month visiting army cantonments in America.

Dr. K. Kato, secretary for Japanese students in North America, has traveled 7,000 miles and addressed 11,000 persons, principally students and educators, with the purpose of informing the Japanese public of educational conditions in the United States. He has also given many religious addresses.

Secretary Daniels has appointed a Christian Scientist as a chaplain in the navy, with a temporary assignment at the Boston Navy Yard. Two Christian Science chaplains have been appointed in the army. Why not give the soldiers and sailors "absent treatment"?

Mr. A. Edward Kelsey, of the Friends' Mission at Ramallah has gone to Palestine with the Red Cross and Syrian Relief Expedition at the special invitation of the American Consul in Jerusalem. ?

The Ven. T. S. Sing, Archdeacon of Chekiang, has recently been elected assistant Bishop of that diocese. This is a C. M. S. mission and is the first of the eleven dioceses of the church in China to elect a Chinese to the Episcopate.

Miss Julia N. Crosby, of the Doremus School in Japan, has been decorated by the Emperor. Miss Crosby has devoted forty-six years of her life, with the exception of brief furloughs to America, to educational work for Japanese girls.

Rev. E. C. Cronk, D.D., a returned missionary of the Southern Lutheran church, and secretary of the Foreign Board, has been appointed General Secretary of the National Committee of the Layman's Missionary Movement, with headquarters at Richmond, Va.

Chinese Moslems to President Wilson

The Chinese Moslems of Peking wrote to President Wilson on the subject of the war and the part China had in it, and after the usual Oriental felicitations expressed themselves as follows: "Very frequently the Chinese Republic is glad to follow the example of your noble government, so if you will give the word we will follow, and if you are patient we will continue to be patient. We do not ask anything from you save the favor of using your influence to quench the fires of war in the world. But as for the present condition of China, the hearts of the rulers are divided, so that there is constant change, and no permanent responsibility. How is it possible for a country in this condition to declare war upon another country? We therefore turn to you and hope that you will ararnge and give us good advice for the future affairs of our republic, in order that prosperity and safety and peace may come to us speedily."

Y. M. C. A. Growth in China

The twenty-eight city Young Men's Christian Associations in China have 18,000 members, 6,000 in schools, 7,200 in Bible classes, with an operating expense of $350,000 Mex. The Associations have been responsible for adding five hundred members to the various city churches. The usefulness and popularity of the Association has necessitated a plan of enlargement which is to establish about fifty model Associations in important centers and help them to secure an adequate equipment, with a staff of trained Chinese secretaries, and to develop complete local management and self-support. There are now 146 Chinese secretaries in the City Asosciations, while 300 would not be too many for immediate requirements, and a thousand will be needed within the next ten years.

The recent four weeks' "drive" in the Young Men's Christian Association at Shanghai, China, resulted in the acquisition of 1,025 new members and fees to the amount of $13,853. Mr. Soong Han-chang, manager of the Bank of China, won the first prize for having obtained the largest number of new members.

Africa After the War

Will the Dark Continent be darker or lighter as a result of the world war? In 1914 there were about 130,000,000 Africans who were still unevangelized. Among these were working some 4,500 Protestant missionaries. They were located in about 1,000 stations and had gathered Christian adherents to the number of one and a half million Africans. The 350 higher schools and colleges and 10,000 elementary schools, conducted by the missionaries, had brought under instruction over 600,000 pupils. The medical missions cared for over one million cases during one year and the leper asylums, orphanages, and other philanthropic institutions cared for many more. Plans were under way to cover the continent with a network of stations, to establish a Christian university at Cairo, stem the Moslem advance, to found model industrial institutions where most needed and to train large forces of African Christian workers. Then came the war! Since then nearly one thousand German Protestant missionaries have been obliged to discontinue their work. The German missions in Togo and Kamerun (West Africa), in German Southwest Africa (Damaraland), and in German East Africa have been turned over to Swiss, British or American missionaries, or the work is conducted by native Christians. This former German territory comprises nearly one million square miles and contains over 13,000,000 people. In other words it is equal to fifteen times the area and twice the population of New England.

What is to become of this territory after the war and what will be the fate of the German missions in the event of an Allied victory? There are those who hold that it would be a calamity ever to return the colonies to Germany, since her efficiency in colonizing means improvement of the land at the expense of the natives. She is also charged with the intention of building in Africa a military state, dividing the Continent and threatening the peaceful development of the people.

Others hold that, while the German Empire should never regain control of her colonies, it would be a great loss to Africa if German missionaries were not permitted to carry on their work. They have undoubtedly contributed largely to the industrial and educational development of Africa and have many qualities from which other missionaries may learn much. When the time for a peace settlement comes, the right of the Africans to a voice in their future should not be overlooked.

Bishop Hartzell, who has probably traveled further in Africa than any other missionary, sees a great future for Christianity in that Continent. He expresses the belief that this war means a new era for the Africans. The native Christians are rising to positions of leadership and are entering heartily and intelligently into the plans for the evangelization of the Continent. Already nearly thirty-five thousand are engaged in evangelistic and Christian educational work for their fellow Africans. These will be the future preachers and teachers of Africa—and some of them are wonderful evangelists.

The future may be counted on for three advance steps at least: (1) The development of a more adequate plan for co-operation among Christian missionaries in Africa; (2) the increase of responsibility placed on the native church; and (3) a better understanding and co-operation between Africans and Europeans in the further development and enlightenment of the Continent.

A Frown and a Smile

Such a silly little, foolish, naughty little frown—
Too small to do the slightest harm, you'd think,
Yet the naughty little frown frowned the nursery pleasure down,
And made a pleasant room as black as ink.

Nurse scolded—Jamie sighed—
Kitten ran and baby cried—
(You scarcely can believe it, but it's true)
Every smile was blotted out
With that naughty frown about—
Just think how much a little frown can do!

Such a pleasant little, happy little, jolly little smile—
Too small to do the slightest good, you'd say,
Yet that happy little smile kept the nursery all the while
As cheerful as the sunshine and as gay.

Nurse was singing like a bird—
Baby cooed and kitten purred—
(You scarcely can believe it, but it's true)
Everywhere that small smile went
It brought pleasure and content—
Just think how much a little smile can do!

Little Dog Don and the Naughty Man

Whenever grandfather picks up a paper even to this day he is very likely to turn first to the "Lost and Found" advertisements, because he has never forgotten his distress when Little Don was "lost." That was a calamity that nearly broke the little boy's heart. And if you have ever noticed it, most of the advertisements of things lost are of lost pets, and most of the pets that are said to be "lost" are simply stolen —and everybody knows it. There are too many naughty men in the world ready to steal dogs whose owners will gladly pay any money to get them back. When grandfather got to be older and had fine hunting dogs he had to keep them tied up most of the summer or else locked in the stable, because it was not safe to take them out of doors when bad men wanted to go after prairie-chickens and "such small deer."

Little Dog Don had, what Byron called in Italy, "the fatal gift of beauty." His brown body and white face and snowy chest caught the eye; and more than once passers-by tried to steal him. But no whistler could coax him to follow and no stranger with a bone could coax him to eat. Yet one night when grandfather was still a very little boy, he did go to bed crying floods of tears because Little Dog Don had disappeared and although grandfather and all of his uncles and aunts had searched every stable, barn and hen-house on the place, he was nowhere to be found. O my, that was a dreadful blow, and grandfather thought he would never be the same boy again because the world could never be the same again—unless indeed his little playmate should come back. But he did come back, and this is the way it happened.

Grandfather heard the story from some one who had heard the naughty man tell it. For the naughty man used to go by grandfather's house every day in his milk cart, and with him was almost always his little boy, a boy about as old, or as young as grandfather was then; and the little boy made himself just as sick wanting Little Dog Don so bad. The little boy's father held out as long as he could, but at last he felt so sorry for his litle son whose eyes would fill with tears every time he saw Little Dog Don, that one day, when nobody was looking, the father made a jump for Little Dog Don and holding him tight by the collar told the little chap to drive home as fast as he could, which you may be sure he did. That was the way it happened that grandfather lost Little Dog Don and went to bed sobbing because his dearly loved playmate could nowhere be found.

But it seems that Little Dog Don was more shrewd than the naughty man, because when the naughty man tried to put him in his barn Little Dog Don would none of it, but made such a fuss that the naughty man had to tie him up in the woodshed. He had it all figured out in his wise little head and knew that once in the barn with the doors locked he was in prison; but if tied in the shed, that had no door to it, he could manage somehow to get away. The naughty man tried to make friends with him but he would not have it and kept everybody at arms length. He made believe he was fierce as a lion, and growled and snapped and tore around so that they were glad to keep at a safe distance. You see he was afraid that if they got hold of him again they would put a chain on him instead of the clothes-line with which he was first tied. He knew that he could not bite a chain in two but he felt sure he could bite this bit of rope in two, and all he had to do then was to wait until everybody had gone to bed and after that he would gnaw it apart, strand by strand. O, he was a cute little dog and no mistake.

So, sure enough, by and by the naughty man and his little boy opened their bedroom window and saw that Little Dog Don was securely tied and Little Dog Don pretended to be fast asleep you may be sure. But he was looking out of the corner of his eye all the time ready for any move that might interfere with his plans.

Then when Little Dog Don saw the last candle put out and the window shut, he listened a bit, and knowing it was safe now to begin work he twisted his head around to where he could get his teeth onto the rope and he began in earnest the fight for his freedom. It must have taken him hours to bite the rope in two because the rope was very, very tough, and sized with something that made it hard and stiff as iron, you might say; still he kept at it and by and by Little Dog Don bit it clear in two and then he very quietly sneaked out of the yard and, keeping close to the fences, stopping now and then to look and listen, he at last, when at a safe distance broke into a run for his home and the home of his little playfellow grandfather.

Grandfather did not see all this of course but he saw what Little Dog Don did at other times and so he knows that his cunning little four-footed friend kept his little wet nose close to the ground following the tracks of the milk wagon. But when he came to a little river, he lost the scent. He went up on the bridge, but no wagon had passed over it that seemed like a milk wagon. So he went down again to the gravelly shore where the scent had been lost and he struck boldly out into the river. When he got on the farther side he soon found where the milk wagon had gone in and then breaking into a full gallop he was off for grandfather's house. Although it was dark he began to recognize as he passed them the places he had so often seen. Here was the house where lived a great big Collie named "Shep," and a little farther lived the little girl with a kitten which she called "Angel." Little Dog Don had chased that angel up a tree, O, lots of times. And so he knew he was getting near his own home. By and by he saw the horse-stable and then the big cow-barn and the calf-pen and the hen-house and, sure enough, his own happy home where even now he felt certain grandfather was lying with his head on a tear-wet pillow having cried himself to sleep.

You may be sure Little Dog Don did not wait for morning to break before he let it be known that he had come back. In less than a minute he was scratching at the big front door with his tired little feet, and at the first stroke of his paws grandfather was sitting up in bed listening. And when he heard that sound again he fairly tumbled down the front stairs and threw open the door and had his dear Little Dog Don in his arms covering his face with kisses.

Surely that was the happiest hour either grandfather or Little Dog Don had ever known. When he could realize that it was all true and not a dream, grandfather took Little Dog Don up to his bed-room—boys of his age thought it quite a promotion to be sent from the trundle-bed to sleep alone in the hall bed-room at the head of the front stairs—and there he gave him a "lick and a promise" with a towel so he wouldn't be quite to wet to sleep with. And presently, before they knew how it all came about, grandfather and Little Dog Don were both fast asleep with all their troubles forgotten, getting ready for another day out in the orchard, hunting rats in the barn and squirrels in the grove and finding life without a cloud.

And although the naughty man was ashamed of his naughtiness, he never said so; but one day grandfather saw him throw out of his milk wagon a beautiful little collar of red morocco with a bright steel lock; and on the collar was engraved "For Little Dog Don from a Friend." And the naughty man's little boy by-and-by began to come around shyly to ask if he might play with grandfather and Little Dog Don, and before that summer was past, there were no warmer friends or happier playmates in the valley than Little Dog Don and grandfather and the naughty man's little boy "Jim."—Selected.

The Strongest Man In the World

In India to-day lives the strongest man in the world—Ram Murti Naidu. He has proved his superhuman strength before huge Hindu and European audiences, and in India he is greeted as a great national hero. What is the secret of his tremendous feats of strength?

Ram Murti Naidu is 5 feet 6½ inches tall, and weighs about 210 pounds. His chest measurement is 48 inches, and it has an expansion of 9 inches. He can swim for two hours continuously, and can run 12 miles at a stretch.

As a test of his great strength, Ram Murti has a heavy iron chain passed around his shoulders and the two ends of it bound to a heavy post. He then slowly lifts his shoulders, and the chain breaks in two.

As another test of his great strength, Ram Murti has a gigantic elephant, weighing about four tons, enter the ring. A thick plank is then placed over Naidu's abdomen, and the elephant gently walks on it, and after see-sawing for several minutes, walks off. Naidu immediately jumps to his feet and smilingly greets his audience as unconcernedly as if nothing had happened.

One of the most startling exhibitions of Naidu's feats of strength is his act of "stopping a motor-car." By sheer force of mental and physical strength he holds back a twelve-cylinder automobile.

At one of Naidu's exhibitions an Englishman, not relying on Naidu's automobile, offered his own car, and promised the strong man a great sum of money and the automobile if he could hold back the machine. Ram Murti promptly accepted the challenge. A strong rope was encircled around his waist and tied to the automobile. Then he asked the Englishman to drive the machine. All the power was turned on, and Ram Murti was carried several feet, but he merely smiled, for he was simply testing the strength of the rope. Then he made his stand, and the fast-moving automobile was immediately checked in its full motion. The wheels spun around with terrific speed, but the car itself did not move forward even an inch.

Some Americans are apt to jump to the conclusion that this Hindu giant of strength eats nothing but the very best chops and steaks, rare game birds and fresh eggs by the dozen. Well, if you think so, you are entirely mistaken. Naidu never eats meat of any kind, neither fish, not even eggs. He is purely vegetarian.

In the morning Naidu takes a drink made of almond paste, sugar, spices and cold water. His principal meal, which he eats at ten o'clock in the morning, consists of a quarter-pound of boiled rice, vegetable curry, lentil or pea soup. He eats plenty of clarified butter with all his dishes. He never drinks tea, coffee or liquor of any kind. He is very fond of cold water, of which he drinks in abundance.

At 4 p. m. Naidu takes his favorite pudding made of honey, cream, butter and sugar.

After his performance at night, Naidu takes a little rice, vegetable curry and lentil soup, the whole weighing not more than a quarter of a pound.

As a boy, Ram Murti Naidu was a sickling. The reading of the lives of historical strong men inspired him to become a physical giant. At first he took up the Western method of dumb-bell and bar exercises, but soon discovered that his constitution was not suited for that kind of exercise. Consequently he adopted the Hindu system of ground exercises. Constant and regular exercises and bulldog pertinacity, and, above all, his strong mind, turned him from a weakling into a physical marvel. By personal experience he discovered that it was neither food nor the form of exercise that made a man strong, but that it was the mind that developed the muscles. Naidu says he believes, as did Napoleon, that it is mental strength, mental energy and control of the mind that make a man strong and that a weak mind can never expect to develop a strong body.—St. Louis Republican.

Don't Say It

What a lot of trouble you and I would save if we didn't say it!

A censorious and cutting remark popped into my head, like an evil sprite, when discussing a friend the other day. Mostly, I must confess, it would have found expression; but something said, "Don't say it," and for once I didn't, for which I've been thankful ever since, and the not saying of it has brought an inner sense of satisfaction, much more than if it had been said.

We were discussing the sermon and the preacher at dinner. The children seemed to show little interest. One criticized both sermon and sermonizer, and choir too. Caught in the tide of criticism, I, too, was on the point of adding my wise and conclusive quota along the same line; but a telephone call made a break.

Returning to the table, my good old friend, Second Thought, came to my rescue—and I didn't say it; and I'm mighty glad I didn't.

I had a little conversational mix-up with an officious office-boy last week, and was ready to finish him up with a shaft of satire when the manager entered, and I addressed him more deferentially, for he was the man I wanted something from. The satire shaft is still unspoken, and, between you and me, it never will be uttered.

We had a "strained situation" at a recent board meeting of a certain high-sounding organization. The crank of the crowd—the other fellow, of course—had put us all on edge with his senseless strictures when, says I to myself, the time has come to put the quietus on him. I had nursed the sentence for quite a time, and felt sure it would have done the business; but a quiet, conciliatory old gentleman got ahead of me, and homehow my little pop-gun shot suddenly seemed out of place. I didn't say it—and no thanks to me, either—but I'm more than glad now I was providentially saved from saying it.

Experiment with the don't-say-it plan and see how well it will work, and what a heap of trouble it will save.—Onward.

Rules for Chinese Schoolgirls

One of the unexpected results of republican rule in China is the promulgation of detailed regulations to govern the conduct of girls in school.

Believing that a certain amount of discipline and uniformity is desirable in their training, the Ministry of Education has posted the following rules in the girls' schools of the provinces:

(1) No girl shall be allowed to have her hair cut short in any government school, and anyone found violating this regulatiaon shall be expelled from school. (2) No foot-binding shall be allowed. (3) No marriage without the parents' sanction shall be allowed, and if any girl violates this regulation she shall be expelled from school and her teacher shall also be punished for lack of vigilance. (4) No leave shall be granted to girl students without sufficient reason nor shall they be allowed to promenade in the streets in groups. (5) No girl over thirteen years of age shall be allowed to attend schools where boys are taught.

The Country Boy's Creed

If any country boy ever becomes discontented with his lot and thinks there might be more opportunities elsewhere, or a better place to live than in a white farmhouse, let him read the creed composed by Edwin Osgod Grover. The lines might be pinned up on his bureau, where he can see them the first thing in the morning and the last thing at night.

"I believe that the country, which God made, is more beautiful than the city, which man made; that life out of doors and in touch with the earth is the natural life of a man.

"I believe that work is work wherever we find it, but that work with nature is more inspiring than work with the most intricate machinery.

"I believe that the dignity of labor depends not on what you do, but on how you do it; that opportunity comes to a boy on the farm as often as to a boy in the city; that life is larger and freer and happier on the farm than in the town; that my success depends not upon my location, but upon myself—not upon dreams, but upon what I actually do; not upon luck, but upon pluck.

"I believe in working when you work and playing when you play, and in giving and demanding a square deal in every act of life."—Exchange.

Why We Keep Mother's Day

By Mrs. Jeff Davis

TO Miss Anna Jarvis, of Philadelphia, the loss of her mother meant so much that she sent forth the idea of a special time for the formal observance whereby motherhood might be concertedly honored.

Miss Jarvis talked and wrote and thought and held to her idea. She interested ministers, lecturers, orators, and the prominent people of the nation. In two years the idea spread over North America and through other countries.

The movement took shape under the original idea of honoring departed mothers as we honor our fallen soldiers on Memorial Day. Then it was broadened and strengthened in public favor by making Mother's Day for all mothers, whether living or dead.

It occurred to Miss Jarvis that in this connection it would be a lovely tribute to motherhood if all persons on a certain day would wear a white flower, and thus make the recognition universal.

In the beginning the white carnation was selected as the most suitable emblem, because she held that its whiteness stands for purity, its form for beauty, its fragrance for love, its wide field of growth for charity. Although the white carnation is still the favored flower, any white bloom is suitable for wearing when Mothers' Day arrives.

The second Sunday in May has been set apart as Mothers' Day—the one day in the year when special honor shall be given to the best mother who ever lived—your mother. Not honored on this day to the exclusion of the others, but that such contempleation of her love may best prepare the heart for fuller and more thoughtful expression of it during the remainder of the year.

In churches, schools, and many organizations Mothers' Day is now annually observed by special services. Addresses have reference to mother and special hymns are used.

It was in 1906 that Miss Jarvis began her work to establish an official Mothers' Day—and eight years later, early in May, 1914, Congress passed a resolution approving Mothers' Day and designating the date of its annual observance. The resolution is interesting because of the acknowledgment to the American mother, and was as follows:

Whereas, The service rendered the United States by the American mother is the greatest source of the country's strength and inspiration; and

Whereas, We honor ourselves and the mothers of America when we do anything to give emphasis to the home as the fountain head of the State; and

Whereas, The American mother is doing much for the home, for moral uplift and religion, hence so much for good government and humanity; therefore be it

Resolved, That the President of the United Staets is hereby authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the Government officials to display the United States flag on all the public buildings, and the people of the United States to display the flag at their homes or other suitable places, on the second Sunday of May as a public expression of our love and reverence for the mothers of our country.

Section 2. That the second Sunday of May shall hereafter be designated and known as Mothers' Day, and it shall be the duty of the President to request its observance as provided for in this resolution.

It seems especially fitting that this day be observed in our adult Bible classes. Let us not forget that the object of this memorial is to recall the memories of the mothers that are gone, and through loving words and loving care to brighten the lives of the mothers who remain, and to help the children and men and women to a greater blessing in honoring their mothers and their fathers.

News From the Field

Word From Africa

Brazzaville, French Equatoral Africa,
March 6th, 1918

It was at Walfish Bay, February 15th that Dr. Gribble sent an article for publication describing our trip from St. Lucia to that place, Miss Myers having written you before. And now it is my turn to tell the dear home people about our travels and experiences. We know you are much interested in all we learn and see and do. God has been with us. We have felt the power of prayer as we travel on. We left Walfish Bay, February 15th after a few hours' stop there to take on more coal and food supplies, continuing our trip on the Outeniqua to Loanda. While on the steamer Outeniqua we went on with our French Songs and Bible studies. There were just 13 Missionaries embarked, 11 adults and 2 children, This included all the passengers. We had our Bible reading and prayer services in the evenings, and each took his or her turn leading the meetings. We invited the crew to join us and many of the boys that were off duty came to our meetings. All our meetings were good, but the last one was held out on deck in the bright moonlight. Mrs. Ross of the Christian Mission led the meeting and many of the crew boys were present. She told them the story of Harry Lauder's life, how he was led to God by the death of his only son—and is now using his wonderful voice singing for the brave soldier boys in the trenches. At the boys' request we sang many of the dear old hymns. Most of the boys on board this ship were quite young, most of them from 15 to 20, and had run away from home. They enjoyed the meetings, and promised to live better lives, and some promised to write home to their dear mothers. At their request we copied several hymns for them. The one they liked best was "What a Friend we Have in Jesus." When we left them at Loanda February 21st it was with wet eyes and heavy hearts they said "Goodbye." But we know they are looking at life in a different way and many, many new souls be born into the Kingdom is our earnest prayer for them. On reaching Loanda we had to stop out in the bay, as the waters were too shallow for the steamships to go near shore. But the ship had hardly dropped anchor before the natives were there with their row boats to take us ashore. We arrived about 7 o'clock but it was after 10 when we finally landed. There was a great deal of confusion about prices, baggage, etc. But finally after much talk all agreed and we went ashore. When we reached shore we saw all our baggage taken to the custom house. Then we went to a nearby hotel; here Mr. Hedges took charge of our little party and ordered dinner. We had a long wait, but were quite rested and ready to do justice to the meal that was set before us. After dinner Dr. Gribble and I started out to do some shopping. It was our first attempt at French and we felt very much at a loss for words. But we were able to make our wants known. We enjoyed the time spent in shopping. After that we went up to the Methodist Mission and there we met Mr. Gibbs who gave us permission to use the girls' dormitory for our home while we were in Loanda. This was a fine big roomy building ,and plenty of rooms for all our party. Mr. and Mrs. Hedges with their little 3-year-old son stayed at the hotel.

We will continue the story of the trip later, as we learn there is a boat leaving with mail for the homeland and we wish to get this off.

MYRTLE MAE SNYDER.

First Brethren Church
Los Angeles, Cal.

Sunday morning, April 21st, we had the joy of seeing a husband and father walk to the front and give Brother Lowman his hand in a decision to take Christ as his Savior. Last night at the mid-week prayer meeting service he received baptism. This brother was led to Christ while riding on a street car going homo from his work a few weeks ago. Some one had given him a tract which he was reading. A Christian man noticed him and asked him if he was a Christian. On receiving a negative reply he was asked if he wanted to be a Christian, and he replied that he did. He was then told to believe and to accept Christ as his personal Savior from sin. Our brother made the decision then and there and he has told us that a new life came to him and that he is a new man in Christ Jesus. His wife who united with us a few years ago has now had an answer to her prayers and there is another united family.

Brother Lowman preaches his farewell sermons next Sunday and on Tuesday will leave for Fillmore, Ventura County, to take up the new work there under the auspices of the District Mission Board. He and his wife have earned the gratitude and good will of the members here and will take with them our prayers for an abundant success in their new field of labor.

Brother Reagan will return home from Ohio toward the end of May and take up his work with us again. We will be glad to see him and to hear his earnest sermons again after an absence of nearly five months.

Our Sunday school superintendent, Brother Earl Hedrick, who has done very efficient work among us and who has grown up in the church and Sunday school here, leaves tomorrow for a training camp. He will be greatly missed and our love and our prayers will follow him wherever he may have to go in his work for the government. We are sure that he will be a true witness for his Lord among the soldiers. We are planning to keep in touch with our absent ones so that we may encourage and help them in their absence from those they hold most dear.

Goshen, Indiana

After the services at which the church gave expression of good-will to Brother Kimmel and myself; I entered upon the work and now feel that I can make a report.

From the beginning our attendance has been good. The evangelistic spirit which I found in the church with the willingness to do personal work has resulted in converts at many of the regular services. The value of this condition can not be easily overestimated.

Our special services have been good. The Easter services were largely attended. The evening musical program was great. Mrs. Green, Miss Arnald, and Mr. Roscoe rendered the solo parts. The services were said to be the best "yet." All who took part are to be praised for the splendid way in which they carried out their part.

We have received about fifteen into the church, and granted about twenty-five letters. "Going the wrong way?" No. Just cleaning up the records which sometimes mislead in membership reports. Many letters granted were to Brethren living at Elkhart, Milford, and New Paris. Most of them have not been resident members here for some time.

The prayer meeting is one of the services that is well attended and much interest is taken in the lectures on the life of Christ. We have followed "In the Days of His Flesh" by Smith as a text-book. The largest attendance we have had was one hundred and twenty-six.

I note from the letter sent out by Brother Trimmer the director of the financial campaign, that the church here has given 4100 dollars to benevolence and other things outside of the current expenses last year. Four thousand and one hundred dollars is very good for a church of this size and with the war conditions we have had.

My report would not be complete if I did not tell you of the Sunday school. It is great, that is all there is to say. Easter Sunday we had 605 and an offering of 82 dollars. (Because of the use of the budget system we did not take the mission offering.) "Herman" will be glad to read that we had the largest school in the city.

It remains to be said that the S. S. C. E. is one of the real organizations of the church. Not only an "Organization" but a real live and working society. They do things. From what I have learned we can not speak with too much praise for them.

Also the Sisterhood is doing a good work. For talented young people who do things for the church I have never seen the equal. A great future lies before this church. "The True Blues," the young men's class is doing much to help the work. Many of their number have gone to the camps, and for the last two contingents they prepared a good lunch and gave it to the boys just before they took the train.

We held a two-weeks' meeting which was well attended. There will be eight additions as the direct results. The meeting was beneficial in its blessings to the church, and gave us an opportunity to get better acquainted with the church.

The S. S. C. E. held what is called a "Penny supper." I tell you that I never saw people come as they did. At five o'clock they lined up and at seven when my friend Thomas came from Milford (Think of a preacher going twelve miles for a penny supper) the line was well extended out of the door. It was a mystery to me, and I asked some one and they said that we have the best cooks in the city.

Last Sunday evening we had our spring communion services with a large attendance. We could, under present conditions, accommodate a few more. Yours,

207 N. Second St. J. A. McINTURFF.

Waterloo, Iowa

Two-thirds of a year have passed since the writer became pastor of this congregation. Regard for the many friends of the congregation, who are interested in her doings, and for the congregation, herself, demands a pastoral report.

The Waterloo congregation is one that any minister should rejoice to serve. Fairness alone requires that this group of Brethren be appraised very highly. Splendidly organized in all departments, occupying an enviable place in the life and esteem of both the city and the surrounding communities composed of red-blooded, stable, real men and women and boys and girls, Christian and Brethren and American to the core, the congregation is one that any denomination should rejoice to own. It is difficult to keep from adding, howeved, that this is in large part a Pennsylvania congregation moved westward!

The writer found that Brother Beachler and family are held in the highest esteem. Indeed, he has never known a man to be held in higher admiration and regard than Brother Beachler is by both this congregation and community. Since he shares their sentiments to the utmost, this situation has been a cause of complete gratification to his successor.

At Christmas time a very splendid drama and pageant were presented by the Sunday school. The presentation portrayed the very heart of the Christmas message, and an offering of $116 was received for the Kentucky-Ashland fund.

New Year's day brought the annual business meeting of the congregation. Reports from all departments of the church showed a general flourishing condition. This was the more encouraging in view of the congregation being pastorless part of the year, The situation emphasized the fact, often unrecognized, that a real congregation is a bigger and more vital force than any pastor can, or should, hope to be. Brother B. T. Burnworth hapepned to be in Waterloo, enroute to Hudson, on that day, and gave a fine talk to the assembled group.

At the business meeting it was decided to pay off what indebtedness remained on the new church building before April 1, 1918. Alterations found necessary after the building was dedicated, and unavoidable shrinkage in the notes which were given to cover pledges made at the time of dedication, caused a shortage of a few thousand dollars in the amount available to cancel the debt at the time planned. Sufficient money was pledged on dedication day to cover all requirements, but the war situation has interfered with the plans of churches as well as of other organizations.

Never did a congregation show a more unanimous and cheerful willingness to pay off a debt for which provision had once been made, than did the Waterloo congregation in providing for this deficit. On Easter day, March 30, the congregation worshiped in a church building free from all indebtedness, and even presented their new pastor with two dozen American Beauty roses because he had spent some time in helping them to carry out their plans. The church building is all that Brother Beachler said it is, and this last chapter in the story of its provision certainly had a vigorous and happy ending.

The congregation is responding to her duty in the war situation in commendable fashion. The service flag in the auditorium of the church contains 17 stars, and the honor roll in the Booster's class room contains 17 names. The first Waterloo boy wounded in France was one of these 17. A fine, silk Red Cross flag, also hanging in the auditorium, has hundreds of little red crosses, and it is hoped that the congregation will become 100 per cent in Red Cross membership during the drive for funds in May. Some of the women sew for the Red Cross each Thursday afternoon in the social rooms of the church. Liberty bond and thrift-stamp purchases have been urged in the Sunday school and from the pulpit, and the responses have been splendid. A second offering for Armenian relief in 1917 was received in December and one hundred dollars were secured. Since that time the congregation joined with the West-side churches of Waterloo in making still another offering to that cause. An offering to help in buying New Testaments for the soldiers will be received next Sunday, April 28. In the other patriotic campaigns, except the "smileage" and "smokes for Sammies" efforts the congregation has taken enthusiastic part.

In common with all the Sunday schools in Iowa, decision day was observed in the Sunday school on Easter day. The work, humanly speaking, to make this effort a success was done, mainly, by the officers and teachers of the school, and chiefly by the consecrated and efficient visitor of the Sunday school and church, Miss Etta Lichty. Twenty-one precious souls decided for Christ and church membership as a result of the effort. Fifteen of these have been baptized and received into the church, and all of the others probably will be, if not in the near future, at least later. This quiet ingathering of souls rejoiced the church more than can be described, and is an evidence that the blessed Spirit of God can work, and will work, without so much "tumult and shouting" on our part, if we are very faithful to perform our duty in our daily, personal contact with others.

When the Ashland College rally was held in the Senior Christian Endeavor society, two fine, young high school boys expressed their desire to give their lives to Christian work. They are vigorous sons of vigorous and genuine Brethren stock, and most certainly will be heard from favorably in the future. Quite wisely they are planning for training in Ashland College.

A chart that records the number and variations in the attendance at all the church services has been placed in the auditorium, in full view of all. This was done by the pastor. Whether it was a courageous or reckless move the future will mercilessly reveal. Yet, there is no reason that churches should shy away from efficiency charts. Results must be achieved, no matter whose release on the grounds of inefficiency they may advise, nor what degree of indifference and slackerism they may reveal in the congregation.

The spring communion service of this congregation will be held on May 26. It will be preceded by a week of special services for which we are now planning. We are praying for a special outpouring of the Spirit, and an ingathering of souls. The prayers of the Brethren everywhere are solicited.

Encouraging progress toward the Four-Year Program goals is being made by all departments, with one or two possible exceptions. The program is a great challenge to the church, and is proving to be a help and blessing. We hope to see every one of the goals reached by the denomination at large, and Waterloo, listed with many other congregations, occupying a front line position.

All in all, the activities of the congregation have been very encouraging, but they have not been wholly satisfactory to anyone concerned. Many imperative tasks yet remain to be accomplished. Lay members and pastor, alike, are conscious of many imperfections and deficiencies that need to be overcome. They have agreed to labor together for a second year, and they are praying for a constantly progressing ability to serve the church's Christ and his cause.

CHILD-SAVING WORK IN CALIFORNIA

FRUITVALE is a suburb of Oakland and is composed of some wealthy families, but more largely of people who have invested in homes and are struggling to pay for them. There was plenty of opportunity for the boys of the neighborhood to go wrong, and nothing outside of the Sunday school to keep them up to high ideals. As soon as this fact became apparent from the rapid growth of Fruitvale, a number of consecrated young men organized the Cadet Corps, which has become a feeder to the Sabbath school, and the means of leading many lads to unite with the church. No boy who smokes, uses bad language, or is immoral can belong, and the boys have developed a pride in keeping a clean record, and are developing strong characters under the rigid discipline, and a desire for helpfulness, which makes them a power for good in the neighborhood. The men who give their time, talents, money and example to help these boys have evolved the following creed, which they live, and which explains the wonderful influence they have gained over these lads, who have come from all sorts of homes:

1. I believe in Boys.

2. I believe that Health is the foundaiton, that Habits are the material, Instincts the guides, Enthusiasms the motive power and Ideals the tests and shields of all young life.

3. I believe in Nature, Pets and Treasure Boxes; in Play, Handcraft, Work and Wonder.

4. I believe in the absolute supremacy and essentialness of the Home. I believe also, as long as homes are not, ideal in the extension of the Church, the Public School, the Public Library and the Municipality into Child-saving.

5. I believe "for substance of doctrine" in Boys' Clubs, Playgrounds, School Gardens, Vacation Schools, Camps, Home Libraries, Juvenile Courts and Placing-out Agencies; and all sincere, simple and persistent endeavors to help boys. I believe in men more than in institutions anyway.

6. I believe in the Gang, wisely chaperoned; Boys need to be educated by their peers.

7. I believe in Heroes, and that every day should be All Saints' Day.

8. I believe the most important event in a boy's life is his first friendship.

9. I believe that every boy of ten is entitled to know how he came into this world, and that before he is twelve he ought to be taught to keep clean.

10. I believe in the Awakening of Children, the Conversion of Youth. I believe that Religion to a young Child consists in Good Will and Good Conduct; that to a Youth it is Love and Growth and Service. I believe in pre-empting the young soul for goodness; that Salvation is better than Salvage.

11. I believe that a Boy needs Love, Humor, Patience and Letting Alone.

12. I believe that God may not have intended all people to be Parents, but that none are excused from being God-parents.

13. I believe that a Helper of Boys must be to them as nearly as possible what God is to himself, and that their Salvation, like all other, must be by a process of Incarnation.

Our Dead

CHEESEMAN.—Albert Cheeseman was born January 29, 1880 on a farm near Hazelhurst, Illinois. His death was a tragic end of a day's woodsawing, being caught by the belt and hurled on the engine so severely that death ensued after a few hours, March 25, 1918, aged 38 years, 2 months and 5 days. He was a member of the Brethren church at Lanark. We greatly sympathize with his wife, his aged mother and other near relatives. He was an unusually strong man of jovial disposition and we are one of many who shall miss his smiling face.

BOWERS. — William Norris, fourteen-months'-old son of Mr. and Mrs. John Bowers, of Washington, D. C., died April 2nd, 1918. The funeral service was conducted from the home of the little boy's grandparents, Mr. and Mrs. John Stiff, near Thaxton Virginia, by the writer. Interment followed in the family burying ground nearby. A number of relatives and friends from Roanoke, Virginia, attended the services. He leaves a father, mother, brother and sister, who have the deep sympathy of their many friends.

L. G. WOOD.

CORRELL—Died in the Manvel, Texas, congregation, April 1st, 1918, Brother Joseph Correll, aged 61 years and 6 days. Brother Correll was born at Moreland, Ohio. He accepted Christ early in life and united with the Church of God. When the Manvel Brethren church was organized he cast his lot with us and continued a faithful member until the day of his death.

He is survived by a wife and three grown daughters. Services were conducted at the Brethren church by Rev. Clark of the Christian Church and the writer.

J. H. PECK.

THURSTON. —Edith Edna, was born October 22, 1893 in Osborne county, Kansas. She came to Tama county with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. D. L. Hofer, fourteen years ago and was united in marriage with John H. Thurston January 22, 1914.

Besides her husband she is survived by a daughter, Vera Maxine, aged two, her parents, three brothers and two sisters.

Her death ensued March 29, as a result of an explosion of oil in her home by which she was fatally burned. May the grief-stricken husband and friends be sustained in their affliction.

Services at the Carlton Brethren church Easter Sunday by the undersigned.

FREEMAN ANKRUM.

FRANK.—Mrs. Jennie Frank, wife of Noah Frank, died in Wabash County, Indiana, March 23, 1918, aged 48 years and 13 days. She was a faithful member of the College Corner Brethren church and will be missed by many friends. She leaves a husband and one foster son. The funeral services were held at the Vernon church of the Brethren by her pastor.

DRUDGE.—Louis Marion Drudge was killed by a train near North Manchester, Indiana on March 3, 1918, aged 41 years, 4 months and 17 days. He leaves a wife and three small children. Funeral was conducted at the South Pleasant church, near North Manchester by the undersigned.

D. A. C. TEETER.

SAUSAMAN.—Thomas Jefferson Sausaman, of Akron, Ind., was killed while blasting stumps near Rochester, Indiana, March 15, 1918, aged 61 years, 7 months and 7 days. He leaves a widow, six children and 4 grandchildren, besides his aged mother and several brothers and sisters. He was a member of the Brethren church at Akron. The funeral was held at the M. E. church at Akron by the writer.

D. A. C. TEETER.

JUSTICE.—Mrs. M. J. Justice departed from this life at her home in Dallas Center, Iowa, on February 19, 1918. Mrs. Justice was one of the first settlers in this part of Iowa and one of the first members of the Brethren church. We all miss her because of her faithful and unselfish life, both in the home, the church and the community. May the memory of her good life be an encouragement to those who remain to live as she tried to live.

R. F. PORTE.

ETZLER.—James R. Etzler, of Linwood, Maryland, went to his eternal rest April 13, 1918, after a brief illness of pneumonia. He was born at Chestnut Grove, Maryland, February 28, 1859. The past fifteen years he had resided near Linwood. He was a highly respected and sociable citizen, also a member of the Brethren church. He leaves a wife, four daughters and three sons.

May the bereaved be comforted. Funeral services were in charge of the undersigned, assisted by J. P. Garner and Rev. D. A. Foard.

E. M RIDDLE.

McNIGHT.—Mrs. James McNight, was born in Perry County, Pa., fifty-three years ago, and departed this life at her home in Johnstown, Pa., April 12, 1918.

Her maiden name was Retta Hostetler. She leaves behind a husband, three sisters and six children.

Sister McNight had for many years been a faithful member of the church of the Brethren.

The congregation of which she was a member having been without a pastor for some time, it was her request that the funeral services be conducted by the writer.

May God bless and comfort the bereaved ones.

W. S. BAKER.

CAMERON.—Corporal Homer W., of Co. C, 309 Engineers; son of Amos and Sarah Cameron, was born May 28, 1890, near Rossville, Ind., and died March 31, 1918 at Camp Taylor, Kentucky, aged 21 years, 10 months, 3 days. His father died 5 years ago, and the mother, one brother and one sister are left to mourn his death. Corporal Cameron was a nephew of Brother J. Allen and William Miller, and both attended the funeral which was held at the Rossville M. E. church of which Corporal Cameron was a member. The funeral was preached by his pastor, Rev. C. C. Harold, assisted by Rev. Roue, the Presbyterian pastor, and the writer. Corporal Cameron spent eighteen months on the Mexican border, and had been at Camp Taylor since October 6, 1917. He was patriotic, and found joy in a loyalty to all of the Nation's interests, and indeed an act of heroic love was manifested in his willingness to even die for his country.

May God's choicest blessings attend and console the broken hearted mother, whose burden seems so heavy to bear.

W. T. LYTLE.

MOTHER'S DAY

Happy are they,
Who, on this day,
A flower of crimson are wearing.
Life's sweetest thing
They're honoring:
A mother who's living and caring.

Mem'ries have they,
Who, on this day,
A flower of pure white are wearing.
Comes this thought dear:
Perhaps very near
Those mothers are waiting, still caring.

VOLUME 40 ASHLAND, OHIO, WEDNESDAY, MAY 15, 1918 NUMBER 19

A MESSAGE TO THE PRESIDENT AND TO THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

OUR NATION has, we profoundly believe, with clean hands and pure heart engaged in conflict for lofty and unselfish ends.

THE attainment of those ends demands all the moral powers of our people, the conservation of our economic resources, and the highest efficiency in service.

THESE powers are impaired, this efficiency is greatly decreased, and our nationial vitality diminished by the liquor traffic and all its attendant evils, resulting in the waste of food, the waste of labor, and the waste of life itself.

HAVING duly recognized this in our army and navy by having taken measures to prevent the use of liquor by our troops, we believe that those who remain and serve at home should willingly apply to themselves the same principles which they apply to our soldiers and sailors and should submit to the same limitations for the welfare of the nation.

THEREFORE, in the interest of those who defend our nation, for the saving of our own supplies of food, for the highest efficiency of the industries which provide our means of warfare, and for the strengthening of the moral health of the people, we earnestly urge the President and the Congress of the United States to take steps to prevent, during the entire peroid of the war, by whatever means are feasible, the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor of all kinds for use as a beverage, including the importation of all liquor.

THE NATIONAL SERVICE AND WAR-TIME COMMISSIONS OF THE AMERICAN CHURCHES

From the Editor's View-Point

Duelling

There was a time when it was thought that no man could be a gentleman unless he was willing to defend his honor (?) in mortal combat with any one who offered him an insult. And the man who failed to challenge the offender to meet him upon the field of honor and there to settle his difficulties with the sword of pistol was branded a coward. Even in the early days of America it was believed by some that this was a necessary practice in the life and experience of a gentleman and not until the death of Alexander Hamilton at the hands of Aaron Burr did the American people waken up to the folly of the custom and demand its abolishment from the practices of civilized men. The old world has been more slow to frown upon the custom, and even down to the present generation it has been considered a mark of honor for a student in a German university to bear the scars of combat upon his face as a sign that he has met his enemy and sustained his honor with the sword.

Foolish as this may seem to us, and futile as this method of settling questions of honor may be, yet there are other things in the relation of nation to nation that seem equally foolish or even more so. Away back in the days of William Penn, this man, who gave prominence to Quakerism, declared, as to the matter of war, that wars are the duels of princes. And in his day the statement was undoubtedly true. In the light of such conditions it is not to be wondered at that he became a great pacifist and set his face against all wars.

When one considers the things that led up to the present great war, is it wrong to call it, at least in its beginning, a duel of princes? It is now called a "war for humanity," and many nations have been drawn into the struggle for humanity's sake, but in the very beginning it was most certainly a duel of princes, an attempt to settle a question of honor among the crowned heads of a continent, but the innocent bystanders have been drawn into the struggle and have in a large measure changed the cause from its original purpose.

The Social Hermit

A long time ago a man of prominence declared: "I would rather sit on a pumpkin and have it all to myself than to be crowded on a velvet cushion," which is a polite way of saying: "My life is a life of selfishness, and I will put up with many hardships rather than feel under obligation to share anything that belongs to me with the rest of humanity."

There are not many people who are willing to literally sit upon pumpkins in order to have their own sweet will about things but the spirit of the man whose words we have quoted is alive though the author of the words has been dead these many years.

One of the very trite sayings of the budding sociologist is, "Man is a social being," to which we readily agree, but man does not always appear in his natural state and frequently goes to the other extreme and becomes one of the most unsocial creatures on earth. Any man who is selfish or who makes his own pleasure the first concern of life is an unsocial creature, and the degree to which he carries on his selfish practices determines whether or not he has become a social hermit. A very few hermits have left a worthwhile heritage to the world, but most of them neither blessed mankind nor themselves because they once lived.

It is a difficult task for a man to make his life count for any worthy object who insists upon "sitting alone upon his own pumpkin." The world demands a closer relationship between men than that. One need not expect to be so favorably situated at all times as to "be crowded on a velvet cushion," yet the crowding cannot be avoided. A very large portion of life is made up of crowding or being crowded, and oftentimes the situation is even less uncomfortable than to be "crowded on a pumpkin." In fact there is very little of life that can be lived alone. Humanity is so wrapped up in humanity that it is difficult to untangle the responsibilities, and one of the lessons we need to learn is how to adjust ourselves to this crowded condition and how to relieve those who are less favored than we ourselves may be.

Ruling Forces

It may be that not many of us have given serious thought to the ruling forces in our lives. We may carelessly believe that things "just happen" and that we just happened and that our present condition just happened and that we are what we are because it just happened; but if we have any such thoughts it is time to waken up and to consider what we really are and why we are as we are. A great many conditions and things of life can be changed and that for the better if sufficient thought is given to them and then if the thought is put into action.

We may not have any too great respect for the character of Lord Bacon, and as we think of this great man of a former century no doubt most of us remember the words: "If parts allure thee, think how Bacon shined.,

The wisest, brightest, meanest of mankind."

But it matters not what his personal character may have been he was indeed one of the brightest and keenest men of his century, and some of the things he said are most wonderfully true today even as they were in the day in which he lived. Our lives go in regular channels unless they have been disturbed by some ruling force and it appears that frequently this disturbance occurs without being conscious of the fact. Three of these ruling forces or disturbing factors have been pointed out in the words of Bacon: "We think according to our nature; speak as we have been taught but act as we have been accustomed."

According to this thought, if we think mean thoughts it is because we are mean in nature and it is futile to try to change the thoughts without first changing the nature. Sweet water can not flow from a bitter spring. The spring itself must be sweetened. Here is the starting point for the reformation of a life. In the second place, if we do not approve of the speech of the present generation the way to overcome that which is displeasing to us is to change the teaching. Of course this is an impossible task for a single individual to accomplish, for often the teaching of one individual is offset by the environments which society affords. A union of effort on the part of parents and educators is necessary before any marked effect can be had upon the speech of the coming generations. Life is so much a force of habit it is no wonder Bacon said: "We act as we have been accustomed." This is one of the ruling forces that needs directing. It is claimed by some that good habits are as easily acquired as bad habits are. We will make no attempt to either affirm or deny that assertion here, but simply assume it to be correct. But in our assuming it to be correct we are making a rather startling admission that most of us have neglected a wonderfully fruitful field of achievement in the development of human character. These three ruling forces we have just mentioned, nature, teaching, custom, are forces that should receive more careful consideration by all people and should be turned to account in the attempt to develop a race of right thinking and right living men and women. If human lives cannot be improved as the years come and go then it is hardly worth while to live at all.

A Practical Problem

The study of ethics is a fascinating one though it may be rather difficult to reach right conclusions in regard to questions considered. One of the things necessary to make the study of the principles of ethics more interesting to the average mind is to make practical application of them to show that they are something more than theory alone.

It is popular in these days to say, "Good Germans are like good Indians, dead." But there have been good Germans in the past and undoubtedly there are good Germans, as individuals yet. But one of the good Germans who is dead said: "The source of all wrongdoing is selfishness and it is the problem of ethics to make it harmless." We believe E. von Hartmann was entirely correct when he made that statement and furthermore we believe all the horrors of the war in Europe today are but the fruit of a generation of selfishness on the part of the rulers of central Europe. This is indeed a most practical problem in ethics, how to overcome and make harmless the evils of selfishness.

What Must I Do?

BY P. H. BEAVER

A Pagan officer equal in authority to a United States Marshal asked the above question of two inconspicuous looking men, with whom he came in contact, who were in appearance placed under most compromising circumstances, but both men seemed calm and confident, and this attitude of the men may have added to the great trepitude of mind of the officer in question at that particular time of night. We think this Pagan officer had good reason to be affrighted under those extraordinary circumstances, as he surely must have been, when he "Sprang in, and, trembling with fear, fell down before Paul and Silas, and brought them out, and said, "Sirs, what must I do to be saved?" and they said "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou Shalt be Saved."

It strikes me that right here "these men" and more particularly Paul, began to teach the great doctrines of justification by faith and of salvation by grace.

The foregoing paragraph, in the writer's mind, covers the whole plan of human redemption from sin to salvation of the entire human race of today, in general terms only and not at all in regular continuity of steps or acts of what I must do to be saved, nor does the gospel itself so state them, since we find, as it strikes the writer, a highly significant statement of our great teacher even before he was baptized when the inspired Baptizer said to the teacher in self abasement, "I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me?" to which the master teacher replied: "Suffer it to be so now, for thus it becometh us to fulfill all righteousness." Here now brethren, let us be candid. Was this statement of a fact, and at the same time an example for his disciples to follow, or was it not? The example set by our teacher we all seem ready enough to accept, but the fact that it is an act of righteousness is not so clear to the writer, but seems to him imperative as an indisputable fact, to this writer because it is so stated by our master teacher himself in our adopted creed. And we profess to be gospel alone and aggressive as well as progressive. Brethren an obedient faith is the only real living saving faith! Listen: "He that believeth on on the son hath eternal life; but he that obeyeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him," John 3: 36. "Abraham obeyed God and his faith was reckoned to him for righteousness." This fact applies to you and me. True, obedient faith brings repentance for sin. This was the very first message of our Teacher after his baptism in the Jordan river, on his way to Galilee on his first preaching trip "Repent ye! for the Kingdom of heaven is at hand," and this same message he commanded his twelve apostles to deliver everywhere throughout all Judea and afterward he sent other seventy and commanded them to proclaim the same message, because all were sinners and those who confessed their sins and repented toward God and believed on Jesus, were commanded to be baptized, thus complying with the Master Teacher's example in doing a righteous act in faith and becoming right or righteous in the sight of God, and this is justification itself, and then comes the promise, "Being therefore justified by faith we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ; by whom also we have had our access by faith into the grace wherein we stand."

Now I am on safe ground and now I can quote some of the blessed promises freely, "He that believeth on the Son hath eternal life; but he that obeyeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of god abideth on him." Jesus said to Nicodemus: "Except a man be born anew he cannot see the Kingdom of God." Then note well how our Teacher opens the door to the Kingdom of God to the repentant sinner, "Verily, verily I say unto thee, except a man be born of Water and the Spirit he cannot enter into the Kingdom of God." Is baptism an act of righteousness?

To the alarmed multitude of believers, the Apostle Peter declared the following inspired rule or requirement or commandment: "Repent ye, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ unto the remission of your sins; and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit."

Prompt obedience to a righteous requirement looks to me like sincerest faith, and spells justification by faith in ample measure. How does it look to you, by brother, my sister, my neighbor and my impenitent friend? Then again, we have this declaration by St. Paul, "For by grace have ye been saved through faith; and that not of yourselves: It is the gift of God." Salvation is the gift of God; the most gracious, precious gift of God recorded in the New Covenant. Now then, do not by any means miss the meaning as used here of the term, Grace of God. It simply means the love that God exercised toward mankind by giving his well beloved Son as a gift to save sinners who through obedient faith trust in him, his word and work done on earth and in heaven for man's redemption and salvation here and hereafter forever. We have so many precious promises to quote and all are based upon true faith and pure grace and I judge that practically all of us fully believe that Jesus the only Son has power to save to the uttermost. But here is another most precious and vital assurance to confirm our faith, by St. John: "If we walk in the light as he is in the light we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ, his Son cleanseth us from all sin." This gem prompts, "And when this feeble, faltering tongue lies silent in the grace, Then a nobler, sweeter song, I'll sing thy power to save."

In what follows we wish to make mention of the things upon which thousands of men and women depend and hope for final salvation which are entirely delusive and misleading and unscriptural —they abound in every community; the vast majority of them are not in the habit of freely expressing themselves on religious subjects in the presence of intelligent members of any churches but among their own chums and fellow-nothingarians of a social and indifferent type they talk and criticize church people very freely and then fall into the habit of comparing well known local weak and frail, as well as faulty and erring members of a church with themselves in many ways of works and doings in local and neighborhood activities in the many charitable and Christian services of the social community in which they live, until by mental comparison, estimates and averages in moral deportment, they arrive at a mental decision also that their own personal righteousness outweighs that of the average church member and that their own salvation is quite as certain as that of any member of any church because of their many good works and charitable deeds. Some of them confidently quoting the scripture that all shall be judged according ot their works, whether they be good or evil, and it must be conceded that they make out a fair looking case in their own favor, according to civil law and court and jury judgment and practice.

Right here let me point out is where the pastor's perilous responsibility comes into view, face to face with appalling force when he is able to clearly apprehend his own teaching and pastoral position and relation to his hearers. When it becomes his irrepressible duty to make clear to all his hearers that must by no means whatsoever depend upon civil, court and jury judgment for righteousness to bring them salvation in the world to come. World reputed righteousness is not of sufficient value to save a humming bird from death, let alone a human soul in the sight of God. Read the parable, Luke 18: 9-14.

It is scripturally safe to declare that since the day that St. Paul set foot on the coast of Italy A. D. 58-62 there has not lived on this planet a single man or woman who was so righteous, so good, so pure, so harmless that they deserved to be saved on that account, according to the covenant of grace in his blood or gospel. No, not one!

This teaching warmly and kindly pressed will bring penitents to the Cross. I know it by personal experience and penitents only have the blessed promise.

Gypsy Smith and the War

In his remarkable address, lasting well over an hour, in which he touched every phase of the great conflict now raging on the Western Front in France, Gypsy Smith, the famous evangelist, paid especial tribute to the boys of the Allied world—the boys who are making the world safe for democracy. Following his enumeration of their wonderful fighting qualities, the Gipsy reached his climax in a tribute to the British Tommies.

"I am thinking of that contemptible little army of 170,000, for that is all we had; but we put them into France in the first two weeks of the war," he said. "And don't you lose heart, and don't you get pessimistic or downhearted or panicky. The Germans with their preparations of forty years, they did not get through those Tommies, and they won't get through now.

"And besides, you are there today, thank God! You are there.

"A lady in Washington said to me last week: 'Oh, Gipsy Smith, when will that British line break?' And I said to her: 'Madam, not until the last man is dead.'

"Do you know that 5,000 British boys have held back 50,000 Huns—and I'll tell you why. We have right on our side, and right gives moral courage and backbone and a clear conscience—it makes a man feel if he dies in doing it, somehow or other God is a chum who won't let a man down.

"There were 30,000 of our brave American boys fighting beneath the British flag before you declared war. I know, because I met them and worked with them; I saw them in the hospitals and in the convalescent camps. And do you know what they said to me? They said: 'We could not remain men and keep out of it sir. We had to get into it to save our monhood.' And so they crossed the border of Canada and joined the Canadian forces, and some of them have won the D. S. O. and they have won the Victoria Cross and the Military Medal—and they are entitled to everything they got, God bless 'em.

"We are proud of the boys—American boys who fought under the British flag, and we are proud of the boys you are sending over now—and hurry up with them. But don't lose your hearts; we are not downhearted—we are going to win! Anything else is unthinkable. I would rather die than Germany should put its iron heel on the neck of the world—I would rather die!"

The evangelist told of a number of German atrocities—horrors which had driven fighting men to seek out religion as a relief, and added:

"Are you surprised that I wanted to join up with these boys as soon as the war broke out? But you know I am suffering from an incurable complaint, no doctor can help me; I was born too soon. My complaint is anno domini, but I still feel like a boy. I have had a great privilege in living with the boys at the front—and I'm going back, don't you make any mistake about it. They can't finish the job without me.

"I wanted the opportunity of working with the boys. I knew they were good stuff, so I said to my church: 'Send me!' But my church did not have the sense to.

"But the Y. M. C. A. knows a good thing when it sees it. Let me tell you that every boy in khaki—and I think I can speak for the boys in America as well as the boys in Great Britain—the moment he sees the Red Triangle of the Y. M. C. A. he knows it means 'Welcome.' It stands for need, not creed; and will you please notice that it stands on its apex, not on its base. If it stood on its base it could stand alone; it stands on its apex, which means if it is not supported on both sides, it will topple over, which, interpreted, means that they need money and men. You did magnificently before Christmas in that big $53,000,000 drive. But there will be another in the fall and you will give to it, also. You will give because you know what you give will be spent on your boys, and you can never repay the debt you owe to the boys—never in this world.

"The boys are giving legs and arms and eyes for you; they are giving their lives for you. Some of you have spent more in the last three months on picture shows than you have spent on your boys who have gone to war. I can tell you a few things; you know, I am a gipsy still and I know.

"The next thing about the Red Triangle is that it needs men and women. I am requested by Y. M. C. A. headquarters to make this statement—that 5,000 men and women, the sanest you have got in all your churches, for work in camps at home and overseas; and that is only a little of what you will need before the war is over. In England we have 40,000 men and women working in our centers of work for our boys. They have given their best; why shouldn't you give your best?

"Let me add that you should give the best men in your city for this work, not the men you want to get rid of.

"Also let me tell you that we have got to do more praying before the war is over. You have the chance of your lifetime in your churches, if you only knew it, through the channels of the Y. M. C. A. The Red Triangle has not only appealed to the conscience, righteousness and respect of the men; the boys believe in it; they believe in its religion, they lean to it, they go to its huts. The huts are everything to the boys overseas.

"A score of London journalists asked me on my return from France 'What is to be the attitude of the Y. M. C. A. to the churches?' And I said to them, 'A communication trench! '

"And that is what it will be if you have got sense to make it that. Don't be jealous of it. You never knew the sun jealous of the clover fields in bloom. Why, the sunshine is to make all these things possible, and the church of God exists to send forth such movements as the Y. M. C. A. in ever-increasing streams of beneficient ministry. So when you are asked to do any service for or give to it, be ready—never refuse it, because some of you are making more money than you ever made in your lives and you are making it out of the war—out of the blood and bones of the American and British and French boys, and I make no apology for coming to you and asking you to disgorge some of it.

"In Great Britain we have 1500 centers of work in the home camps. We have 500 centers of work in France and Flanders, and some of the huts I preached in just behind the lines are in the hands of the Germans today—but they won't hold them long.

"Then we have centers of work in Salonika, in Mesopotamia, in Egypt, in Palestine. Wherever the Allied forces go we have Y. M. C.A. huts. Jerusalem had not been captured more than five hours before we had a hut there. The British authorities want the Y. M. C. A. because they believe the Y. M. C. A. has kept up the spirits of the men and preserved the morale of the army. Even the French government has said to us: 'We cannot supply the workers for such a program, but if you will do the same kind of work for the French soldiers that you have done for the British, we will build you 1,200 huts.

"You say: 'Well, what do you do in these huts?' Well, we do all sorts of things. A hut is a church; a hut is a cathedral; a hut is a club; a hut is a home away from home. It is a canteen, a refreshment room, a library, a recreation room, a game room, a writing room and a reading room. It is everything you like to make it —and the boys do love these huts.

"Right up along the front the Y. M. C. A. hut is the only shelter the boys have got while they are out of the trenches resting for a few days."

Rev. Smith gave a graphic picture of preaching to the boys who gathered in his trench dugout.

"I have been through four gas attacks," said he. "I have lived under shellfire for a month at a time. I talked to those boys that month once, twice, three times, four times and five times a day. There was no need of coaxing them to come—they simply came. And you should have heard them sing 'Cover my defenseless head wtih the shadow of thy wing'—singing it with a gas bag on their necks open and ready for use. While I was talking I held my gas bag close to me so it was ready if it was needed. Sometimes while we were singing or praying or talking a shell would fall close to us and knock things around uncomfortably, but that was only a part of the program.

"Why, I preached the gospel behind the Lewis guns in the trench—and I didn't put my head down when the bullets were flying, either, for that wouldn't have done, because there is no use preaching to boys about the perfect love that casts out fear, and then flop! No, you've got to take your own physic. And never for a moment was I afraid—never.

"You say, 'Don't the boys go to the devil in France?' I want to tell you there are more facilities in this city for going to the devil than there are in the trenches. When you want to go you can find a way, but I am here to say that there are hundreds of thousands of our boys in France who are living noble, beautiful, magnificent manly lives. Thanks to their mothers and thanks to their sisters and thanks to the churches and Sunday schools, for the leaven is in the lump, and don't you forget it."

The evangelist declared that 300,000 British officers and enlisted men had signed the Y. M. C. A. war roll cards confessing their faith in God and Christ and deciding to lead Christian lives. As an illustration of their acceptance of the Christian faith he cited the story of a youngster who had been wounded in a particularly sanguinary engagement:

"Here was a dear boy on a stretcher—I led him to Christ. He was so broken I took the blanket and lifted it from his face, and then I got down and kissed him, and my lips and hands got covered with his blood. I kissed him for his mother, for I knew she would never kiss him. I thought he was unconscious, but he asked me:

"'Gipsy, Gipsy, does it mean Blighty?' for Blighty means home and mother. 'or does it mean West?'—and West means death.

"So I said: 'It means West; you are too far gone for Blighty; you will never see mother again. Can I tell her anything?' and he said to me:

"Tell her I am not afraid to die; I have found Christ. It is great to die for freedom.' And then he pointed to his head and said to me: 'Yes, it is battered and broken, but it will be all right when I get the crown.'

"That is the kind of boys God has given us, men and women. Your boys are dying for the freedom of the world, don't you fail them—don't you fail them! Put in all you have—consecrate all your power, every hour, every day, every fibre, every dollar, to the good of the world, for the freedom of the race."

The Spirit of Christian Service

BY ALAN S. PIERCE

Romans 12:11-12 R. V. In diligence not slothful; fervent in spirit; serving the Lord; rejoicing in hope; patient in tribulation; continuing steadfastly in prayer.

The Revised Version gives a more correct rendering used in the first clause. The A. V. reads "not slothful in business." The word "business" is a misleading term as it seems to refer to the occupation by which a man gains his livelihood.

In these verses we have described the general character of the Christian life. Three very important views are put forth. First: Life should be neither aimless nor selfish. Second: Life should be consciously and deliberately a service rendered to the Lord Jesus. Third: Our service rendered to Christ should be an acknowledgement of his incomparable service rendered to us.

IN DILIGENCE NOT SLOTHFUL:—There is no limitation to the scope of diligence. "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might." Ecc. 9: 10.

Whether the sphere of your activity be at home or at church, or in what is called secular life, the same rule applies. We should keep in mind two great thoughts in all our labor for the Lord. First: Our responsibility to God. Second: The near approach of our Lord. "That ye may approve the things that are excellent; that ye may be sincere and void of offence unto the day of Christ." Phil. 1: 10. Work as if all depends upon you. Pray as if all depends upon God. "And let us not be weary in well doing for in due season we shall reap if we faint not." Gal. 6: 9.

FERVENT IN SPIRIT: SERVING THE LORD:—The word fervent applies to water which is heated to the boiling point. Now if water be placed in an open vessel and if heat be applied to it, it soon evaporates in the air—in homely language it boils away—and the heat applied, the fuel consumed have served no useful purpose. But let the water be poured into the boiler of a steam engine, and then let the furnace be heated. What now will be the result? The fervor becomes power, the expansion of the steam brings motion, the machinery begins to act and some useful result is secured. Just so in the spiritual realm or Christian service. Let us have warmth of devotion, love to Christ the Saviour, zeal in the service of God. What now will be the result? I leave you to judge. Sad the condition of many in our C. E. societies is so that they must be accounted lukewarm. How such a condition must grieve the Holy Spirit and the heart of our Heavenly Father be hurt. When we are careless as to our spiritual condition, indifferent to God's Word and to the exercises of prayer and praise, irregular in our attendance to church services, slow to reform and quick to censure our neighbor's faults, slothful in our service rendered to Christ and his cause it cannot but be presumed that we are wanting in fervor of spirit. There is but one remedy. We must draw near to the Savior from whom we have wandered. Repent, renew our first love, and first works. Then our labor shall be no longer cold and mechanical but it shall be rendered gratefully and joyfully. Then when the Lord comes will we be able to hear him say, "Well done thou good and faithful servant, thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." Matt. 25: 21.

PATIENT IN TRIBULATION:—Our life is not altogether in our own hands. We cannot govern and control all that concerns us. We have all to learn the lesson that Divine Providence has appointed for us not only to work but to submit, that we have not only to serve but suffer. Let us look at Jesus our example for a moment. "He came not to be ministered unto, but to minister and give his life a ranson for many." Matt. 20: 28. He served the people but not without suffering. He groaned in the spirit and was troubled at the tomb of Lazarus. This gives us a picture of his human nature. He suffered the agony of Gethsemane and the tortures of the cruel cross.

"Must Jesus bear the cross alone
And all the world go free?
No, there's a cross for everyone
And there's a cross for me."

Patience suffers without murmuring. Patience waits for the relief which in due time Providence will send. Suffering and waiting complete this unusual virtue. Patience is a fruit of our fellowship with Christ. There was no quality for which our Savior was more to be admired than for his patience. Patience with the misunderstanding of his own disciples. Patience with his enemies and murderers. Patient under insult and agony. In all this he is our example and blessed Hope.

REJOICING IN HOPE:—This thought is placed after patience in tribulation because of the joy it brings to one in tribulation. Every truly born again child of God has two hopes ever before him to cheer him in tribulation and to set stronger his faith in God, the Bible and Jesus Christ. The first of these two hopes is the hope of eternal life which God who cannot lie promised before the foundation of the world. Tit. 1: 2. "These things have I written unto you that believe on the name of the Son of God; that ye may know that ye have eternal life, and that ye may believe on the Son of God." I. John 5: 13. The second hope is the hope of our Lord's return.

"Let not your heart be troubled ye believe in God believe also in me. In my Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself that where I am there ye may be also." John 14: 1-3. "Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." Acts 1: 11. This was the glorious hope which Christ left his disciples before he left this earth and Paul in writing to Titus about 60 years after speaks of looking for that blessed hope. "Looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God, and our Savior Jesus Christ. "Tit. 2: 13. What a glorious hope we have in Christ. Let us as Young People take hold of this precious hope which is being so much ridiculed these days and make it part of our lives. By so doing we purify ourselves. "Beloved now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that when he shall appear we shall be like him for we shall see him as he is. And every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as he is pure." I John 3: 2, 3. Then we will be able to give a reason to the world for the hope within us. "But sanctify the Lord God in your hearts; and be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason for the hope that is in you with meekness and fear." I Pet. 3: 15. "Even so, Come Lord Jesus, Come quickly." Rev. 22: 20. A good book on the Second Coming of our Lord is, "Jesus is Coming," by W. E. Blackstone.

BY CONTINUING STEADFASTLY IN PRAYER:—By prayer patience is perfected and hope inspired. It is evident that the admonition to prayer is introduced here with a special purpose in view. It is intended to point out to us that the demeanor here commended can only be maintained through cultivating a prayerful spirit. It is not easy, whilst pursuing this pilgrimage to be patient amidst its difficulties, to be joyful when the present is dark and the ray of hope alone illuminates the night. Still, though not easy it is possible. That is to say it becomes possible by prayer. Grace can be obtained, if sought in God's appointed way, but it must be sought not occasionally, or fitfully, but steadfastly, preservingly, constantly, habitually. There is every inducement in the declaration and promises of God's Word to "Pray without ceasing," "always to pray and not to faint." God's fatherly heart does not cease to pity. Christ does not cease to intercede for his people. As long as our Lord is on the throne of power we are in poverty and need and helplessness.

Let us as Brethren Christian Endeavorers pray as never before for deeper consecration to the Master. Then our Societies will be blessed and stengthened and souls will be won to the Lord Jesus.

German Beer Making American Biers

BY REV. JAMES H. DARLINGTON

America is in this war to perish or to win;
To hear her call and not to help is now a deadly sin.
A million boys have left our shores to conquer or to die,
And everyone must give and save, or tell the reason why.
But while loyal women knit, and all patriots do their bit,
Drinking toasts of "Hoch der Kaiser," secret gangs of plotters sit:
Where the spy, the clacker, and the traitor poltroon,
Conspire every day in the German Beer Saloon.

To all who seek her shores we have given welcome warm,
Only asking that to Freedom's laws, like us they should conform.
No room here for red or black flags; only one, red, white and blue;
All poisoners and anarchists should have hanging for their due.
Too many ships have left our docks with time-bombs in their coal,
Too many powder mills blown up, with death for many a soul;
Because the spy, the slacker, and the enemy poltroon
Conspire every day in the German Beer Saloon.

We do not say it is a sin to drink a glass of beer,
But a great and constant peril is threatened us, now here.
Nine million loaves of bread a day are used to make the brew,
While our Allies, and our sons might starve before this battle's through.
Our ships are slow in being built, new airplanes do not come;
For we're short of workmen, iron, coal and lumber here at home.
Because the spy, the slacker and the enemy poltroon
Conspire every day in the German Beer Saloon.

Decline to drink e'en war's success in whisky, wine or beer;
When the grain and sweets of which it's made are costing lives so dear,
Of course not all in these saloons are traitors in this war,
But no patriot can lunch or smoke in these nests where vipers are.
Your boys at front, forswearing booze, are facing death for you,
And you cannot chum with plotters, and to your flag be true.
Drop the spy, the slacker and traitor poltroon.
Plotting 'gainst our daughters and our sons in a brothel Deutsch Saloon.

When this holy war is over we can do then as we will;
When incendiaries burn our food is no time for sitting still.
Pass the law to hang the spy; pass prohibition too;
Arrest the Prussian plotters and be quick with what you do.
Each day's delay costs scores of lives, perhaps your son or mine;
"Clean out the foreign traitors," shouts back our firing line;
Till the spy, the traitor, and the enemy poltroon
Conspire no more in our myriad Deutsch Saloon.

Can the Church Make Good?

BY REV. CHAS. STELZLE

It really doesn't matter very much whether a particular denomination shall live or die. That isn't the point. It must be remembered always that the church is simply a means to an end, and not an end in itself. Our chief concern should be not whether the church makes good, but whether the people make good. We are to build up the people—that is our business as a church. If the church can "make good" in this respect, it will justify itself. If it fails here, organization, buildings, equipment, wealth and worship, will be of no avail. If it is successful at this point, all the rest will have been worth while.

The church must therefore get into "the labor game." It has a vital interest here. There are those who are saying that the church should occupy itself exclusively with the hereafter, or with the sweet nothings which appeal only to dreamers and mollycoddles. But the history of the church has shown that its best leaders in every generation have been men who have suffered and died for the people. Its finest periods in history have been those when in spite of poverty and persecution, it stood bravely to its task in the fight for democracy.

Before the world recognizes the justice of the demands of the workers, many a martyr will give his life, a sacrifice for the common weal. The church will offer its company of volunteers for this great struggle. For the teachings of Jesus are such that unless men are absolutely false to them, they cannot but hear the cries of little children, of suffering women, of gray-blooded men, who are dying because of the greed of the godless, and the recklessness of the powerful.

Here's where the church can "make good." And if it does—and I believe it will—its future glory will be far greater than its past.

The Sunday School

More Teacher Training Graduates

Ohio contributes two more classes to the increasing number of teacher training graduates. Both were organized last year. In February the class at completed "Preparation for teaching by Oliver. Desiring the assistance of the writer their graduation was deferred until April 14th, the Sunday preceding the Fremont conference. The day was beautiful, and closed with a very interesting commencement. The church was appropriately decorated with flowers, Sunday school and College pennants. Those graduating were: Joseph Kerr, the superintendent, Mabel Priest, Mrs. Bessie Erlaten, Mrs. Tillie Connin and Leafa Lett. Their faithful teacher was Brother Maus, the pastor, who was working hard to lead his people to larger victories. It was a real pleasure to share the fellowship of Brother Maus and his good wife in their comfortable home, the new parsonage built during their pastorate. We also enjoyed a brief visit in the hospitable home of Brother Brown and family.

Gretna, Ohio

For more than a year this rural school maintained a training class which met at the church every two weeks on the Sunday when there was no preaching. The teachers were Mesdames A. J. Neer and E. F. Miller, both of whom had completed the First and Advanced courses. As the fruitage of their earnest efforts they had the joy of seeing seven persons graduate in "Preparation for Service" on the 5th of May. The graduates were: Margaret and Helen Bayer, Mrs. Ruth Nogle, Esta Neer, Monna Buchenroth, Mrs. Pearl Hudson, Emery Hudson. On account of illness the last named was unable to be present, but had prepared an interesting class history which was read by Helen Bayer. Brother James Hudson motored me from and to the station and entertainment was provided in the home of Brother A. J. Neer. These loyal people are faithfully maintaing a work with a future, theirs being the only church in the township. While Brother Deeter, the pastor, was absent by reason of evangelistic services at his own church, he is an energetic booster of the Sunday school as well as every department of the church.

Plans in both of these schools call for classes in the new Three Year course. May they be fully realized, for the best trained teachers are none too good.

World Wide Sunday School News

Part of a thrilling letter, full of human interest, from Rev. Stephen Trowbridge, Field Secretary for Moslem Lands, of the World's Sunday School Association. Mr. Trowbridge is also Secretary of the Relief Committee in charge of the distribution of supplies of food to the needy in Palestine. The letter was written from Cairo, Egypt. More than $50,000 are distributed monthly.

Mr. Frank L. Brown, General Secretary. March 13, 1918

"In Jerusalem I found the poorer people in desperate straits, their clothing reduced to rags and the bread sold in the bakeries at eight or ten times the normal prices, of a coarse and heavy variety. A great many of the middle-class and well to do people have been reduced by Turkish war-taxes and injustice to a state of poverty. In the Armenian monastery I found 612 exiles from Adana and Aintab; many of these people recognized me at once from an acquaintance in Turkey and crowded around me with tears and words of welcome. One after onother began to tell the tragic stories of loved ones who had died on the march southward or who had been banished to the wilderness of Mesopotamia.

We are opening up women's and girl's industries for 800 of the destitute people and hope to extend this to include 3,000 within the next month or two. We have offered to take Government contracts for making Army shirts, mending socks and mosquito nets, and for furnishing British Red Cross supplies. A great many people in Jerusalem have urged us to start soup-kitchens in different parts of the city, but I strongly believe in industrializing the relief work so as to make soup-kitchens unnecessary except for the very aged and crippled and other people incapacitated from work. Jerusalem is a wonderful old city and everyone now is filled with hope in the straightforward and just administration of the British. We have at all points received the encouragement of British officers, many of whom take a personal interest in the relief work. Our medical director is Major Scrimegour of the Military Governor's staff in Jerusalem. Next Wednesday Mrs. Trowbridge and I are returning to Jerusalem for a month's work after which we must be back in Cairo for May and June so as to keep up the lines of Sunday school service which we have started.

I enclose herewith a copy of the cablegram from Mr. Lansing, the Secretary of State, to which I have not yet replied. The request that I should serve as Director of Supplies and Transport for the American Red Cross Commission of fifty doctors and nurses calls for a clear decision. The members of our Sunday School Advisory Committee agree with me that if some American business man, sympathetic with the missionary work, could be found for this post it would be better for me to keep to the Sunday school work during this coming year and to assist Bishop MacInnes to the Palestine Relief work for only a few weeks at a time. It is extremely difficult to find the right man for this post. I think the best thing will be to ask the Commission to set apart one or two of their Commission to do this work of forwarding the supplies from Egypt; but at least Mr. Hoyman and I must meet the party when they arrive at Port Said about the first of May. I think the cablegram implies that a salary would be paid for this post so if I accepted it I should not be drawing any Sunday school salary for one year, but the whole point is that the Sunday school work would be interrupted and the work of our newly appointed Field Secretary for Egypt, Mr. Mitry Dewairy, would not be as efficient as if we were working together throughout that time. I have prayed earnestly about this matter and feel that on the whole it would be better for me not to accept unless Mr. Davison of the National Red Cross has a personal conference with you and secures my release for one year.

Our Relief Staff in Jerusalem have agreed to remember daily the words of Isaiah 61:3, so that in the pressure of the day's work, and in the midst of throngs of people, we may deal patiently and kindly, interpreting to those who have suffered the compassion and faithfulness of Christ. There are many trying experiences in the Relief Work and some of the people are hard to satisfy. During February we had nearly 20 days of rain, our supplies of rice became soaked through in transit from Egypt and we had to work very hard to dry out the rice lest it should spoil; during the month we completed the distribution of 300 tons. This really saved the city from famine, for the Military Governor told me on my arrival that the rations then at hand were sufficient for three or four days only; two days later our supplies of rice began to arrive from Egypt. Often in the evenings I walked over to the Mount of Olives and into the Garden of Gethsemane, and I thought of the old days when David first conquered the stronghold of the Jebusites; I also thought of what John Ruskin says somewhere in "Modern Painters," that the "highest use of the imagination is to reproduce the scenes of our Redeemer's Life." Every week day was crowded full of relief work, but Sundays I had an opportunity to visit the Sunday schools which had pluckily held on during all the hard times under the Turks. The School at the American Colony has never missed a Sunday and same is true of the Blind School under Miss Lovell. Miss Lovell is one of the two English women who stayed on through the three years of war; again and again the Turks threatened to take her house and turn her out on the street but in each case God mercifully overruled the threat. Two Sunday afternoons I spoke to the girls in this school; it was a great inspiration to listen to their singing; they know English better than any pupils I have met in the Near East. The Arabic-speaking church founded by the Christian Alliance has also kept up the Sunday schools, most of the pupils being Armenian refugees. The large German industrial orphanages maintain Lutheran Sunday schools. It is possible that our Relief Fund may take over all the work of these German schools in the course of the next few months. I found the Syrian congregations very much broken down through poverty and lack of missionary direction, but a fresh start is being made with a remarkable energy at certain points. St. George's Boys' School in Jerusalem on the day that it re-opened in February received 230 boys; Mr. Reynolds, a personal friend of mine, is the headmaster. During April we plan to organize a Sunday school for these boys. We cannot yet send through large supplies but small packages can go by post. In this way our Arabic publications can be sent in small amounts to many Sunday schools in Palestine; all of them being Arabic-speaking our literature from Cairo will meet the need."

Faithfully yours,

(Signed) STEPHEN TROWBRIDGE.

P. S. You may be interested to know that I am twice offered the post of Food Controller for Jerusalem and vicinity, with a captaincy on the Military Governor's staff. But I have felt that my is to continue in my present Sunday school work.

REVIEW OF

The Thought and Work of the Church

AND THE END IS NOT YET. A number of churches have determined to still win a place on the Evangelist Honor Roll before the meeting of the Winona Conference and we are willing to help them all we can to win the place for it is mutual helpfulness. The more we are able to do for them the more they are able to do for us, and we feel that we all need whatever help we may be able to render each other.

The church that wins a place on the Honor Roll this week is one of the smallest in the state of Indiana, but "He that is least among you" may become the greatest through service. This is the New Highland congregation near Akron, Indiana that has won this distinction. D. A. C. Teeter is the pastor and A. E. Dickerhoff is the faithful representative of the Evangelist. Two years ago this church stated to us that every family belonging to the church was receiving the Evangelist, but one year ago a number dropped out. However every family in the church is now on the list once more and we are glad to welcome them if the list is not so large.

Brother W. H. Beachler has been so busy traveling up and down the hills of Somerset county, Pennsylvania in the canvass for the College, and incidentally eating those Pennsylvania Dutch dinners, that he says he has not yet found time to make a report of the work for the last two weeks, but he promises a full report for next week, and in the meantime he authorizes us to state that the Meyersdale circuit will go beyond SIX THOUSAND dollars for permanent endowment. We see now where some of our other strong charges will have to make a new estimate of what they are going to contribute, if they wish to reach the high standard they have set for their contribution to this fund.

It is very seldom that we receive any reports from the Third Brethren church of Philadelphia, but according to what we learn from the report we have this week it is not because this congregation is not doing a good work. The report shows this church is active in every way and we are sure there are many things of interest that could be reported more frequently, and the columns of the Evangelist are always open.

In a former announcement of the time of meeting of the Maryland-Virginia conference the date was not given to us correctly, but a correction is made in this number of the Evangelist by the secretary, E. M. Riddle. Please read his announcement and act accordingly.

Peru, Indiana has just passed through a union evangelistic effort that did not meet with as hearty a response from some of the Peru churches as it should have had and consequently its effectiveness was greatly lessened. But the "Little Brown Church" on the corner is still busy about the Master's business and making earnest efforts to reach worth-while goals.

The Whole Gospel Mission of Philadelphia and the pastor, I. D. Bowman were greatly disappointed that E. L. Miller was called from the very midst of an evangelistic meeting for them to return to his home because of serious illness in his family. And yet, Brother Bowman says the meeting was a great success. Only four members were added to the church, but the pastor feels that there was a greater good than this accomplished by Brother Miller and by his preaching. Brother Bowman is now engaged in a meeting at Brush Valley, Pennsylvania and expects to hold another meeting soon in Kittanning. Brother Bowman has visited these places before and is expecting good results from these meetings.

The work at North Liberty, Indiana is constantly going forward under the leadership of C. C. Grisso. Since the last report from this place fourteen members have been added to this church and two more are now awaiting baptism. Brother Grisso has been called to serve as pastor of this church for another year. The proposition he makes to the weak and struggling churches that may need help in an evangelistic meeting has the right ring to it and should most certainly be snatched up quickly by some church or churches. Brother Grisso and the Sunday school superintendent, L. L. Kilmer, are great boosters for the Evangelist, and subscriptions received now from this church are only until the end of this year as they hope to win a place on the Honor Roll at the beginning of the year 1919. We wish them success.

After spending four months at work on his new field at Cerro Gordo, Illinois, H. E. Eppley tells of the work and the prospects of this field, but he does not forget the church he left to take up a work in this new field, and consequently we have a brief report of his closing work at Philadelphia and for the few months between that time and the time he entered upon his duties in his new field. It was our privilege to hold a meeting for the Cerro Gordo churches fifteen years ago and we feel certain Brother Eppley will find them a delightful people to work with. If we were to offer any suggestions it would be to look after the Evangelist subscription list soon. This church like many others has not yet reached the place it should occupy and here is a chance to win a place on the Honor Roll.

Sometimes we say people from Missouri have to be shown, but the letter from Sister Jennie Woods of Powersville that state "shows us." We have an idea the Easter offerings for foreign missions would have been considerably larger had every country church in the brotherhood followed the plan of the sisters at Powersville for securing money for this offering. We think it is far ahead of oyster suppers for such purposes.

M. A. Witter has most pleasant news to report this week. He has recently paid a visit to Brother Lyon and his work in Washington, D. C., and he finds the outlook most encouraging. To those of us who have watched the struggles of this work at long range for the past fifteen years or more it seems good to have reports of the growing prosperity of the Lord's work in the capital city. The one happy event above all others in Brother Witter's visit was the ordination of Brother Lyon's son Quinter to the ministry. Thus another talented young life has been consecrated to the service of the Lord.

Mrs. Drushall's report from Lost Creek shows that the churches have not forgotten the needs of this field and that they are making an earnest endeavor to supply them. One of the most pleasing features of this report is the announcement that seven of the students of Lost Creek have offered themselves as life-work recruits. There is a wide field for workers in the Kentucky mountains and certainly a larger oumber of native workers would mean greater progress for the work. Brother Carpenter has sent us an urgent appeal which reached us just too late for this number of the paper, in which he calls for school teachers for the work at Lost Creek and Krypton. Who will hear and heed this call?

Brother A. E. Thomas' report tells of the last three meetings of his evangelistic work for the winter. One of his latest successful meetings was that at New Lebanon, Ohio, where forty-six conversions are reported, and forty-three of the number have already been received into the church by baptism.

This week we publish letters from both Mrs. Gribble and Miss Snyder who are now somewhere in the interior of Africa. Miss Snyder writes at leagth of the events of their journey and Mrs. Gribble writes for the little folks.

From faraway Canada Brother Flora comes once again with a letter which speaks of the spiritual dearth in that northern land of the pioneers. This may be an extremely difficult field for Christian work but undoubtedly the work needs to be done by somebody to keep the people from falling back into the ways of the natives of the country.

The announcement made on another page by the C. E. state secretary, Dyoll Belote, in regard to the coming great convention at Newark should receive the attention of every Brethren Endeavor society in the state.

Blind Leading the Blind

One of the habits certain people who would give a literal interpretation to every statement made in the Bible, especially to the words spoken by Jesus, is that of becoming so extremely literal that they destroy the force and beauty of his words. And sometimes such ones accuse those who may hold to an opposite belief of being unbelievers and infidels. It never pays to be too positive in asserting that those who do not agree with us are wrong in their beliefs as there is always a possibility that we may be as much wrong in some of our beliefs as we think others are in theirs. So in our judgment of the methods of interpretation employed by other sincere seekers after the truth we should be charitable, remembering the words of Jesus, "As ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so unto them." Thus if a brother wishes to give a spiritual interpretation to a passage of scripture that we have always considered to be properly interpreted only when taken in its literal sense, let us regard him as being honest at least.

One who insists upon always giving a literal interpretation to the words of Jesus opens the way for another to charge Jesus with being inconsistent in his teaching for there are exceptions to many rules he laid down, if these rules are always to be taken in their literal sense.

As an illustration consider the statement Jesus made in regard to the teachers of Israel that Jesus regarded as "blind guides" and of whom he said, "and if the blind lead the blind shall they not both fall into the ditch?" The spiritual application of this statement is clearly a forceful one but its literal application could easily be refuted. Only a few weeks ago an incident occurred in New York that demonstrated the folly of making a strict literal application of such statements. A fire broke out in a home for blind children in Brooklyn. One little blind girl, only nine years of age was awakened by the smoke, but in spite of her blindness she went from room to room awakening other blind children, gathering them together in the hall until she had all upon the second floor of the building out of their rooms, then she led them safely down the stairway and out into the open air before the officials of the home were awakened from their slumbers.

According to the interpretation of the strict literalist this blind girl should have led the sixteen children she aroused from their sleep into certain destruction, but instead in spite of her blindness she led them to safety.

It has been observed by good teachers of the Bible that the pressing of any figure of speech or of the application of any parable too far destroys the force of the teaching and falls short of the true meaning of the Great Teacher, thus the great beauty found in some of the saylings of Jesus is marred when we try to force meanings into them that the Master himself did not have in mind as he spoke them.

War Sermons

According to some writers there have been altogether too many war-sermons preached by the pastors of the American churches for the good of the cause; and yet it is pointed out that to discourage such preaching would smack of a lack of patriotism. A writer in the Christian Intelligencer (New York) attempts to draw a distinction between what he regards as proper or improper methods of pulpit treatment of the great questions that have grown out of the war. A re-hash of the day's news mixed with imprecations against the Germans is strongly condemned while it is recommended that the minister find "material for expounding, illustrating and enforcing the gospel of Christ." According to this writer the preacher's message "must thunder above the din of battle and come from loftier regions than even an aero-squadron." Preaching about the war has one meaning to one man and to another man an altogether different meaning, and the way the subject is treated in his sermon may well be regarded as an index to the mind of the preacher in regard to his attitude toward the great war. The writer to whom we have referred says:

"A sermon about the war may be merely a reportorial re-hash of newspaper talk. It may be a catalog of horrors and a cry for vengeance. It may be a mere bid for popularity. There may be no religion in it, no spiritual interpretation, no lofty insight into the deeper issues of the Kingdom of God involved. It may be an easy way of discharging the preaching function, a ready refuge for indolence and superficiality. To preach about the war may mean the advocacy of the pet theories of fanatic speculative prophets. The war offers plenty of scope to those who do not seem to understand the purpose of their high calling.

"Should ministers preach about the war? Yes, certainly, if they preach like prophets, if they are spiritual seers, if they seek eye to eye with Christ. If they can enforce the teachings of the Bible by reference to the war, if they can show the myriad applications and implications of Christianity in the light of the great world-tragedy, let them speak. If they can use the world-war to show the penalty of forgetting God, and the bane of ignoring Christ, and the exceeding sinfulness of sin, and the destructiveness of selfishness and materialism, let their voices be unto the sons of men. If they have a new vision of duty, responsibility, and privilege, and a profound sense of immediate and unparalleled spiritual opportunity, the church and the world must hear it. If they find in the tragic horror of universal strife a commentary on God's Word beside which the International Critical Commentary's conclusions are like a wreath of mist, in that case, let the prophet have the floor and let all the earth keep silence before him. If his windows are open to Jerusalem and he kneels three times a day for commerce with the sky, let his herald voice proclaim the message of the King of Heaven. But let him eschew geography and mathematics and the newspapers and the symbols of recondite prophecy, and let him speak as one who has been the guest of our great Lord Christ."

Paul had a thorn in his flesh, observes the writer, but he did not preach the thorn. The world and the church now has its thorn in its side; but, speaking for preachers, the thorn is now our theme:

"It is Christ, only Christ, the Christ who alone can remove the thorn or who may allow it still to abide until we drink more deeply of his sustaining grace.

"The war has its place in present-day preaching, but not the place of the first-born. It furnishes material for expounding, illustrating, and enforcing the gospel of Christ. It sheds interpreting light on the facts we are set to preach. It supports the claims of Christ. It is an instantly available commentary on the truth of scripture. If, as Dr. Burrel has pointed out in his book on 'The Sermon,' a sermon is 'a thrust,' what 'a thrust' at sin and what 'a thrust' for Christ. Keep the pulpit high. Let it stand in the sunlight and in the free air of heaven."

A Comparison of Boys

To the one who holds to the belief of some juvenile specialists that there is no such thing as a "bad" boy it may not seem worth while to make any comparison; but to others the boy problem is both a sociological and religious one seeking a practical solution. To close one's eyes to this fact is like refusing to believe there is any such thing as a tornado even while the "funnel-shaped" cloud is sweeping over the country.

"Boys will be boys" is an old saying that means much or means nothing according to the way it is interpreted. If the boy is "father to the man," then we are justified in fearing the future manhood of many sections of the country, unless adequate steps are taken by the church and society to in some way modify the influences that are strongest in developing modern boy character. The problem of juvenile delinquency has become a serious one in all the warring countries of Europe, but for all this a very natural cause has been assigned. While America has been spared thus far some of the conditions which contribute to the delinquency of the boys of Europe we dare not feel too confident that a few years more of the war will not result in similar conditions arising in our own country. But as it is there seems to be a marked difference in the moral conduct of American boys in the different centers of population. A New York paper seems proud to mention the fact that New York boys are better behaved than their near neighbors in Jersey City or Newark. Mr. C. J. Atkinson, executive secretary of the Boys'

Items Gleaned from The Missionary Review of the World

The Future of Morocco

A Scotch military officer, in addressing the Royal Geographical Society on his travels in Morocco, said:

"The climate of the Morocco coast is ideal, with the temperature seldom over seventy degrees in the summer or under sixty degrees in the winter. There is sufficient rainfall; and the crops even under native methods are surprisingly rich. Under proper cultivation the wilderness will blossom like a rose and this country may well become one of the granaries of the world. The system of native government has always retarded, and in fact almost prevented, any development. If a native became too rich and prosperous he was promptly robbed by the neighboring Khaids, who in their turn were robbed by the Sultan, and there was therefore no incentiven to progress. Under French protection, all this will be changed. There are also undoubtedly large deposits of copper and other minerals in the mountains as yet unworked."

One of the principal means of developing the country will, of course, be railways, and there already exist 773 kilometres of railway in Morocco, exclusive of railways under construction.

African Self-Denial

The following letter was written to the Treasurer of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society by a boy in a mission school in West Africa, as spokesman for his fellows:

"To the Honorable Treasurer: We, the Edwaleni boys, beg to lay in your hands this little amount of money which we collected by denying some of our meat and sugar, and some of us paid some few copper coins to raise it to $5.50, so that the Gospel might be disseminated until it reaches those who are still in the shadow of darkness. We are longing so much to enable some one to go and bring in the Master's sheep who have wandered away.

There are only forty-six boys and three teachers in our school. Among these, thirty-two made up their minds to serve the Lord in this way of denying themselves something. Our school is a Christian school. Almost everybody professes to love Jesus Christ. . . . Our self-denial week has been one of our good ones. Everybody felt that he was doing something for his Savior. God had been very close to us. Our school work did not seem to press us very much during the week and the marks were ne very many. It is hard to express the mood in which the boys have been. During their fasting they were happier than they ever had been."

The Test of War in Camerun

The development of the American Presbyterian Mission in Kamerun is one of the most inspiring stories in modern missionary annals. No better proof of the vitality of the self-supporting, self-governing native church which has been established there could be found than the way in which it has met the test of war. At the beginning of the war the mission stations were seized by the German government and their funds confiscated. The mission report says: "Except for the presence of the warring armies the country was depopulated. For over a year it was so. What a time it was! Families separated never to be united, sickness, hunger, starvation and death."

For eighteen months this continued, then the tide of war passed on and Kamerun had a chance to take stock of the damage done.

It is estimated that not more than six per cent fell away from the church during those frightful months, while more than 3,000 new members were received. The contributions of the native church more than doubled those of any previous year, so that evangelization could be continued though no financial help was possible from outside. The first request which got through from Kamerun after the Allied armies entered was not for money, it was to "Hurry up order for the Bulu gospels!"

Why Africans Become Moslems

What is involved for the African in becoming a Moslem? This is how one missionary answers the question:

Islam presents itself here as a series of practices that appeal to the African because they make no moral demand. The hardest custom is that of fasting from food and drink during daylight hours in the month of Ramazan. A Moslem teacher admitted that Islam was powerless to change a bad man into a good one, and did not try. It was equally powerless, he confessed, to improve character by means of food laws and other external rites, for a man who lied and cheated before Ramazan did the same afterwards, and to stop eating field-mice never stopped any one coveting his neghbor's property. God, who to a heathen is a reality but of unknown character, remains the same to a Moslem, unless his character suffers by his being made the author of unreasonable commands. The life and doings of Muhammad himself are unknown. The old character, fears and motives remain the same. Seriousness, holiness, the gravity of big issues, none of these suggests itself in the common attitude of a Moslem. The people who become Moslems for the most part merely add on new and interesting customs to their old ways without receiving any inner cleansing or learning to know God personally.

The Kru's Thirst for Knowledge

In Africa, when it rains, it rains. The sky just opens itself and empties itself in one operation. But rain cannot keep Kru boys and girls away from school. Slates carried on top of their heads make excellent umbrellas for the mission girls. Banana leaves serve the same purpose for the town children. One ambitious boy was in the habit of swimming a deep river with his books in a toy canoe by his side. When it rained, the canoe was held over the books to shield them, the boy didn't care about keeping himself dry.

From a town four miles distant, a young man walked in to school every morning, rain or shine. His lunch—often his only meal until night time—consisted of half a cocoanut, sometimes one green banana. Yet never have we heard a complaint from his lips. Now we have found room for him at the Mission and he is making progress in his studies.

To further a working use of the new language, English, all our Kru boys and girls are required to write a brief letter every day to their teachers. One of the subjects assigned was "The Mission." One bright Kru boy began his letter with the statement—"The Mission forces you to do everything you don't want to do." Isn't that deliciously human?

African Tests for Church Membership

The requirements for church membership which are enforced by the Presbyterian missionaries on the Congo are sufficiently severe to make the relation with the church indicate an intellectual as well as a moral achievement.

Before applicants for admission into the church can be admitted to communion, they must commit to memory, besides the Shorter Catechism, the following Pslams: 1, 23, 32, 37 and 51; the entire Sermon on the Mount, as given in Matthew 5 to 7; the third and fourteenth chapters of John; the twelfth chapter of Romans; and the thirteenth chapter of I Corinthians. After all of this has been creditably recited, the applicants are still kept on probation for a period of three months, to show by their constant life that they understand what they have learned, and the seriousness of the steps they are about to take. Naturally those of old age cannot commit the above to memory as easily as can the young, and their examination is not so rigid, but recently seven old men were admitted to full membership, who had persistently and continuously studied these requirements for five weary years in order to become communicants.

A Mary Slessor Memorial

Akpap is the principal town of the upriver people who first heard the Gospel from Miss Mary Slessor. Although this district is one of pagan people and wild bush, two women live there in honor and safety, and evangelize the district around them. There is no man missionary, but one of the women acts as pastor, preaching in Efik. The people are greatly interested in the Slesor Memorial Home, and have sent nearly $100 towards that fund.

Attention Ohio Brethren Endeavorers

At the late Brethren State conference at Fremont the undersigned was elected to serve as secretary of Christian Endeavor work for the Ohio district. It becomes necessary therefore that some announcements should be made at once, relative to the work of Christian Endeavor among the Brethren churches of Ohio.

In the first place your secretary would like the names of all corresponding secretaries of Brethren C. E. societies in Ohio. This is necessary to the largest success of the plans which will be formulated in the near future.

Another matter of interest to your secretary is whether you are trying to reach the goals of the denomination and also of the United Society and the Ohio State C. E. Union. If you do not know what these are you can easily find out by addressing me.

And all Ohio Endeavor workers should be planning to attend the annual State C. E. convention which meets in Newark, June 25 to 28. This promises to be a great convention and there is no society, however strong, which could not receive—and which would not receive added impetus in its endeavors toward all desirable goals by having several delegates at Newark.

NOW—

Let those corresponding secretaries' names reach me real soon; Write for a list of the different denominational and other goals: MARK YOUR CALENDAR ON JUNE 25 to 28 for NEWARK.

DYOLL BELOTE,

Lost Creek, Kentucky

The following things have been received since Miss Pence's report several months ago:

One barrel clothing, set of Bible books and comfort from Sisterhood girls, Elkhart, Indiana. Barrel clothing from Mrs. H. G. Moser, Uniontown, Pa.; Ten dollars for Neice children's tuition from Brother and Sister Bemenderfer, Goshen, Indiana. Barrel clothing and fruit, the barrel containing a suit of clothing for Mr. Drushal, from Uniontown, Pennsylvania; barrel clothing and box of toys from Mr. and Mrs. L. C. Moore, Marianna, Pennsylvania; Box clothing and toys, Sisterhood Long Beach, California; Package of towels, Sisterhood, Bryan, Ohio. Splendid Christmas box containing eatables, handkerchiefs, stockings, etc., from S. S. of North Manchester, Indiana. Barrel clothing, one comfort, two pillows and pillow slips from Ladies' Aid, Hagerstown, Maryland; Five dollars from Sisterhood girls of Hagerstown, Maryland for Domestic Science; Box of candy for the teachers, J. J. Lillie, Jenny Lind, California; Package of "Everyland" magazines from M. A. Morrill, Coverdale, Alberta, Canada; Nine towels, Sisterhood, Eaton, Indiana; Barrel "White Gifts" from S. S., Maurertown, Virginia; 110 pounds dried peaches for dormitory, from Lordsburg, California; Barrel clothing with eatables from Warsaw, Indiana; Two comforts from S. S. C. E., Louisville, Ohio; Barrel clothing, one comfort, one dozen towels from S. S. C. E. of Carleton, Nebraska; Drinking fountain valve, set of books and magazines from O. W. Clemmer, Claypool, Indiana; $10 for self from Mrs. Austin Miller, Meyersdale, Pennsylvania; $10 for the work from Mrs. P. Peterson, Torrant, California; $20 for farm seeds of C. E. of Carleton, Nebraska; Eight towels, 7 rolls bandages, Sunnyside, Washington; $1 for self from Mrs. D. C. Swonger, Tiosa, Indiana; A fine lot of flower seed from Mrs. Bettie Oram, Logansport, Indiana. Vegetable seeds from Louisville, Ohio. A pair of blankets and some towels were received from California, but when the package reached us we could not quite make out the name of the sender. As we received no letter stating just who they were for, we presented them to the bride and groom, Mr. and Mrs. Bradfield, in the name of the unknown giver. As they are just starting out housekeeping on the Riverside Farm, we knew the giver would be glad to know they went to these faithful workers at Riverside.

A barrel of clothing was also received which had no identification marks on it. This came from either Claypool, Indiana, or Lanark, Illinois. To all the above givers we have written personally, but we want to add here that these gifts mean more to the work than perhaps some of you realize, and have truly been a great help. Some have asked the question, "Do you really want the clothing sent?" To which we answer, "yes, indeed." There has been a great demand for second hand clothing and there will undoubtedly be still a greater demand for it the coming year since none of us can scarcely afford to buy clothes any more.

The events of the last week of school, the helpful meeting of the Board, the peal of the wedding bells, etc., have all been mentioned before, but there is one thing which we consider the best news of all which I believe has not yet been reported. Before the close of school seven of our students who were already Christians dedicated their lives to Christ to be used in definite Christian service.

Brother Lambert, we are sorry this report was not sent in with the A. C. offerings for as we saw the list of life work recruits in the Evangelist, we would have been proud to have seen Lost Creek's seven listed among the number. These seven do not include those who have previously made this decision. Again we say that we feel that the results of each year's work among the students answers the questions as to why we spend as much money and time on the school as we do.

MRS. C. E. DRUSHAL.

Congratulations!

Announcements of the marriage of Mr. Everett A Myer to Miss Mary Asbury, which occurred on May 4th, have been received by their Christian Endeavor friends. Brother Myer will be remembered as our hustling Tenth Legion superintendent, and his co-workers join in extending heartiest congratulations and best wishes.

On the same day another attainment was recorded in the life-record of our successful Life Work Superintendent, Brother J. B. Lambert. In connection with his pastoral work at New Lebanon he has been pursuing studies in Bonebrake Theological Seminary at Dayton, and graduated from the regular course with the class of '18. His grades were uniformly high. Our Endeavorers whom he has served so unselfishly in the promotion of Ashland College Night rejoice with him in this added personal achievement.

A Letter to the Children

Loanda, Portuguese W. Africa.
February 23, 1918

Dear little friends at home:—I promised to write to you often, but only one letter has so far found its way to you. I wish you could see me now running around the broad veranda of the big mission house at St. Paul de Loanda. I am hand in hand with a little girl a few shades darker and a few inches taller than myself. My mamma is sitting in a rocking chair on the verandah, writing this for me, and every time I come where she is, I say, "Mamma, I am afraid." Do you know why I am afraid? It is because she is black. But mamma puts her arms around the little black girl, and pats her fat little hand and says, "What a nice little girl you are!" And so I go around the big veranda another time, wondering as I go, why she should be so black, and my own little hand should look so white as it lies in hers. Mamma tells me many things from the Bible about Jesus, and he is helping me to love this little black girl, who is indeed very kind to me. We have had a pleasant time here at Loanda, which is our second stop since we left New Orleans. I did not write you from Cape Town, but my mamma did, so I knew you would hear all about me. We had a little stop in two different harbors on our way up the West Coast. One was because our boat was leaking. The other was for cargo.

In Cape Town we had such a short stay, that I did not have time to go out anywhere and get acquainted. Mamma and Papa went out once for dinner, but they fed me first and put me to sleep. That was perhaps the best way to do, but I wonder if you would have liked it.

On the boat between Cape Town and Loanda I had a little playmate whose name is Charles Preston Hedges, Jr., but everyone called him by the name the African natives gave him, which is Lokange, whatever Lokange did, I did too, as he was just a year older.

Otherwise there were no children on the boat.

I want all the dear little children to pray for me that I may soon be a Christian and a true missionary.

We are very glad indeed to be in Africa, but mamma says she will be gladder still when at last we reach our destination, which may be a long time yet.

Aunt Estella and Aunt Mae (Miss Myers and Miss Snyder) send their love to you, as do papa and mamma and your own little

MARGUERITE.

One Way of Hearing a Call

A missionary was invited to address a children's meeting. She told the children about those other children who had never heard of the Savior. They listened eagerly. She showed them some interesting curios. They looked at them with keenest interest and touched them with wondering awe. She burned incense sticks to show how these other children worshiped their idols. She passed around some cakes she had brought from the mission station. Through each of the five senses she tried to interest the children in the dark-skinned people of her mission. They were interested. Their hearts were filled with sympathy for these other children who lived always in fear of evil spirits and they wanted to help them. When the missionary finished, the superintendent said, "We have been so happy to have our dear Mrs. Blank with us today to tell us these interesting stories. I am sure that all of us have enjoyed hearing her and that we are going to try to do more for the little children who have never heard of Jesus. All of you who are going to try, raise your hands."

Every little hand was raised. The children were sincere about it, but they must have been forced to the conclusion that the whole matter was disposed of by a raising of hands, for that was the last they ever heard of it, and all they ever did about it. The next missionary talk they heard could not make as deep an impression on them, and by and by the subtle insincerity ,which the Lord recognized in those who protested their love to him, yet did not the things that he said, will cloak them, unless a wiser teacher makes use of the sixth sense in their missionary training.

A Better Way

A missionary made a similar talk to another group of children. When she finished, the superintendent looked into the interested faces of her boys and girls and said:

"What can we do for these children who never heard of Jesus?' '

Up went a little hand.

"What is it, Robert?"

"Couldn't we pray for them?"

"Yes," said the superintendent. "Let us pray for them."

Reverently the little heads were bowed and reverently the children followed in the prayer as she led them.

"Is there anything else we can do?"

A hand wriggled violently and, in answer to the teacher's nod of recognition, the boy to whom the hand was attached said: "Say, if they had Bibles couldn't they read about Jesus?"

The speaker fairly beamed over the originality of his suggestion. He felt like the owner of the copyright. The superintendent beamed too.

"That would be one of the very best things to do —to send them Bibles," she said. "We can get Bibles in their own language now, so they can read them for themselves."

"How much will one cost?" instantly came inquiry from the originator of the plan.

"We can get a good Bible now for fifty cents," answered the missionary.

Quick as a flash a small brown hand dived down into a small brown pocket. There was no rattle of coins. Evidently there was nothing left to rattle when the triumphant hand came up, firmly grasping a half dollar.

"Get one," said the boy laconically, as he placed the coin in the missionary's hand.

"Wait a minute," said another boy, as he darted out of the door. In a few moments he was back again with fifty cents. "Father said he'd lend me this fifty cents until I got home to get it out of my bank. That'll get another Bible."

A little fellow sat looking wistfully at the two big, shining coins.

"Can you get just part of a Bible?" he asked timidly.

"To be sure you can," answered the missionary heartily. "You can get the Gospel of John for ten cents."

The boy's face shone as he put his hand in his pocket and drew out his dime.

"Could I send you some money to buy some Bibles?" asked another. The teacher wrote down the missionary's address on a card and gave it to the child.

"Now," she said, "is there anything else we can do?"

There was a moment's pause, as those earnest little hearts faced the great need of the world for Christ. Then a hand went up.

"Maybe," said a serious voice, "I could go over there when I am grown and tell them about Jesus as she did."

That missionary talk made an impression that will last. —Missionary Review.

Whole Gospel Mission, Philadelphia, Pa.

Dear Evangelist: —I have been neglecting writing but hope to do better in the future.

We just closed a three weeks' meeting. In some respects a better meeting than we expected, in other respects some what disappointing. Brother Ed. Miller, one of our spiritual begotten sons of the Whole Gospel Mission, preached for two weeks.

The first week it rained, snowed and stormed, all week, so that we did not get a good start until the second week .

The second week came up fine on the second Sunday we had the largest crowd we have had since the dedication of our church, six years ago. Then Ed. was suddenly summoned home on account of sickness and death in his family. A sad disappointment to us and to him.

I took up the work for the last week. Having preached here for sixteen years, I prepared sermons through the day and preached them at night. We had four additions to the church and we feel very sure that this was the smallest good.

Brother Ed. is indeed a powerful preacher. His splendid life and spiritual sermons did our church much good, but we and he were disappointed because of the sudden call home. It was not fair to him nor us, so we are praying that the Lord may send him back two weeks in the fall to finish the good work which he began.

We believe the splendid advertising he received while here will cause him to do us greater good than any other man in the brotherhood at the present time. While he gave us a great spiritual uplift and our brethren are better united than they have been for years, yet the dreaded summer slump is approaching, so that it is impossible to go forward much before early fall.

Our work is in a more healthy condition than it has been for years.

I was sorry that it was necessary for me to go away again for five or six weeks.

While our people give liberally, all are poor, and it is impossible for us to meet our finances. Hence the three clergymen in the church agreed to do the preaching free of charge while I would go into the evangelistic field and make up at least part of our deficit. Brethren, Ray, Bowers, and Tressler will ably fill the pulpit while I am away.

I began a meeting at Brush Valley, May first. I having preached two nights. The interest is good and the crowds are increasing. I will remain here at least two weeks. Brother Smith has this work in good shape, and we hope to have a good meeting. When this meeting closes we expect to go to Kittanning, Pennsylvania, where we expect to have a bright outlook for a strong Brethren church.

We preached here five nights before the holidays to crowded houses and reaped a small harvest and Brother Smith has been reaping right along.

Brethren, pray for these meetings.

Will write more soon.

ISAAC D. BOWMAN,
1942 S. 17th St., Philadelphia, Pa.

Peru, Indiana

Among the letters printed weekly from the various local churches, none has recently appeared from Peru, but the following will indicate that we are still on the map.

Under the aggressive leadership of our most efficient pastor, G. C. Carpenter, the following goals were agreed upon, as a working program from New Years' to Easter:

First—100 pupils in the Sunday school.

Second—15 new additions to the church.

Third—$1,000 in church building fund by May 12th.

We find it pays to set goals and work toward them, for we had 110 in Sunday school; added 16 to church membership and with the loyal support of the members will attain the $1,000 goal by May 12th.

Extremely cold winter weather, union mid-week prayer meetings, and a five weeks' union tabernacle evangelistic effort,—all disorganizing, yet notwithstanding these, the "Little Brown Church" has gone steadily forward, sowing and reaping in a manner that is quite satisfactory.

The union tabernacle effort, headed by Dr. M. P. Fikes, a mighty preacher of the Word, together with his most efficient corps of workers did not meet with a deserving response from churches and public. Although about five hundred "hit the trail," yet only a small number made our church their choice.

Now that the strenuous days of the union effort are past, every working branch of the church will be restored with added zeal to its normal working order. We have a new organization known as the "Soul Winners' League," in which fifty-six of our members have pledged every talent and opportunity to win souls to Christ. Plans for work are being laid out and much will be expected from the society.

Out Somewhere in U. S. A. Article 3—Over the Top

Since our last report we have fought the enemy and have won.

Middlebranch, Ohio:—The reports already given from here brought news of a wonderful victory. From the standpoint of the Evangelist the victory came as the result of the splendid co-operation of one of Ashland's boys, Brother Ed. Boardman, together with his faithful and loyal people who rallied to our support. Middlebranch was stirred by the power of God, which is still a mighty force in the world. Later reports from here indicate that the 50 some recruits are still fighting the good fight of faith and are holding on to the lines with renewed vigor.—

Elkhart, Indiana, was the next place of attack and we enjoyed the meeting, because it was near home to us and because we were working with some that we have known for many years.

We found that the enemy had entrenched himself very solidly in this city. But we went into the fight with supreme confidence in the power of God to overcome the deadly power of sin in every form. Our band of helpers were made ready for battle. It was a pleasure to work with Brother Wolford. He was with us every minute of the conflict. After three weeks we won over to the Lord's side, 33 in all. The other results have been noted by the pastor in his report. Mention should be made that several nights we were ably asisted by the presence of delegations from South Bend and Goshen, together with their pastors—It certainly was inspiring to again preach to our former parishioners from South Bend.

Elkhart is not a hopeless field for us, the future looks bright for them, and I feel sure that with their splendid leader and their devotion to the cause victory will come to them in the days that are to come.

New Lebanon, Ohio.—From Elkhart, a thriving city, to the little village of New Lebanon, Ohio we next found ourselves. Another three weeks of hard work was before us. This is a great place for crowds. Every night they came to hear and thank God we again went over the top with forty-five new confessions. Brother Jack Lambert is pastor here. He is a live pastor in the village. A wide-awake man who is ever alert watching for an opening to do and dare for the Master.

We are now in a campaign at Brighton. The outlook is bright, clouds are scattering and the victory is ahead. More later.

We expect to make our home for the summer in South Bend, Indiana. We are going to rest and be ready, the Lord willing, for another season of evangelism beginning next fall. For the many kindnesses and splendid care given to us during our sojourn out somewhere in the U. S. A., we are very grateful to all. Any church that nedes some supply work help during the summer may find me by writing to my home address. Also dates for coming year. May God bless the Brotherhood everywhere.

EVANGELIST A. E .THOMAS.

North Liberty, Indiana

It is with pleasure that we report the progress of the Lord's work at this place. Regardless of the many hindrances for effective church work during the past winter every department of the work is moving nicely. We were disappointed in our evangelistic effort this year, being compelled to close after a few days, but we hope to take it up again in the early fall with the pastor as evangelist.

Since we last reported our work fourteen persons have been added by letter and relation. Two confessions await baptism and several others have promised to come soon. The Sunday school is one of the live wires of the church. Last Sunday 126 were present, which was the largest attendance of any school in town for the day. The S. S. C. E. is very active these days. They recently added some new members. Next Sunday they will have charge of the morning service. They are aiding very materially to the support of the work in general .

The present pastor received a unanimous call to the work for another year. We shall remain with this good people and by the help of God press on to greater accomplishments.

I shall be privileged to hold some meetings this fall. Churches wishing our services will do well to write early. We are not looking for an easy place. If some church is drawing its last breath we would like a chance at it. We prefer the field that no one else wants. That has been our fields for evangelistic effort, and the Lord has been pleased to bless us in a remarkable way wherever we have labored.

If there is a church needing a minister for one-half or full time, where there would be a possibility of him teaching in the public schools, I could put such a church in touch with a splendid young man who could be secured very reasonable . Write me at once. Indiana churches preferred.

We hope to meet many of our friends at the great State S. S. Convention soon to be held here at South Bend.

We rejoice with the brethren everywhere for continued progress in the Lord's work.

May we all be just as diligent as we know how in helping to bring back the King.

Yours under the Precious Blood,

C. C. GRISSO.

Philadelphia, Pennsylvania Third Brethren Church

In looking over the Evangelist, at times, we note with much interest, the progress of the various fields, and the thought occurred to us that it may be of interest to some to know of our work at the THIRD BRETHREN CHURCH.

Since I started to do my bit here, about six and one-half years ago, when it was but a mission, meeting in a small store, I have noticed a rapid growth, especially during the past two or three years.

When we built our little church, which we then considered large, seating about 150 people, and our school then being in attendance of about 60, we thought this would meet our present needs for some eight or ten years. But, at the present, just about five years from that time, at our School session the room is practically filled, and we have already begun to think of enlarging our building. You can readily see the growth, and realize the need of a larger building, and more consecrated workers. The nearest church to the east of us is five blocks, and in between these squares, two or three small streets, and most of which have been recently built up, thus creating a new residential section and larger field for our work. There are some churches to the west of us, but as we look to the east, we breathe that prayer, "Lord of the Harvest send forth Reapers," for the harvest truly is great but the laborers are few.

We have about 60 members on our church roll of fairly faithful workers. Of course, we have nearly that many who are practically dead wood, but these we do not consider as on our active church record. We are boosting the FOUR-YEAR PROGRAM. We have very encourasing services, being in charge of Bro. E. E. Roberts in the morning, and our Pastor, Brother J. E. Braker, in the evening.

In our Prayer Meetings, we have reached the goal of the 25% of attendance, and are traveling toward the goal on the increase in attendance at the prayer meeting. These meetings are also very interesting and spiritual.

The Sunday school is also very fine, and this auxiliary is fast traveling toward the FRONT LINE. This quarter, we have taken in about thirty new scholars, in the various departments. We have a staff of faithful officers and teachers, and we judge from our school that the future church will be worth all the efforts that we can put in it toward the training of the children entrusted to our care. We have in our School all organized departments, and classes, one especially which we want to note, the Men's Bible Class, led by Brother E. E. Roberts, which we believe has created a good bit of interest, and from which, while it is but a year old, we have received much good and inspiration as a school and church.

We have a fine Junior Society of Christian Endeavor, with about 80 on roll, with large attendances at every meeting. We have a small Young People's Society of about 15 members, but while few in numbers it is very spiritual in nature. We have a nice Sisters' Society of about 20 members, which we believe is made up of faithful women, who need to be commended for their untiring efforts in the time of struggle and need.

We have some very consecrated workers, who are willing at all times to do such work as carpentering, plumbing, etc., to help save expenses, as well as being anxious to help in the upbuilding of the spiritual life of the church. But, we believe, this is due largely to the example of our consecrated loyal pastor, who is serving us without pay, in his untiring work of love at this place.

We do thank our Father for so bountifully supplying our needs, both spiritually and temporally, and pray that his blessing may continue with us, that we may be able to do a grand and noble work at A and Tioga Streets, and hear "His well done," in that great and final day.

MRS. L. S. KOLB, Jr.

Cerro Gordo, Illinois

We closed our pastorate at Philadelphia on the first of last October. We came immediately to Altoona to attend the Pennsylvania Conference, not realizing that it would be the last one we would attend in that state for a while. We shall look back to those few days spent together in the "Mountain City" in conference with the berthren of the "Keystone State" with many pleasant recollections.

We next crossed the mountain and spent some time with my parents in Johnstown, where we made our headquarters until we came to the Middle West.

After a short rest we went back to Altoona to asist the pastor, W. C. Benshoff, in a pre-communion service. Being acquainted with these people it seemed like going home and our fellowship together was delightful and pleasant. After preaching each evening from Wednesday until Saturday and on Sunday morning we hustled to the train and journeyed to Windber to begin a campaign in the evening against the powers of darkness.

Here we found a small band of Brethren struggling along together without a shepherd. We soon found them to be ready and willing to do what they could to further the great cause of the king. The days spent here were most delightful and will not soon be forgotten.

Our next station was Prosperity, W. Va. We were a week late in arriving due to a miss-carried letter. However, we reached our destination late on Saturday night and journeyed to the "Church on the Hill" on Sunday morning for our first service in the State. The weather proved to be of the trying sort during our entire stay among these people. Rain and lime stone dirt when mixed together in the proper proportions make a poweful sticky substance. It was well mixed during most of our stay. We made our home with Brother Showalter, the pastor, and together we traveled over the hills visiting among the brethren. We enjoyed our short stay among them and hope we may visit among them again when the weather is a little more pleasant.

After a day and a night of travel and awaiting at junction points we were again at home with the family and parents. Here we stayed and spent Christmas. It was the first time during twelve years that we had the pleasure of eating Christmas dinner with those who had given us an earthly existence. The day was quiet but very pleasant.

To Our New Field

On December 28th we left home for our new field of labor. The journey was uneventful until we reached Indiana. Here our train ran into a local snow storm and before we realized what was taking place we found it snow bound in more than three feet of snow. Here we remained until the plows came from Chicago and helped us out. After traveling all day Saturday we reached Cerro Gordo late in the evening and found the people wondering what had happened that we should be so late.

After quite an effort our goods were finally shipped and arrived in good condition. When we were beginning to get settled just a little we were told there was a call to be made one evening and we were piloted to the church. Here we were formally introduced to members and friends and after a program had been rendered were given a shower of good things to eat. Of course we tried to express our appreciation after we had everything at home. (But we did appreciate it brethren, and have not forgotten it yet.)

One week of devotional services were held before Easter. The object was to bring us to a deeper realization of our dependence on God. These services were well attended and a good interest manifested.

The offering for "Foreign Missions" was scheduled for Easter morning and careful preparation was made. Of course we desired to make the goal and "go over the top" but no one thought we could do it. When the moment finally arrived and the charge made and the results counted we were all agreeably surprised to know that we had "gone over the top." Our aged treasurer was confined to his home on account of illness. It made his eyes snap with surprise when told that we had won the battle.

After the smoke had cleared away we were all ready for something to eat and the call for dinner took us to the basement of the church where a great feast was spread and after we had all done our best it was not damaged to any great extent. Every one had plenty and there was much left. Some of this was carried to the needy. The fellowship of these occasions more than compensates for the cost in time and materials.

At two-thirty we again assembled for an hour of worship together. We enjoyed a pleasant and profitable hour together and every one agreed it was a day well spent.

Our next effort came two weeks later when an attempt was made to make up a financial deficit and bring the church up to June first free from financial obligation. It looked big . Some feared the outcome. But once more, when the field had been cleared, we claimed the victory with colors flying.

There is more work to be done. We are hoping and praying for other victories. May the Lord be our unerring Leader in these.

Th plan that the White chapel Sisters had for making up money this Easter time for missionary purposes was a great success. It may be a help to sisters in some other rural church to know that we sold our eggs, we gathered on Easter Sunday and took the money for that purpose, not half the eggs, BUT ALL. The hens seemed to understand and gave us a good supply. Besides Red Cross, Y. M. C. A., Liberty Loans, Baby bonds and Thrift stamps, we did not forget those in spiritual darkness

Notes From Africa

1918—3—17th,

Still in Loanda. We found the dormitory at the Methodist Mission a very pleasant place and much cooler than the hotel. Mr. Gibbs is a fine Christian man and he helped us in many ways. We spent 4 busy days in Loanda. February 26th we embarked for Bama. What a busy Monday morning that was for us. We got up at 5 A. M., ate a hurried breakfast, finished packing and strapipng our cases, folded up our beds and were ready for the boys that came to carry our things down to the boat that took us out to our steamer, the Wall. Here we found a much smaller steamer than either of the other ships. As we would only have a part of two days on this ship we had to furnish our own food. This we did and ate our meals picnic style in the small pleasant deck which was furnished with table and chairs. All enjoyed the change and as we were in sight of land all the way we found the trip from Loanda to Bama an interesting one. On reaching Bama we went to a hotel, and the next day was a very busy one. We visited all the stores and here we found a child's helmet for little Marguerite; up until this time we had been unable to find a child's helmet, although we had tried everywhere. We also went for a short visit to the Christian Alliance Mission. Here we met Mr. Hess, who is from Nyack, New York, and their native French teacher. The other workers at this Mission were away at the conference which was being held at Luebo Congo Belge. We enjoyed our short visit at this mission which is also beautifully situated. In Bama we were required to matriculate as we were entering the Belgian Congo. March first we left Bama, embarking on the Mousette, we came on to Matadi. Here we were met by the famous Dr. Sims, who hurried the party up to his mission. Here we found beautiful surorundings, cool, pleasant rooms and everything necessary for our comfort awaiting us. Dinner was served at 7 P. M. Dr. Sims is an excellent host, and having spent many years at this place entertained us with many interesting and humorous stories. The dinner hour was enjoyed by all, after which we soon retired. We were up early in order to catch the 6:30 A. M. train for Kanshassa. At Matadi our party separated. Brother Gribble and Mr. Bragg remainind at Matadi to wait for the rest of the baggage we had to leave at Bama. Mr. Haas, Dr. Gribble, Miss Myers, little Marguerite and myself came on, to gain, if possible, the coveted permission to enter the French Congo. After another hurried breakfast we hastened to the depot. Here we bade Brother Gribble and Mr. Bragg good-bye and boarded the train. Such a queer little train; and it is run by the natives; the coaches are quite small having only eight desk-like chairs with little shelf tables between the chairs. We stopped every few miles to get wood for firing the engine. Once a man's hat blew off and they stopped to run back for that. At another place the train pulled out without the conductor. When this was learned the engineer stopped the train and waited for him to catch up. This he did and all out of breath he told the engineer in loud native language what he thought of him. At another station we were greatly amused in watching them load live stock, such as pigs and goats. How do you think this was done?

First by tieing the animals' four feet together, then turning them on their backs the natives then place them on their heads and board the train. Everything carried by the natives is carried on their heads. This train does not run at night, so we stopped at Thyesville over night. Here we went to the A. B. C. Hotel. This hotel was a pleasant surprise. We found it more homelike than any place we had been since leaving dear old Dayton, Ohio. It is high up in the mountains where it was cool and pleasant and away from the dreaded mosquito. The next morning early we continued on our journey. We ate picnic style on this trip, too. So we had with us on this day Mr. Moody, an old established Baptist missionary. He has been on this field of work for 28 years. He told us the number of Christian natives they have. I forget the number, but it was quite large. They have 128 native churches, with native workers in all the native villages. He was on his way to visit a number of these churches when we met him. He gave us information in regard to the work, etc., and we enjoyed our short visit with him very much. We had several hard showers in the afternoon and the train stopped until the worst was over, then sent a boy on ahead to put sand on the track. However, we reacherd Kanashassa about 4:30 P. M., Saturday and went to the A. B. C. hotel at this place. We did not find it quite as nice as the one at Thyesville, but we were glad to be at our journey's end for a short time. I must tell you a few things about this railroad, for it is quite wonderful after all. We learn it was 20 years being built, and that one life was sacrificed for every yard of the three hundred miles. And a white man's life for every mile. This is easy to believe after you have gone over the road with its many crooks and turns, ups and downs, winding in and out among the mountains covered with bush, where many kinds of poisonous snakes and wild animals hide. Over deep ravines, across mad, rushing mountain streams we went. And all day long the fierce sun rays were felt. At no time during the day were we permitted to remove our helmets.

Small wonder the loss of life when all is known. And yet as we traveled on the scene was ever changing; the mountains, covered with shades of green and here and there clusters of wild mountain flowers peeped from among the bush and rock. We passed the places where Livingstone and Stanley camped on a high mountain that now bears their names. At Kenshassa we spent a quiet Sunday in prayer and thanksgiving. God had wonderfully blessed us this far, and here again we asked him to open the door into the French Congo for us, if he so willed, that we enter at this time. Dr. Gribble and I attended the English services at the Baptist mission in the afternoon. Mr. Kirkland gave us the message, using the 10th chapter of St. John for an outline. He gave us a great message; we were quite refreshed and uplifted by it. Monday morning Mr. Haas, Dr. Gribble and Miss Myers crossed the Congo river to Brazzaville to visit the French mayor to ask permission to enter the French Sudan with the gospel. Not knowing what would be met with, or how long they would be, they started out at 6:30 A. M. I remained at the hotel with little Marguerita. We try to protect her as much as possible from the heat. She has been quite well most of the time thus far and we pray she may continue to remain so. She is a great blessing to our little party, and it is our prayer that we may be able to keep her long with us., if it be his will.

At noon the rarty returned with the glad tidings, "Enter in for I have opened the door." And truly he had gone before hearing and answering the prayers of his people, opening up the way for his gospel to be carried to all the world. For the party that crossed the river that morning found no trouble in gaining permission to enter French Equatorial Africa. They were treated very kindly by the Mayor, and when we came over the next day with bag and baggage, we had no customs to pay, and we found everybody kind and considerate, willing to aid us in every way. So we learn all along the way how God can overrule.

Here we found an English store, the proprietor giving us rooms just over the store, they are nice cool rooms and our host is most considerate of our every need. Truly, God has heard the prayers of your dear people and has richly blesed us in so many ways.

There is a Swedish mission not far from here. Mr. Hull and other workers are here. They too have been most kind to us. We took lunch with them the other day. Tomorrow which will be Saturday, March 9th, there is to be a wedding at this mission.

Two of their workers are to travel henceforth as one.

While we rest, wait and pray in this quiet beautiful place we are reminded often of the dear old home folks, and may you find in reading these lines the rich blessing of his wonderful love and cheer. May you be enabled in earnest prayers to help in a wonderful way the carrying of his gospel to this dark needy field. At the coming of Brother Gribble, Mr. Bragg and Mr. Haas, we expect soon to get a boat going up the Congo river to Bangui. Here we start our overland travel afoot. We will still have several months' travel from this place before we reach our field of work. We wish to thank you all from full and loving hearts for all you have done and are doing for his cause, and know that we ever praise him for you all. Continue to pray for us always. And now may his grace richly abound toward you all.

Yours in His service,
MYRTLE MAE SNYDER.

On March 24 Brother A. E. Thomas came to us for a three weeks' meeting. On Sunday night he was greeted by a large crowd and much interest. As the meeting progressed the crowds continued to come, getting larger until on the last night the church could not contain all the people. The interest grew to great intensity. Brother Brother Thomas preached the old gospel with a clearness, power and enthusiasm that won the hearts of the people and broke down the strongholds of sin in 46 lives. There were 6 the first night an invitation was given. And in only two services after that did he have no response to the call of God. On the last day there were 17. It was a great victory and the church and her pastor rejoice exceedingly with Thomas because of it. All but three of the 46 have been baptized and received into the church. These will come later.

Pray for us, Brethren.

The Lord's work is not prospering in this part of his domain. I have been associated with this people for seven years, but have not known of one conversion. Church people come here from the old world and the new, but soon fall into the ways of the world. When I think of the words of Jesus to the doctors and lawyers, "Wist thee not that I must be about my father's business?" it makes me feel as if I had put my hands to the gospel plow and begun to look back. However during the summer I preach somewhere every Sunday. We have a union Sunday school, but our church work must be of a federation of all Christians for the present. So far as I know I preach all of the funerals in this community. The Brethren Evangelist is a most welcome visitor in our home. The more so because of former acquaintance with the Editor.

We are now anxiously looking forward to the time when we shall dispose of our property here and return to what I feel is my life's work in my own much beloved Brethren church. We are located fifteen hundred miles north-west of Chicago, but when we get the Evangelist we live over again in Flora, Cerro Gordo, Dutchtown, North Manchester, Nappanee, Clay City and Chicago. Glad to see the splendid success of most of these churches. I often think of writing a word of approval and encouragement to the Editor of the Evangelist or some of my successors a line of sympathy or good will to friends, or an amen to an Editorial like Brother Rench's, "The unity of Brethren." Then comes Satan and catches away the good seed, or at least I fail to do what I thought I would.

Regards to Brethren and friends.

A Visit to Washington, Brother Quinter Lyon Ordained

It was the privilege of the writer to spend three days from April 23 to 26 with Brother Lyon and his congregation in Washington. This being my first visit to our church in the capital city I was very pleasantly surprised to find our property located in such a splendid part of the city, just off Pennsylvania Avenue the most famous thoroughfare in the city and only twelve short blocks from the Capitol . Here, in an attractive little property that is increasing in value every year, worships the congregation that is coming more and more to be known for the deep spiritual tone of its services and for its whole hearted loyalty to God's word and implicit faith in all of his promises.

In the short time that I was with them I learned that these people are really taking God's work seriously and that they are not afraid to lay on his altar the tithe of what he has granted to them in the way of increase. An evidence of this was shown in the offering on the night of the communion when without any appeal the 75 or 80 people at the tables laid about $20 on the offering plates, and another evidence is the $200 Easter offering recently reported by Brother Lyon. It will be a great day in the history of all of our churches when they learn that God is willing to hear the united prayers of his people for the financial needs of the church as well as for the spiirtual needs. The two cannot be divorced.

The Washington congregation is to be congratulated both upon the fact that their pastor is himself an earnest and faithful preacher of the Word but also upon the fact that he has a whole family of Lyons that are ready and willing to take active part in the work of the church. Few churches can have such a corps of workers in the family of the pastor. Brother Lyon's fatherly Christian spirit makes him a great blessing to many who are in the city far removed from home and home friends.

The most enjoyable moment of the stay in Washington came when Brother Quinter Lyon, the son of the pastor, was ordained to the gospel ministry. In recognition of his ability and splendid Christian spirit the congregation had some time ago called this brother to the ministry and also to the position of associate pastor with his father. The call has been favorably passed upon by the Ministerial Examining Board of the Maryland-Virginia District, the sacred service of prayer and laying on of hands ordaining him to the work to which God the Spirit through the church had called him was accordingly observed by his father and the writer on the evening of Wednesday, April 24. May the Lord wonderfully bless and use this consecrated young man in the great work upon which he has entered.

Club Federation, has made a report on these conditions in the New York Sun and among other things says:

"Boys are worse in Baltimore, Chicago, Hartford, Indianapolis, Jacksonville, Jersey City, Lowell, Mass, Newark, Portland, Me., and Spokane. They have bettered their behavior in New York, Denver, Los Angeles, Minneapolis, Nashville, Seattle, St. Louis, Topeka and Worcester. They are about the same in Atlanta, Cincinnati, Dallas, Dayton, Duluth, Kansas City, Memphis, Pittsburgh, and Springfield, Mass.

"In Europe, especially with the Central Powers, the increase of juvenile delinquency is reported as appalling. In Vienna the number of crimes committed by boys and girls under 18 in 1915-1916 was 340 per cent greater than in 1914-1915. In Allied nations the increase in delinquency seems to be anywhere from 35 to 65 per cent. Mr. Atkinson gives the following reasons for this increase:

"'Whatever may be the situation across the water, the fact is that there has been no general increase in the United States. A study of the increase in European countries has resulted in assigning certain very definite causes, the chief of which are: (1) Absence of fathers of large families at the front; (2) increased burdens placed upon the mother in supporting the family; (3) complete darkening of streets necessitated by the airplane raids; (4) curtailing or stopping entirely of boy-betterment activities because of false economy or lack of workers.

"'It is reassuring to note that the first three causes do not obtain here, and that while the fourth condition is already apparent, steps are not only being taken to check it, but to increase greatly the activities for boy betterment."

In the light of the above report it is plainly to be seen that this is no time for the American churches and Sunday schools to let up on their endeavors to reach and to hold the American boy, for he is one of the really great problems of the day, and the manner in which this problem is met today will have much to do with the Christian manhood of tomorrow.

Gospel Puritanism

The word puritanism is not popular, but it is a great word with a great mission. It is sorely misunderstood, and therein lies the principal cause of its unpopularity. Since the days of the early Protestant dissenters from the Church of England the puritanic attitude has caused in some men impatience, in others annoyance, and in others disgust, depending upon the frivolousness or seriousness of their attitude toward the fundamentals of life. The effort to force the practice of puritanism upon individuals has called forth almost universal rebellion, so much so that the word itself is almost universally repulsive. But it has generally been the wrong kind of puritanism or the wrong application of puritanic principles that has been rejected and not the gospel puritanism as set forth by Paul in such admonitions as "Come ye apart——and be ye separate," "Ye are a peculiar people," and by the declaration of Jesus, "Ye are not of this world."

Some have sought to display this enjoined separateness from the world by the painfully superficial way of wearing a peculiar and uniform style of dress. But outward marks of difference for the sake of difference are neither vital to the Christian's life nor advantageous to the Christian's service. They rather tend to depreciate the value of conduct on the part of the Christian and to discredit the Christian's profession in the eyes of the world.

Some have thought that to be true to puritan principles they must turn their backs upon the society refuse to acknowledge any worth or advantage in wholesome social acctivities, and deny themselves any and all enjoyments that come from mingling with their fellow-men. But the social instinct is God-given and was never intended to be crushed, rather to be properly developed and sanctified. Judging from the life of Jesus, who is our exemplar, we can say not only that it is not our duty to withdraw from the cares, pleasures and responsibilities of society, but it is positively wrong to do so. Paul declares that ""we that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak." And Jesus said to the Father "I pray not that thou shouldst take them out of the world, but that thou shouldst keep them from the evil that is in he world." That sort of self-denial that seeks to avoid social obligations lest they result in contamination reveals a concern for self that is out of all proportion, and such as will encourage a feeling of self-righteousness which is the most obnoxious and self-deceiving form of selfishness.

Again, there have been sects and still are found a few individuals who think it is their duty to keep hands off political affairs and steer clear of public life and responsibilities. But true Christian puritans have never taken such a stand. It has been so obviously unchristian that those who have dared to assume such an attitude have been recognized as self-branded "slackers," and their widespread unpopularity has been both the cure and the prevention of a contagion of such a moral and mental malady. Such a laissez-faire or "do nothing" attitude is contrary to the spirit and teachings of both Jesus and Paul. The gospel urges upon every Christians the performance of their duties as citizens. And both reason and conscience insist that Christians should be the saving salt of the corrupted political world. If we cannot look to Christians for the management of powers that God has ordained, and as the instruments in God's hands for ridding governments of their evils, making them Christian in deed as well as in name, I pray, to whom can we look? It is nothing less than sinful to fail to do whatever one can to strike a blow at civic and social evil, and to enthrone Christ in public as well as private life.

There are also sincere souls whose puritanical tendencies cause them to seek to keep free from participation in any manner in the present world conflict. Of course, it is impossible to carry out such a policy consistently for our government has taken the attitude that "he that is not with me is against me," so that those who refuse absolutely to do anything that will in any way aid the Allies so find themselves in prison or in an internment camp. But we should not expect to find Christians like "dumb-driven cattle" in this respect. Without arguing the worthiness of the Allied cause which ought to be evident to every one who values the things for which America stands, I would like to say that there is no reason for any Christian citizen of the most scrupulous character being without something definite to do. Where can the Christian find warrant for being too conscientious to co-operate to increase the production and economy of food, or to engage in some form of Red Cross Relief Work, or to pray for and correspond with men with the colors, or to make a special, even sacrificial effort to keep the fires of religion burning brightly in these serious and critical days, or to help to prepare the church to meet the heavy demands that shall be made of her when the war is over and the boys return from the battle fields with a new valuation of religion and the days of reconstruction are upon us? He who cannot find among these something to lay his hands to does not deserve to wear Christ's name. The Christian should be pulling on the bits instead of the "hold-backs." Whatsoever thy hands find to do, that a Christian can do, do it with thy might.

There is however a separateness that should exist between the Christian and the world, but it is not in any of the above ways. The Christian should be different from the man of the world, but he should not cultivate the feeling of differences merely for the sake of being different. There is no virtue merely in being different from the world, or from any other church, but there is great virtue in being in line with the will of God. The gospel puritan claims no credit for being severely different in appearance, form or ceremony, nor for standing aloof from many of the organizations of the world, but he is given credit for being different in certain ways that are fundamental.

He should be different in his aim, and rigidly different, from the aims of the world. The aim of life will largely determine the manner of living. To become Christ-like in spirit and conduct, and in the very character of our being should be the aim of every Christian. We should seem to keep Christ so constantly before our minds that we shall come to act like him, talk like him and think like him. We should desire to become veritable little Christs. And if we shall make Christ the ideal of our lives, constantly aiming to become like him; our actions shall be so influenced by our aims and our lives shall be so moulded by our endeavorers, that we shall come to reflect the Christ-spirit as naturally as the moon reflects the sunlight; and men seeing us will see Christ.

We should also be different from the world in spirit. One can afford to be strict in regard to the spirit that pervades life, for there is a very close and vital relation between the spirit expressed and the character of the life itself. If the heart is right with God and at peace with one's fellowmen it will be manifest in spirit, for there is a vast difference between the true Christian spirit and the spirit of the world. The former is kind and gentle; the latter is harsh and cruel. The former is unselfish and altruistic, not thoughtful of self nor seeking self-interests, but losing sight of self in its desire to serve others. The latter is selfish and self-centered uncharitable and unsympathetic. The Christian spirit is humble and submissive, prizing the counsel of others rather than exalting its own wishes and plans, while the spirit of the world is egotistic, unsubmisive, unyielding, seeking to lord it over others in a severe and merciless manner. In short, the true Christian spirit is the

Gnats and Camels

It was not only the Scribes and Pharisees in the days of Christ who were guilty of choking on a gnat but at the same time attempting to swallow a camel without "batting an eye." Every age of the world has furnished people of the same type and the present age is no exception.

A great many things are being urged upon the people at the present time as a patriotic duty, and we would not say a word against any consistent effort to arouse and to sustain patriotic sentiment and support among the American people, but we do insist upon the efforts and the appeals being consistent.

Economy and thrift are to be commended at all times and it is a patriotic duty to be thrifty and economical, not only in war times but in times of peace as well, and we know the old saying: "Take care of the dimes and the dollars will take care of themselves," is true on general principles, but something more than dimes is necessary to win the war, and while it is right and proper to look after the ten cent people it seems to us that some of our enthusiasts are looking after the dimes when they might better be looking after the dollars.

Just recently a request has been made of the public school teachers in a certain section of Ohio that they accept five dollars per month less for their teaching next year as a patriotic duty, when every one who has ever been connected with school work knows that school teaching has always been one of the poorly paid professions, and during the past winter many school men of Ohio urged that a special session of the legislature be called to make provision for raising larger school funds to meet the needs of the schools for the next school year.

When those in authority want to urge reduction of wages and salary as a patriotic duty it is well for them to "first sweep their own door-steps clean." There is no chance for "profiteering" in the profession of school-teaching and to us it seems a wrong move to try to economize by cutting anything off the salaries of this already poorly paid class of people. There are camels that could be looked after to more advantage than considering the gnats that might be saved by lowering the wages of teachers.

Only a short time ago one of our most authoritative magazines published a contribution treating the question of oil and gasoline in America and it was stated that there is now enough gasoline stored in the United States to last two years and that the oil industry is limited only by its capacity to store the products it draws from the earth, and that the oil fields now located in America will be able to supply the world with gasoline for the next two hundred years, and yet the American people are forced to pay war prices for gasoline in time of this great plenty, and the head of the Standard Oil Company is said to have an annual income of SIXTY MILLION DOLLARS. Is it any wonder that there is social unrest, even in prosperous America? If it is a patriotic duty to reduce pay anywhere such places as this are the places to begin and not with the meager salaries of public school teachers.

An Honest Confession

Not many men are willing to confess before the public the principles upon which they base their opinion that they are ALWAYS right, but recently the famous Ed. Howe, who is always frank, if nothing more, made a statement that a great many people could consistently subscribe to, and yet not many would be willing to make the admission or confession Mr. Howe makes.

A man who has no opinions or who does not stand up for the opinions he does have will never do much for the welfare of the world, but the man who has an opinion upon every subject that can be mentioned and who is always "cock-sure" he is right will accomplish little more, if as much, hut his name is legion.

Mr. Howe says, "I don't care what some people think; they're wrong." That is the attitude a great many take in regard to questions of religion, politics or war. Intelligent positiveness is always to be commended, but egotistical "cock-sureness" is always to be condemned, for no matter how sure we are that we are right, there is always a possibility that the one who disagrees with us is more nearly right than we are; and we think the statement made by Mr. Howe was intended to be a general one more than that he applied it to himself alone. It but shows the spirit of intolerance possessed by the narrow soul in every department of life and in every age of the world.

We should be sure we are right. We are not justified in taking a positive stand upon any question without having investigated the grounds upon which we take our stand, but not until we have certain and indisputable and overwhelming evidence that we are right ought we become so positive that we are ready to brand at once as wrong any opinion that is different from ours.

But while it is the positive life that wins and it is the man of conviction that succeeds it will be found upon investigation that it is an intelligent positiveness and a rightly formed conviction that succeeds in either case. We may be right and we should be right, but we should not be so ready to take it for granted that the other man is wrong.

Nerves

For a number of years the American doctors have been telling us that the American people are pretty generally developing a marked case of "nerves." We remember reading a story some years ago in which the action of a certain woman was justified because of the condition of her nerves, and an old lady to whom the explanation was being offered replied: "Well, thank the Lord I was born before people had nerves."

Nerves are undoubtedly an essential factor in one's being, and it has ever been noted that it is the horse of nerve, the horse that is high-strung that wins the race, but it is the horse that is under control as well, and this fact holds equally true in case of the human being. It is the man or woman of highly-strung temperament, whose nerves are wound up tight, but who is yet possessed of self-control that wins in life's race.

We sometimes think that overwork or the excessive expenditure of energy will account for the broken-down nerves of some of us, but we are not so sure this is the case after all. A noted Englishwoman said, "The women of England are too busy to think about their nerves."

It has been frequently observed that many of the extreme cases of "nerves" break out among women who have no regular and imperative duties they must perform and whose time frequently "hangs heavily upon their hands." It is often a nursing and a petting of slight ailments, complaints or unsatisfactory situations that develops the case of "nerves," and one of the surest cures is to have the mind so occupied with outside things that it has little time to dwell upon the petty personal grievances that are so annoying and distracting and that grow so rapidly under careful nursing.

A Difficult Feat

Works of construction are often accompanied with great difficulties and can be carried on to successful completion only as these difficulties are overcome. But it is to be noted that often the greatest difficulties in the way of a successful effort is something that has been done wrong and that must now be done over or undone before the new and better work can be done. The tearing down of old buildings and the digging up of old foundations to make way for a new structure is frequently no small task, and frequently calls for as much ingenuity as it did to erect the original structure.

The educational systems of the world have been built up through slow and tedious processes, and we are not always sure these processes have been the right ones, for education has not accomplished for mankind all that we may reasonably hope it shall accomplish. It may be that we will be compelled to tear down and to dig deeper for new foundations before our institutions of learning accomplish for mankind what is most needed. Some one recently said, "Our crying need is an institution of unlearning." This statement only confirms what we have said about undoing some of the things that have already been done; a digging out of old foundations that need to be replaced by new, but it should never be forgotten that there is one Rock and one Foundation that always stands sure.

The Church and Modern Problems

BY A. B. COVER

It must be evident to the observing mind that we live in a history-making period, not only politically, and economically, but morally as well. The evidence is prevalent in unrest. People live in expectancy. They wait for something to take the place of old customs and ways of thinking. To the religious worker, and especially leaders of Christian Endeavor, come problems of momentous significance. They must be solved, and how is our chief concern.

As we look modern problems in the face, the relation of the church to the solution of affairs claims our attention. It is the purpose of this paper to suggest a need of the church in assuming her proper relation to present world conditions.

We hear repeated over and over again that the church is losing her influence over men and women; that the church is losing instead of advancing, speaking from a moral view point. If this is true, what might be the cause and the remedy?

The church is defined as "the visible representation of God's Kingdom in the world." As such has she remained true to her mission? Has she been kept unspotted from the world? Or is she without "spot or wrinkle?" If we think of the church as a whole, or of the individuals who compose her membership and her mission may it not be a fair inference that in contact with the world her ideal may have been blurred. Jesus, the Divine Son of God as well as his Herald came saying, "Repent ye, for the Kingdom of Heaven is at hand." Does that message need to be addressed to the church? The church again is represented as the Bride of Christ, waiting for the coming of the Bridegroom. Has the church been chiefly concerned in making preparation for that marriage or rather has she been steeped in insensate materialism and gone whoring after strange Gods? Be the criticism true or not that the church is not exerting the influence she should that to be true to her real mission a reconsecration to her ideal is essential and will solve as has been divinely promised, the world's problems. In reference to the world Jesus said, "In the world ye shall have tribulation, but be of good cheer I have overcome the world."

In Gen. 28 "man was intended to have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the birds of the heavens, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth." In 29 our plant life as well. Man to have dominion. I turn to Heb. 2: 6-9 and find these words: "What is man that thou are mindful of him?"

Or the Son of man, that thou visitest him?

Thou madest him a little lower than the angels;

Thou crownest him with glory and honor, and didst set him over the works of thy hands:

Thou didst put all thing in subjection under his feet. For in that he subjected all things unto him, he left nothing that is not subject unto him. But now we see not yet all things subjected to him. Man does not fully exercise that dominion in all that was intended. Why and what is the hope? In the following verse we find the answer, "But we behold him who hath been made a little lower than the angels, even Jesus." Jesus is the answer to all anxious inquirers and the solution of all perplexing problems. Thus our inference is that above anything else, today the church needs a reconsecration to her great ideal. There is therefore necessity of the church's conversion to Christ. During the past generation the church has been freely and widely criticized and these have constituted more or less urgent calls to repentance. But no true prophet ancient or modern has ever appeared as a defender of unrighteous conditions existing in society. The true and typical prophet of God has always inflicted the faithful wounds of a friend. So there is no option to the present day minister but point out the ills of life, the unfaithfulness of the Lord's followers, if he is stoned by his generation, and must look to future generations to build his sepulcher and monument.

John's call to repentance was in no way singular, it was always the call of the typical Hebrew prophet, Isaiah says, "Bring no more vain oblations, incense is an abomination unto me." Your appointed feasts my soul hath—Wash you and make you clean; put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes; cease to do evil; learn to do well; seek judgment, relieve the oppressed, judge the faithless, plead for the widow." Conversion to Christ always means the relation to what is wrong in social or economic life as well as moral. And perhaps it is well, to apply the need of conversion to those in covenant vows to preach and defend the laws of the Kingdom, for in the parable of the "Good Samaritan" Jesus said a "priest" and a "Levite" went by on the other side. In all ages since there was a church Jewish or Christian, there have arisen those within—faithful and loving sons—who have cried "Repent." The church has been many times purged by persecution; but as this is not likely to come in Christendom, purification must come by a greater devotedness to the great ideal. As the church grows stronger in numbers and wealth, there will be an increasing temptation to join it from some ulterior motive—because it is the proper thing to do, because it will improve social standing or business projects. These motives have brought many into the church who are only nominal followers.

We can make right or wrong conditions of church membership, but we cannot alter the conditions of Christian discipleship or the credentials of citizenship in the Kingdom. Obviously the only possible way to follow Christ is to follow him. The only possible way for a self-seeking person to become a citizen of the Kingdom is to stop self-seeking and to make the general good the great object of endeavor. To be a Christian is as simple and easy as to surrender the will to God, and it is as difficult and terrible as to surrender our will to God. He who loves God supremely cannot help giving him his life; he who loves himself supremely finds in self-surrender the death agony of the cross. Are there not great numbers in our churches who know neither the agony nor the joy of self-surrender? How many constituting the roll of our church membership have never counted the cost of discipleship? What is the cost? All that a man has is the price, "Whosoever he be of you that forsaketh not all that he hath cannot be my disciple." God has entrusted us with ourselves, our powers of mind and our bodies. He has also entrusted us with possessions, great or small: These are the means by the use of which are developed the qualities of will necessary to a noble character, and furthermore, the means by which we render service and sacrifice for the great social organism of which we are a part. "No man liveth unto himself," any more than the human hand lives unto itself; and if in an attempt to live selfishly the hand could separate itself from the body, it would die. In like manner, a man separating himself from the social organism dies physically, intellectually, and spiritually. Yet in this respect we find the church limping. Christian love is the service of God and humanity as the ultimate and supreme end of endeavor. The church has failed to apply this test and has therefore admitted to its membership a great multitude of selfish men and women who have no conception of the Christianity of Christ, and no experience of its regenerating power. They daily misrepresent the Christ life to the world. They testify that it is consistent with self-pleasing, self-seeking, whether in business or politics, in recreation, or in the use of money. They daily and hourly testify that it is not necessary to forsake all that one hath in order to become a disciple of Christ, and that one need not accept the cross and crucifixion in order to become a follower.

Only twice are we told that Jesus marveled—once at the faith of a Gentile, and once at the unbelief of his own people. I wonder whether today he does not marvel that his professed followers are so faithless that they dare not live the unselfish life or regard the Golden Rule as "impracticable."

In view of these facts we must realize the necessity of a more vital consciousness and need of adherence to the Founder of the church. The next matter of consideration would logically be in what particulars convert the church to Christ?

First, the church must be converted to his authority. Do men gainsay this essential? Let me quote two authorities from adverse walks of life. Dr. Henry E. Emery, Professor of Political Economy in Yale, said: "You can place the Decalogue on your statute books, and all based on the soundest principles of political emonomy, but you will not thereby abolish poverty, or misery, or injustice. But put the Sermon on the Mount in the hearts of your people, and it matters not who makes your laws. This is an old teaching—it is nothing else than Christian teaching—but in the end it becomes economic teaching. We are told by some writers that the world is waiting in an agony of expectation for some great social philosopher, who shall bring to it a new message of salvation. If so, the world is wrong, for there is no message to bring it peace from its manifold ills, save that heard twenty centuries ago from the profoundest of all social philosophers, the Man of Nazareth." In striking contrast to the above, Archbishop Moger of the Church of England said that, the sermon on the Mount is ideal but altogether "impracticable," and if effort were made to apply its teachings literally "society would tumble to pieces." Here are two views with a most significant divergence of opinion. The one from a religious viewpoint regards the Son the most "impracticable," while the other from the economic view considers it the only deliverance of the world from its manifold ills. It naturally rouses the question as to where is the scepticism." It is quite true that conditions of life have changed since Jesus set forth the principles governing the Kingdom and the church, but human nature has not changed much. "Moral principles are universal and eternal in their applicability to all moral beings. Precepts which are rules of moral conduct are methods by which principles are applied,." But principles are the sailing chart which points out the permanent facts and moralists who would make the precepts of Jesus no longer applicable, break with his teaching and declare his ethics no longer binding, are like sailors who when the wind changes solemnly throw overboard the chart! The church then needs a reconsecration to the authority of Jesus' teachings. His personality and divinity.

From a lack of such authority results the weakling of the present day church; from the weakling, the sceptic or seeker after something—that indefinable something found in the "isms" and schisms called religions, yet denying the authority of Christ. A second danger resulting from a genuine allegiance to Christ is recognizing the real import of Christ's teaching and repudiating it; in other words, the frank acceptance of selfishness as the necessary law of modern life, which makes the teaching of Christ false. A man who proposed to enlist in the army reserving to himself the right to judge whether a command should or should not be obeyed, would be rejected. Jesus accepts no divided allegiance. We cannot accept his teachings as to our relations to God and reject his teachings as to our manward relations. To reject either is to reject his authority and therefore to reject him. Our gift finds no place on God's altar so long as we are at enmity with our brother;" first be reconciled to thy brother and then come and offer thy gift."

A second need is the conversion of the church to the spirit of Christ. Paul makes the quality of a man's spirit a decisive test of character." Now, if any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of his." Conversion means therefore conversion into his spirit. We may give intellectual assent to his teachings; we may profess to be his followers; but if we have not his spirit, our profession is hollow, our conversion is a sham; we are none of his. Recently in conversation with a man concerning his life out of Christ, he replied that it would be a little matter for him to stand up in church and confess Christ but that he wanted to feel the assurance of remaining steadfast, and then cited the sad fact that so many profesosrs were undesirable neighbors. It reveals the need of the church's conversion to Christ's spirit of neighborliness. This spirit in the church may be expressed in two directions—that of love, and the other selfishness; the one is the natural expression of the self-giving will; the other is the natural expectations of the self-seeking will. A man may be wholly unconscious of a spirit which is obvious to every one else. Francis Xavier said, that in the confessional men had confessed all sins he had ever known and some he had never imagined but none ever confessed that he was covetous." Unconscious and complacent selfishness emphasizes the necessity of pressing home to the conscience of the church, the social teachings of Jesus. Christian love invariably expresses itself in acts of Christian service and of Christian sacrifice. These manifest a clear and convincing manifestation of the spirit of Christ, and the church or the person that does not have the spirit of love of service, and of sacrifice has not the spirit of Christ, and is none of his. It is not surprising that a sudden development of material wealth beyond all precedent, should create a materialistic spirit, a pleasure pursuing, ease loving, self indulgent generation. In Jesus' time "They that were gorgeously apparqled and lived delicately were in king's courts" but now they are in every city in the land, and many of them are in the church. They need to be converted to the spirit of Christ. Is the ministry fulfilling its obligation or rather are our pulpits given to the ear-tickling lecture that is neither genuinely social nor gospel.

Speak to your business man of applying the spirit of Christ in his every day affairs and he will say, I am compelled by an economic system to use questionable methods of competition, yet he fills an official chair of your church. Notwithstanding we must preach a gospel that will reach the rich man perhaps refused by education to use his power for service. We must seek that plane where a man will say, as a Christian man I have accepted the authority of Christ as the law of my life "I am bound to love as he loved. To serve and sacrifice as he served and sacrificed to the utmost." What is the spirit of Christ? "That the entire significance of wealth consists in the fact that it is power for service has never dawned on the average churcr member. He does not dream that his whole life is under the law of service. It is still more difficult for him to conceive that his life, especially his business life, is under the law of sacrifice." "A man must live," we are told. That is the justification offered by the keeper of the saloon, the gambling hell, and the brothel. That excuse no more justifies illegitimate methods in a legitimate business than it justifies an illegitimate business. No Christian "must live" where living involves disloyalty to Christ. "That is the saving of life that loses it." "Be thou faithful unto death" is the word and it needs to be lived in this age as well or more so as two thousand years since.

Again conversion to the ideal means conversion to the Master's aim. Every true Christian has surrendered his will to Jesus Christ, and has the spirit of love, service and sacrifice. Jesus' program included the entire world, and yet many of his followers shrink from a program so extensive. Or in other words, we are afraid of the word social when applied to the ethics of Jesus. Some one says, conversion to the aim of Christ will make the aim of the church consciously social." The object which Jesus set before himself was an ideal world—viz. The Kingdom of God fully come on the earth. The church will find both her aim and her program in the prayer often said but seldom weighed, "Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven." She will then be interested in every thing that promotes her work, and have business with everything that obstructs it; that is, she will obviously be concerned with everything that hastens or hinders the fulness of the coming of the Kingdom.

Such a social aim on the part of the church does not imply neglect of the individual members of the church or society, but rather amore intelligent and efficient care of them. Jesus while promoting building, laying the foundation of his Kingdom began with the calling of the individual and stopped by the wayside to heal the impotent. Medical skill today, no longer simply aims at curing individuals. How much wiser their purpose in protecting society as a whole by preventative measures, and yet they are no less faithful in treating individuals and perhaps more so because of their larger social aims. Then as we face the great multitude of moral diseases, shall we aim simply at a cure of those left in the trail of the serpent or help make conditions of society more fertile for the production of Christian character?

And finally the church needs to be awakened to a sense of unselfishness. Jesus identified himself with humanity and makes its service identical with the service of himself. He summons the church to the love and sacrificial service of humanity. Where one has been converted to the aim of Christ his hopes, his fears, his desires, his labors, are no longer for himself, nor to the end with an object that represents himself, and losing the life he had lived for self, he finds it in humanity enlarged and enriched a thousandfold. When the church fully shares this blessing she will no longer labor simply to build up self, but will lose herself in the service of humanity, and in so doing upbuild the Kingdom of God and thereby her own life.

Thus as we stand face to face with the crying need of humanity, and think of the church's relation to this need, we are constrained to say that the church must seek anew her spotless ideal. She, like the the disciples may have gone a fishing; she promises to take stock and finds the nets of influence empty. Why were the nets of the Galilean fishermen empty that morning even after toiling all night? They had forsaken the ideal. Jesus' presence meant success. "Cast on the right side." We need the ideal; we must become obedient to the commands of Christ if we would meet fully and adequately the great unmet need of the world."

We need not debate the question as to whether one man has as much right to drink a glass of whiskey as another has to eat a loaf of bread. But we might be permitted to make the general observation that we never heard of a man killing another man while he was under the influence of wheat.

Impromptu Flashes

BY W. J. H. BAUMAN

From a Bible viewpoint we conclude that there exists not only one, but many devils. One of the meanest and most poisonous of all these is the tattling devil.

The unbridled tongue is more harmful than any unbridled animal. Should the owner thereof profess religion, it would be vanity. See James 1st. ch. 26, 27.

A foul-mouthed and cursing devil squirts the most deadly poison upon childhood. Parents you owe it to your children to be on the lookout.

There is nothing good and ennobling in human life and character that is not sustained by Biblical teaching.

There is nothing bad and ignoble in human life and character which Biblical teaching does not condemn.

Do you want food for meditation along the line of an ideal life? Commit to memory the 5th, 6th and 7th Chapters of Matthew's gospel.

A really true and noble life cannot be measured by wealth and affluence; Neither by mere moral character.

The life hidden with Christ in God only can reach the zenith of human perfection.

The grandest heroism that graces the pages of human history is that of the Christian Martyrs.

Absolutely nothing is more plainly taught in the holy and by the Holy Ghost inspired Book of God than is the premillenial return to this sin-cursed earth of Jesus the Christ of God.

By the above I do not wish or intend to challenge the honesty of the Postmillenialist. But, Brethren, to me the above truth has been an inspiration for 60 years. I have preached it for 58 years. I have a longing desire to belong to the "wise virgins" when the "Bridegroom Cometh." See Matthew 25 ch.

We are living in an age of rapid and wonderful fulfillment of Bible prophecies and surely the Figtree is putting forth its buds.

We are living in a dark hour. But "At eventide there shall be light."

The resurrection change and rapture of the saints may take place at any moment. Then the intensity of earthly darkness will be momentarily increased.

But it won't last long, for then the last great battle—Armegeddon—will be fought, Christ and his saints will assume the reins of government. "Hasten, Lord, the glorious time."

Preachers' Pension Funds Reach Half Way Mark

BY REV. JOHN T. BRABNER SMITH

Manager of Campaign and Publicity Board of Conference Claimants, Methodist Episcopal Church

Protestant churches now have approximately $33,000,000 of the $65,000,000 preachers' pension fund which is being raised. By denominations, present pension funds are: Methodist Episcopal, $12,000,000; Protestant Episcopal, $8,500,000; Presbyterian, $6,559,933; Northern Baptist, $2,000,000; Congregational, $1,900,000; Methodist Episcopal church, South, $1,200,000; General Synod, Lutheran Church, $150,000; Augustant Synod, Evangelical Lutheran, $265,000; Church of Christ, $316,000, and the Presbyterian, Southern, has an annual budget of $60,000.

The churches long ago recognized the justice of preachers' pensions. In 1742 the Moravian Church was first planted in America and pensioned its pastors. Methodism was an early pioneer in the pension movement, for in 1753 a fund for worn-out ministers was inaugurated by the Rev. John Wesley, and in 1774, the second American Conference ordered an Easter collection for needy itinerants.

At the Methodist Episcopal General Conference in 1908, strong laymen secured legislation which created the Board of Conference Claimants with Dr. Joseph B. Hingeley as corresponding secretary. Laymen said this movement was "Inherent, Foremost, Supreme." In 1912 campaigns were authorized for $5,000,000, now our church is seeking $20,000,000. The total Disciplinary Claim for the 2,973 retired ministers, 3,225 widows and 443 orphans is $2,000,000. In 1900 the amount paid was $665,000, in 1917 it was $1,265,000, an increase of $600,000.

In 1913 not one retired minister received an allowance of as much as $600, but in 1916 there were sixty-eight veterans who received $600, and in 1917 these averages were largely augmented. The average salery of Methodist ministers is $1,000 for the first time in the history of the church.

PEP

BY WILLIAM H. LEACH

No it isn't a new kind of breakfast food. But it is a food. It isn't a new variety of patent medicine. But it is a good tonic. It isn't the name for a new and powerful explosive. But again it is an explosive. It is one of the qualities which Webster did not define, but with which the youth of America are familiar. It is one of the terms that are being transposed by public consent from the slang to the column of respectable English words.

When I saw the word occupying a large bulletin board in front of one of our churches I was puzzled. Then I became so interested that I decided that I would ask the pastor of that church for an explanation. He smiled when he heard the inquiry. Many others had asked that same question. Then he told me what "pep" had meant to his church.

He first heard the expression when in a meeting of the Young People's Society. The leader, a young lady, in her remarks stated that their society needed more pep. The expression so impressed him that he used it that night in his public prayer. At a meeting of his official board the word was again used. At prayer meeting somebody suggested getting song books which had a little more pep. To cap the climax the minister preached a sermon on pep. And now for several weeks it has used the place of honor on the bulletin board. And he informed me that its spirit was infecting the members of his church. They really had more pep.

Pep is a great food for weak souls. When knees shake as one enters the church, or officials hesitate in the prosecution of their tasks, serve pep. Many a soul has been saved in the joyous and spontaneous enthusiasm of religious worship that would have perished in the dull, monotonous routine of some services. Likewise many an individual is interested in a church that toes the line, does things on time, does them well, and takes a joy in doing them. Churches that are afflicted with weakness in decisions and action have very little influence on their communities. When they freeze half the winter before they buy their season's supply of coal, and celebrate Children's Day the middle of July, they lose what respect they may have had. For these churches we advise pep.

Pep also is a tonic. It is a tonic for churches and individuals suffering from spiritual ennui. This disease sometimes follows seasons of spiritual excitement. It is one of the reactions which the spiritual life must guard against. When one grows tired of church activities, when a minister fears the approach of the hour of worship, when the routine of the church is dreaded as a tax collector is dreadful, a tonic is needed. In this condition a church wonders how it ever could be so silly as to sing songs, pray and testify with fervor. Devils of this nature are hard to drive from our lives. They come out with prayer, fasting, and pep.

Pep is an explosive. Here it does a valuable work. It gets under a dead individual or a dead church and explodes, and the thing comes to life. Churches that have died, believing they have fought the good fight and finished the course, can be brought back to actual service by a legitimate use of this powerful quality.

The principal characteristic of pep is action. That is why it opens the doors of spiritual opportunity. The supreme virtues of Christian life are found in action. When Jesus began to break the loaves they multiplied. Demosthenes is called a great orator, not because people were charmed by his eloquence, but because they left hearing his orations to act. Action is the test of our religion.

Pep produces this action. It may not always be wise, but it is better to make a few mistakes than to do nothing at all. That would be the great mistake. Wasn't this the quality which God promised to Ezekiel in the vision of the dry bones? Here are the words: "Hear the words of Jehovah. Behold! I will open your graves and cause you to come out of your graves." If it was possible for God to bring the dry bones to life in the day of Ezekiel, it should be easily possible for him to bring action to the flesh and blood of the Christian of America.

If I were an artist I would include an illustration in this article. It would be the picture of a half-open pod with three peas in it. I should call it the pod of religious action, and I would name the three peas Prayer, Perseverence, and Pep. They are an invincible trio.—Christian Advocate.

Self-Centered Lives

BY REV. CHARLES STELZLE

It is "righteousness" that exalts a nation—not "self-righteousness." This is also true of the individual.

When poor discouraged Elijah wanted the Lord to take away his life, it was on the plea that he alone of all the Israelites had been loyal to the God of their fathers.

"I, even I only, am left; and they seek my life, to take it away," he said.

But Elijah was reminded that there were fully seven thousand in Israel who hadn't bowed the knee to Baal nor kissed him.

Elijah's declaration was probably due to a fit of the blues. This kind of thing is responsible for the spirit that sometimes grows among many really loyal men and women. Perhaps it is more pardonable than the spirit of self-righteousness, but it also is provoking to the loyal "seven thousand" who have been true to the demands of the hour.

It all resolves itself into this fact—most of us are too self-centered. We come to believe that our little plan is the most important, and, therefore, we think that our little lives are counting for the most. And it is quite likely that in most things we are absolutely honest.

But there are others whose lives and whose plans are counting for just as much as ours, but they are operating in different ways and they are influencing different people. Let us give them credit for what they are doing. They are working out in all sincerity their own lives, and this is well. It is all that we have a right to expect of them.

And so, whether it be self-righteousness or a fit of the blues that has swung us out of harmony with the best movements of modern times—let us swing back. We are injuring no one but ourselves by holding aloof from our fellows.

How a Famous Poem Was Written

Admirers of Sam Walter Foss' poem, "The House by the Side of the Road," are many. The story of his writing it is known to few. He was an enthusiastic traveler, and on one of his trips through England he came, at the top of a long hill, to a little unpainted house set almost in the road, so near it was. Near one side was a queerly constructed signpost finger, pointing to a well-worn path and a sign, "Come in and have a cool drink." Following the path, he found in the side of the bank, some distance from the house, a spring of ice cold water into which a barrel had been sunk, and above which hung an old-fashioned gourd dipper. And on a bench near by—a wonder—was a basket of fragrant apples, with another sign, "Help yourself."

Scenting a story, he went back to the house where he found a childless old couple in straitened circumstances, with the rocky farm as their only source of livelihood. But it was rich in the delicious spring water and an abundance of fruit, so the sign was placed guiding to the water, and from the time of the ripening of the first purple plum to the harvesting of the last red apple, a basket of whatever fruit might be in season was placed near, that every one passing might rest upon the long hill and refresh himself.

The old gentleman explained that they were too poor to give money, so took this way to add their mite to the world's welldoing.

The beautiful thought and its real helpfulness so impressed Foss that he immortalized with his pen the spirit of the ideal home.

Let me live in my house by the side of the road
Where the race of men go by—
They are good, they are bad, they are weak, they are strong,
Wise, foolish, so am I.

Then why should I sit in a scorner's seat
Or hurl the cynic's ban?
Let me live in my house by the side of the road
And be a friend to man. —Unknown.

Christian Science Vs. Common Sense

He was a Christian Scientist, with a mild, benignant air,
And for unwary victims he set a cunning snare.
From out the "rural district" an old backwoodsman came.
His steps were slow and feeble, for he was old and lame.
He heard of Christian Science, and, as he thought it o'er,
He said, "I guess I'll get some, my jints are stiff and sore."
So to the portly healer,. who sat in self content,
With plump hands idly folded, the good old farmer went.
Said he, "This way of healin' is square, I swan it is.
'N' I want a dose of science to cure my rheumatiz."
The great man eyed his caller, and sat in thought a while,
Then leaned back in his armchair; and said with placid smile,
"My friend, there is no suffering—to think so is to sin,
Remember you are God's child, and let his presence in.
Since God is All forever, what is there then to heal?
God surely can not suffer, and matter can not feel.
With truth and goodness present, how then can sickness stay?
For good is never evil, as night is never day.
So, when you think you're suffering (which really you are not),
The cure is very simple—just change your sinful thought.
And if you should be tempted to have a pain some day,
Let good o'ercome the evil, and drive such thoughts away.
Now this belief of lameness good thoughts will soon dispel,
And when friends ask, 'How are you?' just answer, 'I am well."
And mind shall conquer matter, and thought shall reign supreme;
These bodies are but shadows, this world is but a dream.
Then live in perfect harmony and discord quickly flees;
Consider yourself painless—five dollars, if you please."
The farmer stared in silence and slowly scratched his head.
"So this is Christian Science! Wall, I'll be blest!" he said.
"My back is jes' as cricky, my legs is jes' as lame.
Your lingo may be Science, it kinder sounds that way,
But where the Christian part is, I'm sure it's hard to say.
It sorta riles my temper and makes my spirit rise
To hear you mixin' sermon with scientific lies.
It's lucky I ain't chipper, or you might have to hop;
I'd turn things topsy-turvy in this old science shop.
A sin to suffer, is it? (Of all the cranky stuff)
Wall, then, you'd be a sinner if I was strong enough!
I'd give ye a temptation to ache in many a spot,
'N' then I'd sit and tell you to change your sinful thought.
You say that good ain't evil—wall, I don't say it is,
'N' I don't say the Almighty has got my rheumatiz.
It is in my old body and gives me many a jar!
'N' tain't no make b'lieve nuther, for when it's thar, it's thar!
I never had much larnin', but still I got the brain.
'N' cal'late I know enough to ache when I'm in pain.
I may not be an angel, perhaps I am still in sin,
But I get an honest livin', and don't take poor folks in.
'N' I don't tell a feller his pain is in his mind,
'N' gobble onto money for saying something kind.
Now if my plaguey lameness should disappear some day,
If it was God as done it why should you want the pay?
'N' I should say five dollars was a little too dear for sand,
So I'm obliged to tell ye, your little bill must stand.
'N' if you thought's so mighty, jes think you've got your pay,
I don't pay cash to shadders—so I'll jest say good day."

Some Hardships of an Editor

The first hardship we would mention that he has to endure is that he is so limited in knowledge, for, judging from many letters of inquiries that have reached our office an editor should be omniscient to comply with requests. He is to impart information on almost every conceivable subject, some of which God alone could answer, but who for valid reasons has not and will not reveal. Furthermore he is compelled quite frequently to reject articles sent to him which could not add merit to the paper nor reflect credit on the writer. Poetry, yes we have received enough poetry since we have become an editor to fill a fairsized booklet, but for the good reputation of the authors they have never been printed. Some men seem to think that all that is necessary for a poem to pass editorial muster is to make the lines rhyme. Then too an editor must edit manuscripts and at times he receives credit for the work done by a scathing rebuke from the writer! Moreover, some contributors seem to think they know more and use better judgment than the editor! Perhaps they do when viewed from their standpoint, on that idea they stand pat.

Some writers seem to think that they are heard because of their many words, and when an editor insists on brevity he may receive a missive containing a riot law proclamation! Of course in due time an editor gets hardened and such missives hurt about as much as cooked peas shot at Gibraltar. . Condensation is the prevailing law of today of newspaper editorials and articles and of sermons if they are to be read and profitably listened to. Some men say more in a few paragraphs than others on a whole page and some ministers do more good in preaching a thirty minute sermon than others in an hour's repetitious jumblings. Ornamentation counts for very little in a newspaper article or in a sermon. People want ideas not words, doctrines not trimmings, facts not long-spun theories, truth in a nut shell and not high sounding, scholastic phrases and paragraphs. The target should be hit at once without a reader having to wade through paragraphs to find what the writer has for his goal. An editor needs much grace, and an enormous amount of patience and a balanced judgment.—Evangelical Messenger.

American Mothers, Will You Help to "Hold The Line?"

The Question Uncle Sam is Asking of Loyal American Women

BY MRS. MAX WEST

Back of that hotly contested battle line in Flanders and Belgium, which marks the stand of liberty against despotism; back of the splendid staunchness of the battle cry, "ils ne passeront pas!" to which the United States has sent and is sending such ringing response, stands another fighting line, hardly less important to the safety of civilization. This line is held by American mothers. Thousands of them have sent their sons to France, and thousands more will send theirs before this bitter fight is over. But in this "second line of defense," as it has been called, stand many mothers whose sons and daughters will be given to the service of the United States in the years to come in no less a patriotic sense than those are given who now go forth to war. For at the close of this war and for generations to come the progress of civilization will depend upon the kind of men and women who are ready to take up its battles.

The young American mother must begin today to lay the foundation of perfect health, upon which the highest degree of physical and mental efficiency is built. To direct and manage the food and care of young children so intelligently that every child will have the best possible start toward such a life as the big, patriotic task which the Nation is asking of young American mothers, and it is one which will bring immeasurable reward in the years to come if it is well done now.

Many thousands of young children in this country are suffering from the lack of such intelligent care, particularly from poor food and improper methods of feeding. A recent aritcle in this series has called attention to the great importance of proper feeding in the first year of life, more especially to the great need of breast-feeding. But throughout infancy and childhood the food must still be carefully selected if children are to thrive. A great many mothers boast, smilingly, "O, my baby eats everything we have on the table!" as if that were something to be proud of. They fail to realize that the digestive machinery of a young child is no more capable of dealing with all the foods which an adult may eat than their muscles and brain are capable of doing the work of a grown person. This dangerous idea, which is widespread, is without doubt partially responsible for much weakness, illness, and imperfect development of the growing child's body.

To help mothers select and manage the diet in such a way that the child will secure all the elements necessary for healthy growth, and to suggest many details of the routine care of the normal child, the Children's Bureau, U. S. Department of Labor, Washington, D. C., will soon publish a simple bulletin on the care of the child of the pre-school age, which any mother may have, without charge, by addressing the Bureau. One practical point for mothers to remember is that milk is essential in the diet of young children, and that for them there is no other food of equal digestibility and availability that will take its place.

At the present moment a wide effort is being made throughout the United States to learn whether our young children are above are below par in physical health, by weighing and measuring those under six years of age. These measurements will be compared with average heights and weights for children of each age. The attention of parents will thus be called to the needs of children who are noticeably below the average.

Parents desiring to have their children weighed and measured may secure information regarding the national test by addressing the nearest chairman of the Woman's Committee of the Council of National Defense, or the Children's Bureau, U. S. Department of Labor, Washington, D. C.

The weighing and measuring test of children under school age, now going forward in connection with Children's Year, will afford American mothers a splendid opportunity to take part in the campaign to save 100,000 lives. When a child is found to be notably below the average in his development it may mean in many cases that he is not sufficiently nourished, either from actual lack of food, or because his food is badly chosen, or because he has been allowed to fall into bad eating habits.

A recent report by Dr. Josephine Baker, Chief of the Division of Hygiene, of the city of New York, says that 90,000 school children in that city are distinctly undernourished, 30,000 more are in need of medical attention, while still thousands more are in such a state of health that they will easily slip over into under nourishment if present conditions continue. It is impossible to do much to correct in adults the results of malnutrition in childhood, but there are about ten million children under five years of age in American homes today who can be prevented from making such a showing as they shall come on to maturity. These undernourished school children began, in many cases, by being undernourished in the years while they were yet at home, when the results might, perhaps, have been prevented if the mother had understood what was taking place.

Children must have plenty to eat. Adults can get along for some time, if necessary, on noticeably restricted diets without serious impairment of health, but children can not draw on their reserves in this way without detriment to their growth and vigor. Children from two to six years should have three good meals a day, the heaviest one being in the middle of the day. Their day's food should include plenty of milk, not less than 1½ pints—skim milk may be used if butter is given also—plenty of cereals and green vegetables, particularly leaf vegetables, such as spinach. It is desirable also to have a more varied diet and to include sugar, fruits, eggs, and meats, with fish and fowl, in the daily meals. Information regarding these matters will be furnished to mothers if they will write to the Children's Bureau, U. S. Department of Labor, Washington, D. C.

Where the conditions are such that children are suffering from actual lack of food, the community must deal with the problem and apply to it such solution as may best fit local conditions.

In a great many cases, malnutrition is due not to lack of food but to a badly chosen diet. In this group of cases the remedy lies chiefly in educating mothers in the better selection and preparation of the food of their children. One proposal of the working program of the Children's Year is that classes shall be established which will give mothers practical information as to the sort of food their children need, and how to prepare it.

Such classes may be undertaken in connection with schools, particularly summer schools, or by the community, as a part of the Children's Year Campaign.

REVIEW OF
The Thought and Work of the Church

READ THIS: Within the next two weeks we will remove more than ONE HUNDRED names from the Evangelist subscription list unless their renewals have been sent in before that time. All these subscribers have had personal notices sent them and more than one hundred renewals have been received within the last ten days, but there remain more than that that have not responded to our appeal and unless a response is received soon their names will be taken from the list. We regret to do this, but paper costs mnoey and labor must be paid, and this is impossible to do with UNPAID subscriptions. We have been exceedingly patient, so Brethren please renew IMMEDIATELY.

Today an out of town visitor to Ashland said she reads EVERY WORD in the Evangelist every week, and last week we received a letter from a member in Michigan with her renewal in which she expressed great thankfulness that we had not stopped the paper when her subscription expired as she regarded the Evangelist as a weekly letter from home. These words of encouragement help us to persevere in our determination to make the paper reach as many Brethren homes as possible.

H. F. O'Neill of Pittsburgh makes a strong appeal and a rather severe arraignment of the Brethren churches and of some of their pastors in this number of the Evangelist, but his complaint or rebuke however we may take it is not without justification or foundation. With practically every church in America taking advanced steps to care for their retired ministers it is nothing to the credit of the Brethren church that we have done so little for those who have been in the work from the very beginning, but who must now lay down their tools because of advancing years. Any church that refuses to co-operate with the Board of Benevolences in this attempt to care for the aged Brethren preachers is unworthy the name of Brethren and does not deserve to be ministered to by any Brethren minister, be he young or old.

C. F. Yoder writes interestingly of the work in South America as he finds it after his return from his visit to the home land. Commendable progress is being made in the established points and new work is being opened that bids fair to succeed in the name of the Lord. Brother Atkinson has baptized four converts at Cabrera recently and two have been baptized in Rio Cuarto. Thus the good work goes on and it makes little difference whether it is in North America, South America or in Africa, wherever the Word of God is faithfully taught there men and women turn to Jesus Christ for salvation. This was the promise Jesus made to his disciples as he gave them the message to carry to every nation of the world.

While Brother Jennings mentioned in his "Travel Notes" that he had been at Sunnyside, Washington to labor with Brother Ashman in an evangelistic meeting he left the report of the results of the meeting to the pastor himself. Brother Ashman calls it a victory and we rejoice. The meetings resulted in forty-eight confessions. Some came by relation, some by reconsecration, twenty-five have been baptized and a number of others are awaiting baptism. The Sunnyside church is endeavoring to reach the goals of the Four-Year Program and the prospects are good that their ambitions will be reached.

C. D. Whitmer who has been preaching at LaPaz, Indiana for the past two years with good success expects to close his work there in October when he will be open to a call in some other field.

At Hagerstown, Maryland three members were recently received into the church by the pastor, A. B. Cover. Brother Cover furnishes our readers with the leading article in this number of the Evangelist.

One of the Brethren churches that was hard hit by the severe winter weather and by much sickness the past winter was Brighton, Indiana; but it is rapidly recovering from the set-back of the winter and is endeavoring to regain the time lost. The Sunday school is making a special effort to regain the standing it had before the great inroads made by the severe winter. Brother Thomas of South Bend was with them for a short time and conducted the Mothers' Day services, also the communion service at the close of the meeting and great good was accomplished.

A report of the receipts for the Kentucky work for the months of March and April is made in this issue of the Evangelist and an appeal is made to those who have pledges to this support still unredeemed to pay them as promptly as possible.

Also a most urgent appeal is made for workers. The harvest is great but the reapers are altogether too few. Several good school teachers are needed and also some good woman to take charge of the dormitory. Who will go?

Brother Carpenter reports that six converts were baptized in Peru on the first Sunday in May. One of the modern movements of this church is the organizing of a Soul-Winners' League with fifty-six members. With such an organization as this efficiently equipped the Peru church should be able to go steadily forward in building up the kingdom of God in that city.

In his "News from the North," Brother Miller tells of the good things that have recently come to a few of the churches in Michigan and also of some of the good things they yet have in prospect. Two short meetings were conducted by Brother Johnson of Berne, Indiana and much good accomplished. Five members were received into the church by baptism the first Sunday Brother Johnson was with them and eight more await the sacred rite at some future time.

In his Campaign Notes this week Brother Beachler reports the "biggest" victory of the campaign. He spent nearly a month in Somerset county, Pennsylvania, but it was time well spent as he secured more than $7,500.00 for permanent endowment for Ashland College from one charge consisting of three churches. E. D. Burnworth is pastor here and we are sure his attitude previous to the coming of Brother Beachler had much to do with the success of the canvass. As Brother Beachler says, the Evangelist going into every home in these three churches was a mighty factor in acquainting the members with both the nature and the need of the campaign and they responded nobly. We predict that when Pennsylvanians once get their "Dutch up" they will show the balance of the Brotherhood just what the Pennsylvania Dutch can do when they once take a notion, but the Editor will not get jealous as his father was a Pennsylvanian and he has many relatives among the Brethren of the old Keystone state. A magnificent pace has been set by the Meyersdale charge.

If the churches of Pennsylvania will heed the call of Prof. Edward Byers, district goal director for the endowment campaign, Brother Beachler will have no difficulty in leading Pennsylvania up to a fifty thousand dollar victory, and the rest of the Brotherhood will rejoice to see him accomplish this great result for Ashland College.

The Faith of Our Fathers

A great deal has always been made of the "Faith of our Fathers," and it seems that a general blessing is expected to rest upon those who prove true to such faith. That such expectations are reasonable depends wholly upon the assumption that the faith of the fathers is a holy faith, that it is a faith in the one true God and that it expresses a trust in this being that no other faith expresses quite as well.

However much one may desire to see the faith of the fathers perpetuated and however much one may wish to see the children walking in the faith of their fathers, it is to be noted that disappointment is frequent. Fathers often do all they know how to do to have their children walk in their faith and to worship their God as they worship him but still they sometimes fail. In a measure it may be the fault of the parent, but as society is constituted at present the home is not as large a factor in the bringing up of children as it used to be and perhaps society at large will have to share the responsibility for the departure of the child from his father's faith along with the father, for the father is no longer supreme in the ordering of the affairs of his household. Other influences are at work that are frequently stronger than his. And yet there is always a feeling of sadness comes over one when it is learned how a father has done all he knows to keep his children in his faith, but after all has failed.

A short time ago we sent a subscription expiration notice to a subscriber to the Evangelist and received the following reply, in substance, "Discontinue my subscription, as I did not subscribe for the paper in the first place. I never read it, in fact I never remove the wrapper from it." Now we happen to know this man's father who sent him the paper for one year and we know him to be a most loyal and true Brethren, and we know other members of the family who are earnest workers in the church; but this son seems to have no appreciation of his father's religion nor of his father's God. We do not know him personally, but we take it that the god of this world is the god at whose shrine he bows, and we predict that some time, when his father's voice is stilled, he will learn to appreciate some of the things his father tried to do for him since his leaving the parental roof and his going out into the big western world to fight under the banner of the god of business, and he will remember that the faith of his father and mother was a faith that held them true to all ideals of nobility and righteousness, and there may come a time when he will cry out for a return of the faith in which his boyhood days were spent, and we pray his cry may be heard.

How Altogether Different

In our yesterday's mail we received a card from a sister whose name is familiar to all the brotherhood as a self-denying follower of Jesus and as a contributor in a most generous way according to her means, to all the funds the church endeavors to raise for the extension of the kingdom of God on the earth.

This sister had been away from home for a few days and her mail had accumulated in her absence, but she wrote that among the papers that arrived during her absence was the Brethren Evnagelist, and upon her return home this was the first paper she looked through as it ALWAYS is, which fact shows in what direction her mind is turned, and she added to her note the following thought: "You cannot know how my heart leaped when I read the announcement of the achievement of the Evangelist in reaching the four thousand mark, and as I have no one to talk about it I just thought I would write and tell you." Now mark these words which she added, "I have long felt that if every member of the church could be persuaded to READ the Evangelist we should have a solution to all the hard problems the church has to meet.' Such a faith as this is worthy of commendation and we agree fully with the statement of our earnest sister concerning the importance of keeping in touch with God and his work through the church by reading the church paper. A universal reading of the paper would certainly go far toward solving the problems the church must meet and that are calling loudly for some one to take seriously in these days of distraction the matter of making the salvation offered by Jesus Christ known to all the world.

Rebuking God

In the study of the Sunday school lesson of something more than a month ago we were deeply impressed with a statement made by Charles Gallaudet Trumbull in the Sunday School Times. It was the lesson bearing upon the great confession that Peter made of the Messiahship of Jesus and of his subsequent attitude toward the Master. The statement made is this: "It is an awful thing to lay hands upon God and rebuke him." We are free to confess that this incident in the life of Jesus and the relation of the apostles made an impression on us that had never before been made, and we were made to wonder how many of us, who call ourselves humble followers of the Lord may be found unconsciously doing as Peter did, rebuking God.

It is true that Peter had just made a most wonderful confession, a confession that all Christians have been required to make ever since, that is that Jesus is the very Son of God, but when we learned that to meet the requirements of his sonship Jesus must make the supreme sacrifice, that the very Son of God must die on the cross, it seemed more than he could stand and he took Jesus and "began to rebuke him." O, the boldness and blindness of the man! To stand in the very presence of God and offer a rebuke to him! We are amazed at the folly of it all, and yet who of us is not guilty of the same offense? How many of us have always accepted the decrees of God without murmur or complaint? And when we have rebelled against some of the provisions of the plan of salvation and have thought surely there is some other way that is just as effective and with the objectionable features removed, have we not been guilty of presumptuous sins such as the Psalmist prayed the Lord to keep him from? and are we not rebuking God? Let us not be too free in our condemnation of Peter's weaknesses until we are sure we are ourselves free from guilt.

Economizing for Christ

More and more is the doctrine of conservation or of economy being pressed home to the American people as the possibility of a still longer drawn-out war dawns more fully upon them. On every hand we are urged to conserve every resource to economize in every article of common consumption that the cause of right may more surely prevail.

To many people of limited means who have been used to practising the strictest economy all their lives it is a serious problem as to how they are to be able to become any more economical or to practice the rules of conservation any more faithfully than they have been doing all their lives. But some way is always found, and a way will be found to meet this emergency. But a really serious question is that which concerns just what we MUST give up to meet the demands of the various humanitarian interests developed by the war situation. One good sister from Indiana recently wrote us that she hated to do so, but that she would be compelled to discontinue her subscription to the Evangelist as the calls for Red Cross funds and other funds for the welfare and success of the American soldier boys made such heavy demands upon her that she felt compelled to stop her church paper.

Right here we wish to state that this sister takes a wrong view of the matter. The leaders of the welfare work in America as well as the leaders in military matters do not ask the people to cut down their expenditures for the maintenance of the churches for the sake of the Red Cross, the Y. M. C. A. and other helpful institutions. They know that the principles that are upholding these institutions are the principles of the Christian church and that there is no organization in America whose influence is more needed to assure the success of their cause than the influence of the church.

As a consequence the pastors of the churches are appealed to constantly to lend their influence to these great causes, and the religious papers of the country are besieged on every hand to support there great movements. We have no idea how many appeals for the Red Cross, the Y. M. C. A., the Liberty Loan, the Thrift Stamp movement, Armenian and Assyrian relief and multitudes of things, are made to the Evangelist every week. Our mail is crowded with these appeals, and we give them such publicity as we feel we are justified in doing. But if our readers were to cut off their subscriptions to the Evangelist in order to have funds to meet these appeals it would defeat their very purpose, and it would be useless to print them. We are not asked to sacrifice our religious privileges and it is a mistake for any one to stop their church paper to contribute to any one of these other causes. The churches and the church institutions must be supported or the very foundation upon which American liberty is built will give way.

We must simply bear a little heavier burden, and few institutions are compelled by circumstances to bear heavier burdens because of prevailing conditions than the publishing institutions of the American churches. We are all compelled to do things that we would rather not do, if there were any way out of it. Only last week we were COMPELLED to buy ten thousand pounds of paper we did not want in order to get any paper at all to continue our publications. Away last winter we had placed our order for a six-months' supply to be delivered in April and the middle of May came and no paper. The representative from the paper mill came and said the paper had been ready to ship for a month, but that the government will not let them ship it until they have EIGHTY THOUSAND pounds in the car, so all we could do was to buy ten thousand pounds more and of a grade we do not care to use in order to get any at all. The government has taken over the material used in the manufacture of the grade of stock we have been using and it is no longer manufactured, so after the first twenty thousand pounds are used up we will be forced to use a poorer grade that costs more money than the stock we have been using for years. So Brethren you see we have our troubles and we need your support to help us over the hard places.

African Letter

At Sea, Off Africa's West Coast,
February 14, 1918

To the Readers of the Brethren Evangelist:

You have received through Miss Myers a report of our journey to St. Lucia. We found this to be an interesting place indeed. As our boat steamed into the harbor a large crowd of ragged natives ceased their spasmodic labor of carrying coal and wood, and endeavored to attract the attention of the passengers with their songs, their dances and their wares. Curious baskets, canes, etc., were among the latter. Their songs and dances like those of all the dark-skinned peoples are indescribable.

We went on shore and did some necessary purchasing. Helmets were procured for Miss Myers and Miss Snyder, and a sun hat for Marguerite, as no child's helmet was obtainable. This with posting our letters, and mailing a package of winter clothing occupied our time before lunch, as business is accomplished slowly, even in the sub-tropics.

In the afternoon we went to the market and the botanical gardens. We were able to purchase very cheaply such tropical fruits as the pawpaw, and the "coeur de boeuf." It was interesting to see the nutmeg, and other distinctive tropical trees in the botanical gardens. We found the day a pleasant break in the monotony of the voyage.

We were interested to see a large steamer in harbor at St. Lucia, and our interest increased as we discovered it to be the "City of York," on which we fondly hope more workers are now embarked.

We remained in harbor all night and on the following morning sailed out again into a sea of unusual roughness. Such rough weather did we have for the following week that a large proportion of the passengers were prostrated with a greater or less degree of sea sickness. Those of us who escaped nausea were unable to sleep at night because of the violent rocking of the boat which rolled or pitched us from side to side and from end to end of our narrow berths. As we neared the equator, however, and passed out of the realm of the trade winds the violent rocking ceased, and we experienced a few days of comparative quiet. As we entered the region of southerly trade winds we again suffered from rough seas, but less pronounced than in the northern zone. The roughest riding of the voyage was however to be reserved for us on the last day preceding our arrival at Cape Town.

Outwardly our whole voyage from St. Lucia to Cape Town was uneventful. Occasionally a ship was sighted; now and then the bold "City of Cairo changed its course to avoid a possible raider, but aside from these minor events, little was visible. We did not even have our expected break at St. Helena, and so we not only missed seeing that interesting island, but you missed the mail we had hoped to send you.

Every Saturday afternoon at half past four o'clock we had our life-boat drill and when we were passing through the danger zone on our last morning on board, all passengers were instructed to be up and ready for life boat drill at 6 A. M. But no warning whistle sounded, and with scarcely a realization of our possible danger we steamed safely into Cape Town harbor.

But while our voyage was uneventful outwardly, on board we were a busy little community. French class daily, for we must learn to talk before we reach Brazzaville! Sango also daily, for the sake of the dear people to whom we must so soon deliver our precious message. And then the Bible. How we delved in it! Twice in our daily classes, and then in our devotions. Often we were enabled thus to forget our sea sickness as our hearts were uplifted above our temporary discomforts.

Our hearts reached out to others too, for on board were a large number of unconverted. English stewards and stewardesses, Hindu servants, and Chinese coolies formed our little non-Christian population, and through the prayers of many and the endeavors of a few, some were led to Christ.

Seldom has such a company of missionaries sailed on one vessel for foreign lands. Thirty-nine adults and twenty children were bound on the City of Cairo for Africa, India ,and the islands of the sea. No wonder we had blessed fellowship together. No wonder the disembarkment of many at Cape Town was a time of mutual pain as well as of Joy. Here we separated from the Stauffachers, never perhaps to see them again until we meet him in that glad day of his coming.

On the night we lay in port at St. Lucia an impromptu but important conference of missionaries was held. Pros and cons were duly considered, and our route changed from Cape Town to Ubanji Shawvia Loanda and Matadi instead of via Durban and Mombasa. We were able to send a letter back to you from St. Lucia with results of our partial decision.

One death occurred while enroute on the "City of Cairo," that of a Mohammedan stoker. He was buried at noon on the following day, the boat barely stopping for the lowering of the body. No further ceremonies were celebrated. The death was accidental, caused by a fall of more than fifty feet. "In the midst of life we are in death." Our gratitude toward our Heavenly Father is great for the preservation in health of almost the entire population in the little world on which we sailed. Aside from sea sickness, an occasional cold, etc., no serious illness occurred after Mr. Martin's restoration to health.

Crossing the equator is always considered an occasion for celebration, but we have never witnessed anything so violent as on the City of Cairo, where some volunteers not previously initiated were grotesquely shaved and thrown into a tank of water.

We arrived at Cape town on February 6, having spent one month on the City of Cairo, on which we embarked on January 7. The beauties of Cape Town Harbor and the evanescent charm of the clouds which hang over Table Mountain are indescribably entrancing.

We had expected to have at least two weeks in Cape Town, but we made it among our first duties to ascertain the possibilities of getting to Loanda by boat. I can hardly describe my joy when I found that we could leave in two days on the S. S. Outeniqua of the Norwegian Line for Loanda. We were the more conscious of God's marvelous working in our behalf when we learned that had we continued with the City of Cairo to Durban we must have remained there until the last of March.

Our hosts of friends in Cape Town we had to leave unvisited, but our room at the hotel was not only a bed room, but a sitting room and reception room for others besides our own family. These two busy days! American, Belgian and Portuguese consuls to visit, tropical purchases to make, 68 pieces of baggage to make their transit through customs, and to be relabeled Loanda, instead of Durban. (Since leaving we have changed the labels again to Matadi; a further port of destination.) Our tickets to purchase, the bank to visit and our Durban drafts to have cashed or redrawn; English French, Belgian and Portuguese money to obtain; letters and post cards to write to dear ones at home; a patient to prescribe for, callers to receive, medicines to purchase at wholesale rates for a missionary friend, and then as a last sweet climax, dinner at Three Anchor Bay with our old friends the Jenkins, and a superb ride around Table Mountain in their Dodge automobile.

And then the Outeniqua—Every passenger a missionary. Marguerite has a playmate in little Charles Hedges, the three-year-old son of missionaries of the Christian church to Bolenge and other stations. Our little party including the children numbers just thirteen. We sailed on Friday, February 8th, but were delayed two days and a half just sixty miles out of Cape Town for repairs.

We had a famous South Easter as we embarked at Cape Town, which threatened to blow our automobile into the sea. Our helmets were lost and regained again, somewhat the worse for their unexpected bath. One of our bags of tenting was overlooked, at Cape Town and we shall not be able to secure it again until we are finally settled in Ubangi Shari. But even our losses shall be overruled by his beneficient hand, and so we journey gladly on.

At Cape Town our former experiences were vividly brought to our memory.

Then we were abased, now we abound.

Then we knew what it was to suffer need. Now we are abundantly cared for.

Then we were alone. Now God has given us our two brave young lady comrades. (where are the men?) and our little Marguerite. Then penniless and without food, I priced tropical medicines in the same store in which I now have purchased them for Mr. Haas, my own like needs having been abundantly supplied in the home land.

Tomorrow at one of West Africa's ports I hope to mail this to you.

We unite in loving greetings. We have felt the power which results from your prayers, and with renewed strength of purpose we ar epressing forward, crying,

"Ubangi Shari —Victory."

Yours in Him,

FLORENCE NEWBERRY GRIBBLE.

News From the Field

Hagerstown, Maryland

Again it is our pleasure of sending to our beloved brotherhood a brief report of the Lord's progress at this place. Since our last report, three splendid people have been added to our membership: A husband and wife from Gettysburg, Pa. These dear people are living quite a distance from the church of their choice, but faith in the principles of a whole gospel, which were instilled into youthful minds, finds expression in the face of seeming obstructing obstacles. The third was a splendid young man of the city, husband of a member of the St. James' Church. May the Dear Lord bless these dear people in their obedience of faith, to God's glory.

We also are pleased to state that we have organized a Y. P. S. C. E.. We felt this need since our coming here, but did not see our way clear for launching out. But thank God, all difficulties have vanished, and you will hear gratifying results from the efforts of our splendid young people of Hagerstown.

A. B. COVER.

Howe, Indiana

Sometime ago I was asked to write a short sketch of what we were doing, by the Pastor E. W. Dietrick. Now that we are on our feet again, after the hard winter and spring everything will soon be up and blooming like the trees shooting forth their buds and the flowers their blossoms in the spring. Our Sunday school is increasing. At the first of the year we started the Cross and Crown system for increasing our membership. We are now on the second quarter. Twenty were present every Sunday for the first quarter. They now are owners of the bronze pin. Our C. E. is slowly moving with attendance fairly good. The S. S. C. E. is progressing and good work is being done by the sisters. We are increasing in numbers as well as in attendance. We are receiving great blessings from our Father above. We are saddened to mention the death of our dear faithful and loyal member, that of Mrs. Etta Plank, but our loss is heaven's gain.

Mothers' Day was very fittingly observed. Beautiful were the decorations. The sermons by Rev. A. E. Thomas of South Bend, who was just closing his three weeks' campaign for soul winning were a fine and appropriate, paying high tribute to our dear mothers.

Rev. Thomas as you know is small in stature but he is a mighty man of God. He worked strenuously under great difficulties, weather threatening, and the devil with his mighty forces got busy immediately, but through it all Brother Thomas was victorious. His sermons were so plain that even a small child could not help but understand. He was assisted several nights by the Boy Orator Virgil Horn, a small boy only eight years of age, by reciting such pieces moved the hearts of men. Communion services Monday evening was the largest attended for the past few years. The pastor now expects to have a series of sermons which he, by God's help, will give to the people. The County Sunday school Convention will be held at the Chapel Wednesday and Thursday of this week. We, a small band of workers ask an interest in your prayers that we may be prone to do ourselves just what God would have us do and be.

MRS. ETTA GOOD.

To Pastors and Membership of the Churches of Pennsylvania

Our Endowment Campaign Secretary, Brother Beachler is now in our district and the Myersdale circuit has already nobly responded to his call in behalf of Ashland College.

The success of our Endowment campaign will depend upon what each congregation in our district is willing to do—this in turn depends upon what each member in each church does. Remember you become a benefactor to future generations by doing your full duty now. Responsibility in giving rests upon the measure of your ability conditioned upon the degree of your prosperity.

The young manhood of the United States today is classified and priority of call is conditioned upon the class to which individuals belong after a thorough scrutinizing of evidence. In this matter of the call of posterity—for that is the call you hear—and obey if you give to the endowment fund. Where do you belong? If you are blessed with an abundance of this world's goods you belong to class one and you should not wait and finally give as if you belonged to class four.

Here in the old Keystone State, the historic home of our church in this country, Brother Beachler ought to meet with a continuous round of surprises. I shall take the liberty to say he will. Why can we not cause Indiana to reconsider her present subscription and ask for a second chance by swelling the figures of our district endowment?

We should remember that individuals and congregations in other denominations are in campaigns similar to ours.

The Church of God is now in an eight year campaign to raise $35,000 yearly, forty per cent of which goes to Findlay College. The German Reformed church is to raise one million dollars in two years in which every member of every congregation is to have part. The Presbyterians, Lutherans and in fact every denomination is in a campaign for college endowment. Financially able men in these denominations are distinguishing themselves by liberal gifts. Will our men measure up to their responsibility and distinguish themselves by doing proportionately well?

EDWARD BYERS,
Recruits and Endowment for the Pennsylvania District.

Travel Notes

On April 15th we reached the little town of Sunnyside which sets like a pearl in the beautiful Yakima Valley. This valley is surrounded by a long chain of beautiful mountains, some clothed in beautiful green and some wrapped in blankets of snow. Each day the unclouded blue sky can be seen. The sun seems to shine with double power and yet it is comfortable because of the tender breeze sweeping down from the snow covered mountains. The evenings are cool, one with a good conscience has no trouble to sleep and sleep sound. The people in the Yakima Valley have some things to try them as elsewhere, they have what is called dust storms and these storms sometimes demand a road a half mile wide and where they end I know not. Standing to one side watching them you would think the fields were on fire, the air is filled with dust and sand like smoke,—but it is soon over then a great calm. The people in the valley are generally healthy and prosperous. Now a million dollar beet factory is going up in Sunnyside which will bring more wealth to valley.

Brother Ashman and his party of soldiers had the breastwork in splendid shape, the soldiers well drilled. But the prince and power of the air and his wicked heartless soldiers were on the job and put up a great fight, but thank God, King Jesus, the Prince of Peace and the coming King of glory was with us in mighty power from the beginning to the finish and we do praise his name for victory.

If any preacher in the Brethren church has been tested and tried almost beyond measure Brother Ashman is the one. In every imaginable and conceivable way the enemy has tried to trap him simply because of his stand for right, and against popular sins of the day, such as the movies, theatre and dancing hall—these things are doing no little harm to the work of the Lord at Sunnyside. Why not fight the things which are bringing swift destruction to young manhood and young womanhood? So many people cry out the above mentioned are here to stay. So is the church of the living God here to stay until Jesus comes and takes it unto himself. Jesus said, "The gates of hell" shall not prevail against his church. Even the pastors at Sunnyside attended the movies until it was announced that the movies would be opened on Sunday evenings, then the pastors quit, but their members kept on going. Then Brother Ashman was called on to assist in the fight to close them on Sunday. Charles said yes I will help, however, they are not hurting my crowd. It pays to put up the fight in time.

Brother Ashman made the devil mad because of his decided stand against his wicked work in Sunnyside. Then a spirit of jealousy arose, he sent out his agencies to poison the minds of the people telling them downright falsehoods. The saying was common, Ashman, the Brethren preacher a traitor and unpatriotic, that he would not join the Red Cross, that he would not buy Liberty Bonds, that he would not make over the flag of stars and stripes. But it is an absolute fact that he belongs to the Red Cross, that he has a Liberty Bond, that the flag of the stars and stripes one of the first ones, hung back of a pulpit in Sunnyside. The next falsehood was that he tried to get the young men in his church not to register, but seventeen of the young men in his Sunday school class recall that he told them that they could serve their country in noncombatant lines and that they should do it. Not satisfied with this the devil put into hearts of some of the citizens of Sunnyside to set a trap to catch Ashman and some of them preacher Brothers at that who had heard that the pastor of the First Brethren church was not patriotic.| Instead of investigating the matter or going to see Brother Ashman face to face, they met together and talked it all over during his absence, planning against him. This they did not deny when Brother Ashman asked them about it. How could men of great minds, not speaking of the heart, be guilty of such things? It is said of the great Rufus Choate that he never spoke ill of the absent, nor would suffer others to do so in his presence in the absence of another.

At the request of our own Brethren in the faith at Sunnyside I have written these words to show the Brotherhood real hard down facts. Brother Ashman, I am glad to say, has the respect of his people, his Brethren and Sisters in the faith and is loved by them. There are a few who have drifted from the faith whose hearts are not in the work, and whose lives are set on fire with higher criticism. May the God of all love bring them back safe and sound, humbled and made free before it is everlastingly too late.

Brother Ashman will report the meeting. Our joy in the home with Brother Ashman and famliy, and among the good people at Sunnyside was beyond measure. This was our second meeting at Sunnyside; it was like going back home, our first meeting was two years ago with Brother Beal in both meetings God was pleased to bless.

We closed the meeting with a mountain top experience at the tables of our blessed Lord in the holy communion service, Brethren and Sisters old and young sat at the tables, some were at the tables who attended the first Love Feast at Sunnyside when only 28 were at the tables; they rejoiced at this Love Feast when looking into over two hundred faces at the tables that they had stood for the faith even in very dark days when but a little struggling band. Young brethren in the ministry let us not overlook these good old soldiers here and there in the churches who went in and cleared out the new ground bearing the burdens and the heat of the day, and at the eleventh hour we younger ministers walked into the cleared ground. God bless you dear old soldiers yet left and as you close the chapter of life may it close wtih a bright setting sun.

Brethren, you can bank on it that the Brethren church at Sunnyside is a live wire, and a live wire as a leader you may expect things to move heavenward. The kindness and hospitality which we received at Sunnyside, and the co-operation of the Brethren in the work gives them a large place in our heart, and in future time we shall always be glad to assist them in any way. The free-will offering was the largest we have received any place. May God bless you and pastor, and when Jesus comes to make up his jewels may he find each of you bright and shining ready for the change.

Please pray for us at Spokane in the fight with Brother Miller and people.

N. W. JENNINGS.

Victory at Sunnyside

We are rejoicing in several victories in the Lord. He gave us a great Easter. Our offering was $240, although our quota was only $125. At the last report, we had won fourth place. We also came within seventy-five cents of winning the pennant for our C. E. on Ashland College night.

The evangelistic campaign was a success. Thorough preparation was made through prayer and surrender. The Brethren knew we were facing opponents and conditions that would have cast many a church into black despair. The faith of some wavered. The lives of backsliding members seemed to block the channel of blessing. There was definite opposition from Satan and some of his imps. The season was the busiest of the year. But the Spirit was present with great power. Never have we beheld such deliberate grieving of him as here, but never have we witnessed such a mighty demonstration of his presence. Brother Jennings gave deep spiritual messages and God honored his word. The campaign was gospel with no new-fangled tricks. It resulted in 48 confessions, 25 have been received by baptism, 3 came by relation, 5 by re-consecration, and five yet await baptism. The campaign closed with 201 at the Lord's tables at a most blessed Communion. As an expression of their appreciation, the church gave Brother Jennings the largest offering he has ever received and that without one word of begging or anyone giving over $10. To God be the honor!

Especially did we enjoy the ministerial fellowship with our brother. He who comes to Sunnyside sacrifices much through absence from Conferences. How sweet were the hours we spent together! We are praying for God to open the way for us to come to Winona this year, but as yet no definite answer has come. We are planning, hoping, trusting.

In these perilous times of misunderstanding, impugning of motives, and persecution, the church is standing true for the Word. Some "have gone out from us because they were not of us," but very few. Satan has caught a few in his pleasure net. But the rank and file of the Brethren are faithful in his service and rejoicing in the hope of his coming. 'Tis a delight to serve such. In many ways they have shown their appreciation.

CHARLES H. ASHMAN.

LaPaz, Indiana

Although the readers of the Evangelist have not read any sketch from County Line church for some time, we are still working.

All departments of the church are growing both in number and interest. The preaching services are being well attended, and the Sabbath school has nearly doubled during the two years that the present pastor has been in charge.

We are going to observe our communion services on Saturday evening, June 1st, and we are hoping to have every member present at this service.

This conference year will conclude the present pastorate, and the pastor is open for a call from another church that is desiring the services of a pastor for the coming year.

We have made many friends during our two years' work here, and there are a few earnest workers here as in all other churches, who are willing to work at all times.

We ask the prayers of Evangelist readers for the success of the work.

Anyone derising to correspond with the pastor may address him at South Bend, Indiana, 416 Pennsylvania Avenue.

Yours in his service,
C. D. WHITMER, Pastor.

A Call to "Come Across"

These are strenuous war times in which we hear a great deal about "Going Over the Top" and this expression fits very well into the theme of this appeal, for we as a church surely ought to be willing, and I am sure we are ABLE to "go over the Top," with the funds for the Superannuated Ministers. There are many interests to which we can contribute these days, and some of them may bring us a little more fame and worldly glory, but what a nation, church or organization is worthy of being called so that does not look well after the interests of its men who have made it possible for them to achieve success, and have borne the brunt of the battles and the heat of the day? What person is there among us who does not readily criticize the young man or woman, who deliberately turns their back upon the mother that has labored long and hard and endured many sacrifices that the son or daughter may have an education, and enjoy the privileges that they missed? This we will all agree is to say the least unkind and unchristian on the part of the child. We would be ready to say of a nation that does not provide for its aged and infirm who have not been able because of meager wages and high cost of living to provide against the shadowy night of life, was a heathen nation.

We would be ready to say that the corporation that did not pension its old employees was heartless, and yet we as a church, who claim to be a whole gospel church, will allow our aged brethren, who have spent their lives in the promotion of the Kingdom of the Lord and his Christ through the Brethren church, the one we all love, to go uncared for? Brethren, this is no theory, it is a sad fact, and right now we are one or two months' back with the salary. I beg the pardon of those who depend on this fund for saying salary, I mean we are back with the pittance we are supposed to give them, and then the board has borrowed two hundred and fifty ($250) dollars to put us even as far ahead as we are. This I say with emphasis ought not to be, and I am not alone when I say that the same condemnation should be passed upon the church that does not care for its retired ministers, as we are ready and justified in passing upon the nation, corporation or the ungrateful child.

Let us stop talking about our church being a whole gospel church, and having nothing but the gospels, and the whole gospels at that for our creed, or come up to our Christian obligation to our aged ministers.

Think of it, Brethren and Sisters, of a minister of the gospel, after giving the best of his life to the establishing and promoting of a church, and when he is unable longer to earn a livelihood, that he be told by said church that they will not be able to put him on the retired fund until some one dies, and when he (if by reason of strength he outlives the other fellow) is put on the list he will get the magnificent sum of less than ten (10.00) dollars per month when ever we happen to have it in the treasury, but that the treasury is usually empty. How would you like it? And then remember YOU, every one who has not given as much as they should to this worthy cause is responsible for this condition, the men who are suffering are not to blame for it, it is you and me.

This illustration is no idle dream. We have several men who have written to our board for admission to this list, but we have to tell them that the people of the church do not appreciate what they have done, or are not interested enough in them now to contribute to this fund, and that we absolutely cannot give them any assistance until the Lord in some way opens the hearts and pocketbooks of the members of the Brethren church to meet this responsibility.

Shall we allow this condition to continue, or will you come to the rescue of the Committee on whom you through your church delegates to the National Conference have placed the responsibility of raising this money? It will not take more than ten cents per member to put this Board of Benevolence on their feet, and surely no member of the church would refuse to give this amount to help support these men who have given their lives on the altar of their church.

The second Sunday of June has been set by the National Conference as the time for the receiving of this offering, and we hope no church that has not done so before that time will fail to take the offering that day or at a day set by your people, and thereby give the members all a chance to contribute to this fund.

No church where the pastor faithfully presents this matter, or any person who reads the Evangelist (and we hope there are not any who do not read it) or any one who read the minutes of the last National Conference, will really have any excuse for not knowing about this work, for we have been writing, and pleading and reporting this work for the last three months.

What do you say? I say let us go "Over the Top." "DO IT NOW."

H. F. E. O'NEIL,
President Board of Benevolence.

Rio Cuarto, Argentina

In my last letter I reported our safe arrival and auspicious beginning of the work again in Rio Cuarto. It is now my privilege to report that the work is being blessed as before and everyone is much encouraged. The Sunday school now numbers some seventy scholars, being about what it was a year ago, but is steadily growing. Brother Book is now superintendent. We are starting a Sunday school Normal Class for the training of teachers. Last Saturday we gave the children of the school a "fiesta." The vacant lot of the property serves for a playground for the children and well repays its cost. The Christian Endeavor Society is again in good running order and has recently undertaken to pay three pesos a month for the light in the new hall in Pueblo Almada in addition to the five pesos it pays for the light here.

Brother John Barrio and wife live in the house where we have this new hall and conduct the meetings. There are about 1500 people in that suburb and there are no other church services of any kind there. The attendance thus far has been encouraging and the people are becoming interested. Brother Barrio also helps in the services here in the center. His wife was formerly one of our best primary teachers.

In Cabrera there are also encouraging features. Brother Atkinson recently baptized four converts there and is having fair attendance at the evening meetings recently begun. The country people live so far out that they cannot well come in the evneing.

Two more converts were also recently baptized here in Rio Cuarto.

We celebrated the Easter season with a love feast, as is our custom here, and had some forty at the Lord's table, including five from Cabrera and several from Las Acequias. It was a time of blessing for all. We have some sickness among the members and there is much typhoid fever in the town.

We recently had a nice visit from Brethren Hershey and Shank of the Mennonite church. They are missionaries looking for a suitable location. Their board has instructed them to spend a year or two studying the country before locating as they wish to be sure of finding a good agricultural district where a successful colony can be formed. I am glad to see them try this plan as I have repeatedly urged upon our brethren to form such a colony down here. One farmer alone would have a harder time on account of not having the co-operation of others but a colony would be able to work together and do well. The wheat crop this year is the largest in the history of the country but a large part of it has been lost for lack of sacks and protection from the weather. The land is largely in the hands of the rich who do not provide barns and other conveniences for the poor tenants and as a result there is great loss all around.

The question of my teaching in the college is still in the air, as it has been impossible to get any reply thus far from the minister of education, but I am teaching natural science eleven hours a week while my substitutes still have the English. However I thus have more time for the church work and there is surely plenty to do. There are several good openings for work in neighboring towns which we wish to enter as soon as possible. While we are watching with eager interest the progress of the terrible battle in Europe we realize the greatest battle is that of the silent forces that like gravitation are working constantly and we are sure that the love of God which we are happy to proclaim will one day dominate and exclude forever the armies of hate that seek to impose by force the domination of man. May God speed the day.

I cannot close without an allusion to the loss of our dear brother Leonard Webb, news of whose death was received here a few weeks ago. The members of the mission had not given up hope of his return and were continuing to pray for his recovery, but God has given him health which shall nevermore fail. The church is sending a letter of sympathy to Sister Webb who had also won the love of all who knew her here. Not long ago one of their former neighbors stated that he did not know what their doctrine was in everything but he was sure it must be all right because of the holy lives they lived. That is the kind of memories we trust that all our missionaries will leave behind as a precious heritage to the work. The people whom we are able to reach with the gospel are won more by love than by logic and need the practical part of Christianity more than the theoretical.

Brother Webb was a gentle soul, as calm and patient and yet as zealous and devoted as any one I have ever known. His work shall follow him.

C. F. YODER.

Kentucky Mission Notes

Teachers

More teachers are needed for our schools in the mountains. There is pressing need for a young man, and several young ladies can enter the work at this time. The schools will open this year in July. Teachers holding state certificates will have an advantage, although that is not a necessity. Write to us at once if your heart in in this work and further details will be furnished at once. Pastors, please help us to find the needed teachers. Somebody may be waiting for a word of encouragement from you.

Dormitory Matron

A dormitory matron will be needed and here is a splendid opportunity to real service for the young people of the hills. It is just as real missionary work as that of the teacher or preacher. Write at once for information. Again, pastors, please assist us.

Pledges

At this writing nearly one hundred pledges are unpaid. Funds are low and every pledge should be met as quickly as possible. "No debt in this work" has been our slogan and it is up to you to see to it that we go over the top again as we have each year since the work was begun. Dear Reader, please investigate your pledge, whether it be personal or society or Sunday school or church, and stir up an early payment. Do it now.

Stereopticon Lecture

On our recent trip to Kentucky Brother Bowman carried a splendid camera and from the pictures secured and others already on hand slides have been made and a most interesting stereopticon lecture is being prepared. The lecture will be tried out first in the Miami Valley, where Brother Bowman will be the official lecturer. Write him for a date.

"News From the North"

We will try and report a bit of news to the Brotherhood from this district as it has been some time since last heard from; but it is not that we have been idle in the Lord's work, as we had two fine meetings since. The meetings were not very long in duration but each one was a fine meeting.

Brother Johnson from the Bethel Church conducted them. The last one was held the latter part of March and eight souls made the good confession and are awaiting the rite of baptism. Five were baptized the first Sunday Brother Johnson was here.

The meetings were a great help to the church as well as the outsiders.

We want to thank the Brethren of the Bethel church for the loan of their beloved pastor. Brother Johnson is well liked in this church as a minister of the gospel and as a man by the whole community. The last time he was here was an extremely busy time for the people around here as it was in sugaring, but we had good crowds each evening.

If you want to know whether Johnson likes maple sugar, ask him, some of the people here could tell, but we dare not. But returning to the word of the church our State Conference is to convene at this church beginning the 28th of May and lasting over the 29th., We are planning on a good meeting. All isolated members are heartily invited to attend the Conference and also the Communion at the close of the Conference on the 29th.

The churches of the state are urged to send all the delegates that will come as we can take care of all the brethren that come.

Remember the Love Feast at the close of the Conference.

Isolated members desiring to come, let us know and you will be met at the station.

We ask the prayer of the brotherhood in behalf of the church and conference.

Correspondent S. J. MILLER.

Peru, Indiana

On the first Sunday in May six applicants were baptized in "The Little Brown Church," two husbands and their wives and two young people. Four of these made confession in the tabernacle campaign. Fifty-six members of the church joined the Soul Winners' League, a special organization began during the tabernacle meeting. What a work can be done by that many soul winners if they abide faithful to their vow. God grant that they may, for that is their business assigned by him who said, "As the Father sent me even so send I you." The Christian's business is to seek and to save the lost. The prayer meetings are well attended, thirty-five being present this week. The S. S. C. E. is adding some new members to their society. The Sunday school is very much alive with E. E. Frantz as the efficient superintendent. He is supported by a most faithful body of teachers.

CAMPAIGN NOTES

By the time these notes are read the campaign for permanent endowment in Pennsylvania will have been in progress for more than a month. Our long silence has been due to the fact that we were too busy to write reports, and that is the best reason for silence that I know of.

But we are able to report that the work in Pennsylvania has had a most excellent beginning. I believe when our friends see the result which has been achieved in the first three churches canvassed they will agree that no mistake was made in our choice of the first churches to be visited. The Myersdale circuit, consisting of Myersdale, Summit Mills, and Salisbury churches was our pastorate for three years before we went to Waterloo. And we decided that the churches of this circuit should have the distinction of setting the pace for the rest of the churches of Pennsylvania. These churches readily responded to the challenge, and they did set a pace, a real pace, a pace which will make all the remaining churches of Pennsylvania hurry a whole lot if they are going to keep up.

Brother E. D. Burnworth is the pastor of this circuit. Needless to say, he had the field ripe and ready for the harvest. The first big step he took in the preparation of his people for the campaign was to get the Evangelist into each home of the three churches of his charge. This was a fine achievement. I am not sure that any other circuit of three churches in the brotherhood has been able to do this. And I have said repeatedly in former notes that when folks read the church paper and are in touch with the campaign for endowment my work becomes at once very much easier. Moreover, Brother Burnworth had been reminding his people of the coming campaign. And when I arrived on the scene he entered heart and soul with me in the work. Thus, in reality I take very little credit to myself for the large piece of work which was accomplished. A people always loyal to all of the interests of our denomination, whose minds had been prepared and made ready by their pastor, explains the result of the first churches canvassed in Pennsylvania.

Now for the result. And I fancy I see Indiana waiting breathlessly to hear that result. Well, it may sound a little cruel and ungrateful (but I don't mean it that way at all) to put it like this, but the first three churches canvassed in Pennsylvania surpassed the best three churches in Indiana. Now Indiana, I am sorry about this, but I just could not help it. Our work in the Myersdale circuit went beyond $7500. The report by churches is as follows:

Myersdale went a little beyond the $4,000 mark. We had here three $500 gifts; one $400 gift ;two $200 gifts; a fine lot of $100 gifts, and from that on down. The Sunday school and S. S. C. E. at Myersdale each gave us $100 Liberty Loans: And I also got Liberty Loans from a number of individuals here. The Men's Federation of the Sunday school also made a neat investment. One of the most gratifying things about the Myersdale canvass as well as in the other two churches was the greatest number of gifts. This is just the way we want it. It has been the policy of this campaign to enlist, not merely our wealthiest people, but to enlist the greatest possible number of our people for any and all sums. So I want to remind my readers when they read these fine results that while indeed I get some splendid gifts from our more wealthy people, yet our people of moderate means are also enlisting by the scores and hundreds.

Summit Mills church has reached $2500. Here is the place where I found company for Brother Henry Rinehart of Flora. Brother Rinehart and Brother John Wisler, of Nappanee don't need to feel lonesome any more. Elder John A. Miller and wife, of Summit Mills enlisted for $1,000. Will you believe it, that it is gifts like that, and those five hundreds, and four hundreds that make the secretary feel as if he were up in an airship? Well that is just the sensation those big gifts produce. It's "a grand and glorious feeling." And I want to whisper to Brother Rinehart and Brother John A. Miller that I will be getting some more company for them, as this campaign progresses. For there is going to be a fine list of thousand dollar gifts before this campaign is over. We had two two hundred dollar gifts at Summit Mills and a number of one hundreds also. One of the very encouraging features of the Summit Mills canvass was to see the splendid line up of young men and young ladies who enlisted for $25.00 each. The Sunday school and the S. S. C. E. at this place also enlisted for $100 each. I also got Liberty Loans here.

Salisbury has fifty active members. The canvass here will reach $1,000. On the basis of active members this result means $20.00 per capita, which result, figured from that basis exceeds I believe, any result thus far achieved. Our biggest gifts at Salisbury were $100 gifts. We got some Liberty Loans here also. And the Sunday school gave a good sized note.

In the canvass of this circuit there was far more than hard work: for the work was generously mixed with pleasure. It was a real joy and pleasure to renew acquaintance with those whom I had served as pastor in years gone by. And in addition to making the canvass for endowment I had the privilege of being present at the communion services at Salisbury and Myersdale. Would also have been present at the Summit Mills service except that I had to go to Dayton on that Sunday. For the many kindnesses and the genuine hospitality accorded us on every hand in these three churches, and for the royal response to the call for endowment, also for the tireless co-operation of the pastor in the entire canvass I have profound gratitude. And I covet for one and all in this circuit the rich, abiding blessing and peace of God. And the same splendid Brethren loyalty which was manifested in the Myersdale circuit I shall undoubtedly find throughout the churches of Pennsylvania.

In this article I shall also embrace the first opportunity I have had to make mention of the splendid gift of endowment made by the present Sophomore class in Ashland College. During my few days at Ashland between the close of the Indiana campaign and the beginning of the Pennsylvania campaign I was given a special invitation to be present at chapel service on a certain morning since the Sophomore class was to be in charge on that occasion. I went and I am very glad that I did. The Sophomore class appeared, all togged out in their colors, and the chapel was also dressed in the same colors. And after a member of their class made a neat little speech, he handed to me for the Sophomore class a check for $125 for permanent endowment. I have received many gifts which have warmed and thrilled my heart; but I received no gift that more thoroughly touched me than this gift. For I know something of the needs of a student; and I know that those young people had to make some actual sacrifices in order that they might have a part as a class in the endowing of their beloved Alma Mater. This act only confirms what I have said dozens of times in this campaign, viz., that some of the very best friends of Ashland College are among those who have been former students or who are present students. But more than this, this gift from a class of students shows that these students know the needs of Ashland College and they are eager and anxious to see this campaign for permanent endowment go on to final success.

My next report will come from Listie and the First church at Johnstown. In the meantime remember that we take Liberty Loans—any amount, the more the better.

WM. H. BEACHLER,
Campaign Secretary.

COMMUNION NOTICES

The Fairhaven, Ohio Brethren Church will hold communion services on Sunday evening, May 26th. All of like faith are invited.

B. F. OWEN, Pastor.

The First Brethren Church of Flora, Indiana will hold their Communion Service on the evening of May 28th. The pastor will begin a series of preparatory services on Wednesday evening, May 22nd.

To all these services the membership is urged to come and especially the communion service holds out an invitation to all of like faith.

sublime and magnanimous spirit of Christ and is as different from that of the world as daylight is different from darkness.

Lastly, Christian puritanism should show itself in conduct or action. To be strictly scrupulous here is of supreme importance. Nothing will so surely guarantee against the discount of one's profession as the rigid observance of the rules of right conduct. And nothing so quickly brings discredit and reproach as a disagreement between profession and conduct. The world knows its conduct is not right and if it sees no difference between its life and the life of the church member it concludes that something is wrong which is decidedly true. The Christian should show up very different in his action from the world. How grand the Christian life would be if lived as He has planned it! How attractive it would be if every Christian lived up to his high privilege! God give every Christian the discernment, the courage and the determination to be truly puritanic according to the gospel of our Lord and Savior, Jesus Christ.

Saturday evening, May 25th. We extend an invitation to all who may have the opportunity to come and enjoy the services with us.

NORA BRACKEN.

Waterloo, Iowa. The spring Communion Service of the Waterloo congregation will be held on Sunday evening, May 26. Each evening of the preceding week, May 19 to 25, a special evangelistic service will be held, with a sermon by the pastor. A feature of the week's meetings will be that the devotions and music will be in charge of the Sunday school on Monday and Friday evenings, the Men's Federation on Tuesday and Thursday evenings, and the Women's League on Wednesday and Saturday evenings. All the members of the congregation, including those who live at a distance from Waterloo, should be present if it is possible. The service is always exceedingly helpful, and, besides, the congregation will fail to reach Goal 2 of the Four-Year Program unless 75 per cent of the members are present. The communion service in the fall was the best attended in the congregation's history, but 25 more must be present this spring or we will fail on this point. All members of the Brethren church who are isolated in this general vicinity are earnestly invited to meet with us.

H. L. GOUGHNOUR, Pastor.

Marriages

KNOX-MEYERS—At the Brethren parsonage on April 4, 1918, Mr. Paul A. Knox, Polo, Illinois, and Miss Hazel C. Meyers, Milledgeville, Illinois, were united in marriage by the undersigned. Both these parties are splendid young people, and the best wishes of a host of friends ateind them as they embark on their wedded life.

MILES J. SNYDER.

BOTT-GOSS—At the First Brethren church, Washington, D. C., on Sunday evening, March 31, 1918, Roy B. Bott and Marion B. Goss were united in marirage.

SPRADLIN—HOFFNER—At the home of the bride's mother, Washington, D. C., William H. Spradlin and Edna V. Hoffner were joined in the holy bonds of matrimony.

W. M. LYON.

SHAFER—Hahn—On March 27, 1918, Mrs. Carrie Hahn and Floyd Shafer were united in marriage by the writer. The bride is a faithful member of the Brethren church of Peru and the groom of the church at Mexico. May the Lord bless them and make them a blessing.

WORKING-HAY—On March 30, 1918, Miss Mildred Hay and Leo Working were joined in marriage by the writer. Both reside in Peru and many friends wish them well.

McKINLEY-BOWMAN—On April, 24, 1913, Miss Florence E. Bowman and Joseph McKinley, both of Peru, were united in marriage by the writer. May they enjoy a long and worthwhile married life.

G. C. CARPENTER.

LONGLEY-MATTHEWS—At the home of the undersigned on April 28th occurred the wedding of Dolta D. Longley and Mary C. Matthews. Miss Matthews has been a member of the Brethren church at Udell for some time. She has been one of our Sunday school and church workers. Both these young people are well respected and ave a host of friends around this, their past home. I am sure that all their friends wish them the best of success through life.

GEORGE E. CONE.

ELLIOTT-KLUCKER—On April 8th at the home of the bride's sister in Cerro Gordo, Illinois occurred the marriage of Mr. Glenn Elliott and Miss Ruth Klucker. The young couple left the next morning for Cambridge, Illinois, where they will make their future home. Ceremony by the writer.

H. E. EPPLEY.

Our Dead

HARLEY—Departed this life April 29, 1918, William E. Harley, of the Church of the Brethren. Brother Harley was a man of noble character. He represented manhood of the highest type. He resided in this city for about fifty years. Funeral services conducted by the writer from his late residence, 1127 Girard Street, Washington, D. C. Interment at Kennilworth, Pa. W. M. LYON.

BRIGGS—Ashton, died on April 8th, aged 82 years, 9 months, 21 days. This is the old brother who was the first to be baptized in the new church. His days for God had been very few yet seemed to be days of hope. He left no near relatives, and no estate, yet the church at Flora and his friends carried out his wishes, and he was laid away in a quiet country cemetery by the side of his wife who had departed this life years before. May those who read this bit of a report profit by these years that were passed in vain, and see the shortness of this man's days of hope. The funeral was conducted by the writer at the undertaker's parlors, where all things had been arranged in a very homelike way, on the morning of April 10th.

The Christian's Test

The market value of any product of man"s manufacture is increased by a process of testing that assures the purchaser that the article purchased has been tried out and has shown that it is able to do the work it is designed to do or to withstand the wear of real service.

This matter of testing is not applied to the material things of life or to the articles created by the hand of man, but in all departments of life the severest tests are made of men who would be workers or leaders in any important work or profession.

It is not enough that a man shall have spent four or six years in a medical college and then call himself a physician, he must be able to stand the tests established by the eductaional boards and by the different state legislatures before he is permitted to open his office and carry on further, in the great laboratory of life, the experiments in medicine and surgery he began in the laboratory and operating room of the university and hospital.. It is not enough that a man shall read through a certain number of law books and then open a law office, nail up his sign, Attorney at Law, and then expect the legal business of the community to naturally turn his way. Before he is even permitted to appear in court he must have passed the tests required by law for his admission to the bar.

As one considers these various tests that are visited upon those who would enter upon any of the important professions of this temporary existence in the world need one be surprised if the most important profession a human being can enter is not accepted as being true or genuine until the one who has made this profession can prove by having passed through a most rigid and real test that he is entitled to the place he assumes to occupy? It is no wonder that the Apostle Paul was free to say that "except ye possess the spirit of Christ ye are none of his," as he regarded the lives of some who would call themselves Christians. These words of Paul's make up one of the most heart-searching passages in the entire Bible. We may have claimed to be a Christian for forty years and we may have been active in Christian works all this time, but, according to this statement of the Apostle, the only proof that we belong to Christ is that we possess the Spirit of Christ. If we have not received the Spirit of Christ and if we do not let that Spirit have way in our lives, it is positive proof that we are none of his.

This thought may trouble some of us just a little, in fact it may trouble some of us a great deal, and we are inclined to think it should trouble a great many of us for most certainly many of us would like a little time to prepare for such a rigid examination or test.

If one gives thought to this matter at all it is very natural to make it a personal matter and to ask the quesion, How may I know that I have the Spirit of Christ? Let us enquire further and ask, How did the Spirit manifest his indwelling in Christ? To some this may seem like a difficult question, but the word of God gives a very satisfactory answer. In Hebrews, chapter 1:9 we read, "Thou has loved righteousness and hated iniquity, therefore God, thy God hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows." This then would indicate that the Spirit manifested himself in Christ, in part at least, as a spirit of joy. We are urged again and again to "Make a joyful noise unto the Lord," and just how any one can claim to belong to the Lord without manifesting a spirit of joy is beyond our comprehension. The Spirit of Christ is a Spirit of Joy. It is true he was "a man of sorrow, acquainted with grief," but above all his sorrows and out of all his griefs he could look forward to the joyful time when his love should conquer the world and to the time when men everywhere would lift up their voices in joyful praise to the one whose life and death accomplished what for them would otherwise have been impossible, even their redemption and salvation.

Once again the Spirit of Christ is manifested as a Spirit of victory over sin. If we have a full measure of the Spirit of Christ we will have a full victory over sin. If sin is getting the victory over us, rather than we getting a victory over sin, then we have not the Spirit of Christ, and consequently are none of his. Many a one may have failed in his struggle against sin and as a consequence may have become discouraged and have given up the struggle, when the entire trouble was he was trying to conquer sin in his own strength and by his own might which is an imposisble feat for any man, whereas had he surrendered his life fully to the Master and had he yielded fully to the Spirit's power his victory would have been decisive and complete.

Another manifestation of the Spirit of Christ is that of moral beauty. In Galatians we read that "fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, meekness, self-control." If such a life as that is not a life of moral beauty where can one be found? And to be able to live such a life is certainly worthy the greatest effort and sacrifice possible to the human soul, it is not so great a sacrifice after all, and the difficulties are largely overcome when the life is fully surrendered and the Spirit of Christ is given an opportunity to perform his proper function in a follower of Christ.

In the eighth chapter of Paul's letter to the Romans we read that "we know not what we should pray for as we ought, but the Spirit himself maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be told." This makes it clear, once for all that the Spirit of Christ is a Spirit of prayer. We may not be able to fully explain why it was so, but all Bible students know that Christ was preeminently a man of prayer. And knowing this fact it is not necessary that we should know the why of it. Christ did pray, and he was in the spirit of prayer and the Spirit of the Master that should differentiate his disciples from the world should be largely that Spirit of prayer.

There are just three more manifestations of the Spirit of Christ to which we would direct our reader's minds at this time, but we have not the space on this page to develop them at length, a brief mentioning of them will have to suffice. These three are a Spirit of truth, a Spirit of love for the perishing and a Spirit of power. The Spirit who dwelt in Christ and moulded his whole life was a Spirit of truth, and there is no room for the false in the life of any one who would be Christ's. Then Christ himself tells us that his whole life was dominated by a love for the perishing, that he came into this world for one purpose, that for one purpose he lived, suffered, prayed, wrought and died: namely seeking and saving the lost. As soon as the early Christians received this Spirit they were seized with this same passion for perishing men and women and went everywhere preaching Christ. Lastly the Spirit of Christ was a spirit of power and one who is in possession of this Spirit has power to witness for him in public address or in private life, one or the other, but the power is there. Have you this spirit?

The Influence of Public Opinion

It is frequently spoken of as to how this man or that, or this woman or some other woman or this action or that action may effect public opinion. Public opinion is rather a strange thing when everything is taken into consideration. It is sometimes difficult to discover in a measure of exactness and at all times it is rather difficult to explain and hard to account for. It is not always possible to determine just why the public takes the attitude it does, and sometimes the public itself would be puzzled if it were asked to give a reason for the hope within you."

Politicians are supposed to be able to feel the public pulse and to be able to forecast its probable action, and their ability to "guess" right has much to do with their success as politicians. Religious workers who would shape their religion to suit public opinion rather than to try to shape public opinion to their religion are as anxious as politicians to know what the public will approve. Thus while some men, perhaps most men, for the sake of popularity may seek to conform at all times to public opinion, there are others who seem to delight in shocking the public by daring to assert opinions contrary to those which have received the stamp of public approval. To take a position on any question opposite to that commonly held by the public simply for the sake of startling the world is not a commendable trait of character, but to think independently and then to act up to one's convictions regardless of public opinion is a heroic attribute.

While public opinion exercises a wholesome restraining influence in most respects, yet if all men were afraid to defy the opinions of the world there would be very little human progress. Public opinion can very generally be depended upon as being measurably correct, but only measurably, for it is frequently as changeable as the winds and what receives its approval today receives its condemnation tomorrow; consequently it is not good to become slaves to public opinion, but rather to listen to it reasonably and then to act as one's best judgment and conscience dictate.

Sentimental Nonsense

It seems there has always been a struggle between sentiment and sense and there is no clear indication that the struggle is likely to cease at any time in the near future. As the conflict is likely to continue it will not be amiss to discover, if possible, the grounds for this incessant struggle. That it is largely a difference of temperament must be conceded at least by one side in the conflict whether the opponents will agree to the statement or not.

While it may be true that one who listens only to cold reason shorn of all sentiment may develop a rather hard exterior and may seem to possess as cold a personality as he does opinions based entirely upon reason, on the other hand the strong sentimentalist, whose emotions are more to him than his reasoning faculties, is possessed of a softness of character that is equally objectionable. The man who relies more upon sense than he does on sentiment may be hard hearted at times and may seem cruel in his judgment. but he is seldom intolerant in spirit. It is usually the sentimentalist who is intolerant and who condemns without reason those who disagree with him.

The famous Kansas journalist, Ed. Howe states a mighty fact when he says: "It has always been the way of poets to say a man of sense has no soul." He may not possess the soul of a poet, but it should be remembered that the poetic soul is not the only soul of of man, and because a man can not or does not think and see as a poet thinks and sees is no reason why he should be condemed for his thinking. There is a vital relation between real poetry and religion and religious emotions and aspirations have been numbered among the greatest factors in the poetic world. It has likewise been observed that too many people regard a Christian man who squares religion and business in a way that does not cause business to suffer is frequently regarded as lacking all spirituality. It has frequently been said that a deeply spiritual man can not be a good business man, and that a deeply spiritual minister of the gospel can not be a good manager of his earthly affairs, which is all sentimental nonsense. Many a man in both the pew and the pulpit has tried to hide his business shortcomings and his failure to meet personal financial obligations behind a cloak of spirituality. The man whose whole time is given to worldly things may suffer from a lack of spirituality, but the man who tries to be so spiritual that he makes no effort to meet his financial obligations is in as bad a condition, yes even in a worse condition than the man of the world. If religion and spirituality mean any one thing to the world that thing is honesty, and no one but a hypocrite will try to hide his financial dishonesty behind a cloak of spirituality or to let sentiment take the place of sense in his business relations with his fellow-men.

The Iron Cross

It has been regarded as a great thing to receive the decoration of the "iron cross" of Germany, and in past generations there may have been some honor attached to the decoration; but we are inclined to the opinion that in the minds of the coming generation of people it will be regarded as a mark of the beast more than a sign of a heroic soul. Once men who performed brave deeds received the decoration, now it seems that only those who perform acts of great cruelty are thus decorated.

The iron cross once may have stood for strength and nobility of character and action, but it must now give way before the power of a wooden cross. Billy Sunday speaks a mighty truth when he says: "Germany lost out when she turned from Christ to Krupp and from the cross of Calvary to the iron cross." It is not only true of Germany but as there is a God in heaven who rules and over-rules the centuries it must be true of any nation. There is no power that is greater in its influence over the lives of men and of nations than the "power of the cross," but it is the cross of Calvary, and to its mute appeal must all the nations listen, and to its requirements must they all submit to receive the commendation of the God of the universe, even Jehovah.

Few words have as great effect upon the human being as the word victory, and few motives have moved men to greater efforts than the desire to win a victory. It makes little difference in what line of endeavor one's energies may be directed there is that same strong desire to win. The man or woman who has no desire for success is a failure from the beginning and is about as good as defeated before the contest has begun.

Life is largely made up of overcoming, of mastering opposing forces, and is in the very nature of the thing is a battle, and while one may not approve the law, yet if left to itself it will result in the "survival of the fittest." No other way remains except that of the interference of the human mind and of the triumph of mind over matter. But in all these life processes the same principle holds and it is a constant struggle for the supremacy of one or the other, and the winning contestant is the one that has set about the struggle in the most intelligent and reasonable manner and in a spirit that is determined to win. Spiritual forces are after all greater than material forces and go further in making a life a success or a failure.

Of some battles it has been said that they were lost before they were begun and it may as truthfully be said that some lives have been a failure from the days even before they were born because there was an absence of all spiritual desire upon the part of the parents. Yet there is always a possibility of victory and of overcoming the elements of both birth and environment that spell defeat.

It is sometimes said of one that he is a failure, or he is defeated, or he is whipped and doesn't know it. It is doubtful if that statement is ever correct. We would rather accept the principle stated in a few memorable words of the greatest general in the European war, General Foch, who said: "A battle is never lost until its loss is acknowledged." There always remains the possibility of turning apparent defeat into victory, unless one has decided to give up the struggle, then defeat is certain.

FOUR-YEAR PROGRAM PAGE

NOW THEN DO IT.—II Samuel 3:18

Conducted by Charles A. Bame

To Ohio Churches

At the recent state conference held at Fremont, the delegates voted to assess each of the Ohio churches for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the Four-Year Program campaign according to the following plan: Every church shall pay one dollar per year except those whose membership is one hundred or more which shall pay two dollars. If your church has a membership of one hundred or more, it should pay $2.00. If less than one hundred its obligation is only $1.00. This is the minimum. Those who want to be generous send more. NOW is the time to make payments. "Now then do it." Send money to E. G. Mason, West Salem, Ohio. New stationery now printed and all the postage bills of last conference year are unpaid for. Do not neglect this. a day. Further progress is waiting your response. The King's business requires promptness.

GEORGE S. BAER, Ohio Director.

By the Director of Goal Seven

When the delegates assembled at Winona Lake last summer, wished the direction of the Four-Year campaign upon a few of the men of the church, mostly ministers, it seems that they selected some fellows who were very busy in their own fields of labor. I would not have done otherwise, however, for it is generally the busy fellow who finds time to do almost anything worth while. BUT the placing of that work upon our shoulders will be rank imposition unless we get more thorough co-operation from the churches, or rather their leaders.

Taken by and large, the reports have come in fairly well, and in my own district of Pennsylvania I am fairly well pleased at the showing, yet there are those who come very close to being slackers. Folks you have placed a task upon those directing this campaign, and you can help make it comparatively light or "grievous to be borne." Personally I have given many hours and spent some good money in circulating propaganda. This has all been done willingly, but I surely would like to have a more complete report from the churches of my district, and also from those of the brotherhood at large, for general conference is coming on apace, and I can report things only as I find them. And won't it look nice for some of our "leading?" churches to have it said of them—"no report," "no progress," or "no something else?"

As far as circulating any more propaganda on Goal 7, I see no need of it. I feel that what has been sent you is sufficient, if you mean business. No one with a sense of business would decry an attempt to put in the sensible budget system, be his budget never so small. So wake up, and if you have placed the budget system or have made any progress along that line, please let your district director know, and he will in turn inform me and that will satisfy me that my time and money have not been used for naught.

It might be germane to inquire, when is a Brethren minister in good standing? Is it after he has met the local obligations, or is there somewhat more required of him? The Methodists require him to push all the movements undertaken by the denomination at large, and woe unto him if he neglects or falls down on the job. Conference hauls him over the coals.

Now our standing depends upon the approval of credentials by the district conferences. Wouldn't it nonplus or shame us if a motion were carried to withhold conference approval from men not boosting conference movements? Now then, let us put our best efforts forth and lighten the burdens of the goal chiefs.

THE SABBATH QUESTION

BY E. E. ROBERTS

The question as it appeals to me is this: Is one day in the week better, holier, or more sacred than another? If so what day in the week is it? Having been taught from infancy to reverence Sunday, I well remember, as a boy of fifteen how I was shocked on hearing a man express it as his opinion that "Sunday was as good as any day in the week, if it did not rain."

While my parents would do nothing, nor allow anything done on the farm that was not absolutely a necessary work of mercy, yet it was perfectly free from that puritanical spirit, that would make it a sin to be as happy on Sunday, as any other day in the week. I grew to manhood feeling a deep reverence for the day, and it was a little better than the rest of the days in the week, and it was only after years of Bible study, and then very reluctantly did I give it up.

To intelligently consider, and rightly decide the question it is necessary to discover the Hebrew word translated "Sabbath" and also what it meant to those to whom it was spoken. We find that it is a translation of the word "Shabbath" meaning—to break off—desist—rest. Without a doubt they understood that on this day they were to desist, or rest from their regular labors, and if Deut. 5: 14 had been properly translated instead of transliterated it would read, "But the seventh day is the REST of the Lord thy God." In which they were to worship God for delivering them from their bondage in Egypt, and this same motive should prevail in keeping the Sabbath by all Christians—as a day of rest from all human efforts to win salvation through their own works,—resting upon the efficacy of the blood, of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world, worshiping God especially on that day for deliverance from a bondage worse than that down in Egypt, the bondage of sin. We can safely conclude that there is nothing in the name that would indicate that it was any better than any other day of the week.

The next question naturally would be, When, and under what circumstances was it instituted? Is there anything in them to indicate it's being better than other days of the week? Exo. 20: 8-11—we find to be the first mention of it, or more than 2500 years after the creation of man. There is no positive proof that previous to his time a sababth was kept, but it is supposed that they did. While the presumption is that they did, yet it is quite evident that during their bondage in Egypt they had lost all knowledge of it, from the reason that in instituting it Moses had to tell them not only what to not do, as well as give them the reason for doing it, which would have been entirely unnecessary had they already been keeping it. I think that we can safely conclude that prior to this time they had not kept the sabbath.

A quesion is at once suggested to our minds: Did God at this time change his plans, and make one day better than the others? Personally I do not think so for the reason that he did not state any definite time for them to count from. Turning to the 9th verse of the 20th of Exodus we read "Six days thou shalt labor." When did the six days begin? There is no suggestion as to their beginning. Perhaps some one will say "Why on the first day of the week of course." But who can tell which day is the first day of the week? It is supposed that they to whom Moses was speaking knew which the first day was,—but in this day and age would any one dare to contend that they could prove that our Saturday was the true seventh day, and that our Sunday was positively the actual first day of the week? Would they contend that Adam had kept a perfect roster of the days of the week, and that Noah had done likewise? That the Israelites through all of their more than 400 years of slavery in Egypt had never missed a day? When we have very good reason to think that they missed a day in Joshua's time when the sun stood still, so that Christ might die on the very day that the Lamb should be slain, and yet die "before" the Passover, then couple to this the fact that there is nothing that we know so certainly as that Christ was not born on the 25th of December, we not only do not know the day nor even the year in which he was born, incidents of a thousand times as great importance. In the light of these facts can anyone condfiently affirm that they BELIEVE that our Saturday is the true seventh day?—If they can they should be able to move mountains—by their faith.

IF it IS NOT the seventh—and it very probably is not—the seventh day from Moses' reckoning then it is no better than any other day of the week, and no more sacred.

Then had the keeping of a special day of the week been half so important as some of our good brethren would have us believe, for they tell us that if we do not keep the Saturday sabbath we will be cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, and be tormented forever, and forever. If such indeed is a fact do you think that a God of love, and mercy, as our God is, would have left us to grope in the dark as to the proper day, when He could so easily give us the means of knowing for a certainty the exact day? For instance—Had he said the first day of the new Moon shall be the first day of the week then we would have known for a certainty that the 7, 14, 21, 28th of each month were Sabbaths, and we would have known it as long as the moon existed. If that had been the Law then according to our calendar every day in the week would have been a sabbath, at some time in the year, and indeed he could have given us many other ways of knowing, and I believe he would have done so. Inasmuch as he did not do so, is it contrary to sound reasoning to contend that the keeping of a special day is not essential to keeping the Sabbath?

But some one may urge that it is important because they were told to "Keep it holy." Our answer to such is, That holy when applied to any one but God does not imply "SINLESSNESS" for the Hebrew word is "Quadesh" meaning to separate—set apart—sanctify, the very same word is translated sanctify in Deut. 5: 12 and should be so translated here for the subject is the same in both places.

Suppose we admit, for argument's sake that at one time there was special importance attached to the Sabbath, or seventh day, was it not done away with by Christ, in his teaching that man was not made for the sabbath, but that it was made for him, that is, for his good, and did he not repeatedly break the sabbath in the eyes of Rabbis? Was it not Christ and the disciples that did away with the old Sabbath, and not the Church of Rome as some contend? As a proof of this assertion I offer John 20: 1. Here we see Christ arose on the first day, then in the 19th verse we see the disciples gathered in worship on the evening of the first day, and Christ meets with them, twice honoring the first day as well as approving of their worship at that time.

Again in Acts 29: 7 we see the disciples gathered together to break bread on the FIRST day of the week and Paul preached to them. Then in 1 Cor. 16:2 he instructs them "on the FIRST day of the week (evidently the time of their public worship) to lay by him in store * * that there be no gathering when I come." He also rebukes the Galatians (4:10) because they "Observe days, and months, and times, and years," the same rebuke is given in Col. 2:16 or rather to those that insisted in condemning those that did not observe sabbaths, concluding the whole matter in the words of the Romans (14:5) "One esteemeth one day above another, another esteemeth every day the same, let every man be fully assured in his own mind." That is precisely our position, if it adds anything to a man's happiness, or to his love to God to keep the Saturday sabath, let him enjoy himself in so doing, but let him not seek to force us to do so. As a final clincher upon the subject I offer Rev. 1:10, "I was in the spirit on the Lord's day" this was the name the early Christians gave to the first day of the week, and is the one we should use now. The heathen named the first day after the sun, which they worshiped—why not name it the Lord's day in honor of the Christ we worship?

From the fact that Christ honored the first day of the week as his day of victory over death, and the grave, that he attended worship on the day and manifested himself then, that he selected it as the day on which he would make his revelation to John, coupled with his teaching upon it, while here it seems it should clearly demonstrate the fact that if there is one day better than another it is the first day of the week.

I think in the light of these facts we can conclude with perfect safety that all days are alike; that it is as great a sin to lie, swear, cheat, or steal on that day in the week as it is to do so on Sunday.

If such are the facts the question would arise, What was the object or design of the Sabbath? We answer that the purpose was a double one, First it was for the benefit of mankind, in providing a day of rest, as its name suggests. Experience has proven this to be an absolute necessity to the life, and health of men, and even machinery. Infidel France did away with the Christian Sabbath, and the life average fell to more than ten years less than the countries keeping the Sabbath. It has proven by actual test that the life of machinery is greatly prolonged by having a sabbath rest. Then a second reason that man should have his rest, that he might by reading and study, improve his mind, by becoming better acquainted with God, and his works learning thereby to love him all the better.

The second, or perhaps the principal reason we will find stated in Deuteronomy 12-14 in which God reminds them of something they seem to have forgotten. That it was HE, that had brought them up out of a land of bondage, and a state of slavery, giving them a land, houses, and vineyards which they had not secured by their own efforts, but as a free gift from him and that now he was entitled to one seventh of their time, in which they were to learn of him; being led to love him more, and serve him better. This in perfect harmony with Christ's teaching that man was superior to the Sabbath, because it was made for him, and that he was not made for it. His teaching coupled with his healing on the Sabbath, which was unlawful according to the teaching of the Rabbis all clearly prove that the highest service we can render to God is to serve our fellow men, by doing good, not only spiritually, but physically as well. This beyond the shadow of a doubt was the purpose of the Sabbath.

THE CHRISTIAN SABBATH! When Christianity was first established it followed Christ in keeping the Saturday sabbath, which was quite natural for them to do, but they also kept the first day but for an entirely different purpose, upon it they met in public worship to commemorate Christ's victory over death and the grave, but as the breach between Judaism and Christianity widened the keeping of the Saturday sabbath fell into disuse, until about 300 A. D., it was dispensed with, feeling that it had been abrogated.

Small Men in Big Places

It is worth while to remind ourselves occasionally how rare the instances are when a man is too big for his job. The men who feel too big for their tasks are generally sadly mistaken in their judgments, and their sense of superiority taints their service and destroys their power. A really big man will magnify his task in such a way as to make it a great work even if it has not heretofore been so. But on the other hand, nothing is more pitiful than to see a small man wobble around in a big job. We have too many instances of this sort, both in Church and State. In our municipal governments, for example, which have been particularly deficient and, in many instances, a reproach to our American life, we are having today the spectacle of two great cities like New York and Philadelphia humiliated because in the Mayor's chair there are men who seem so small that it is difficult to see them with the naked eye. In Philadelphia, the Federal government has, to all practical purposes, been compelled to take charge of the Police Department because there is not enough manhood in the Mayor to control that Department and to see that the laws are executed. Men who prate about their patriotism and shout loudly for the flag are willing to see the boys in Khaki and Blue shamed and disgraced by all manner of seductive snares, and treasonable traps are permitted to exist in violation of all law and decency. In New York, a Tammany Mayor seeks to show his contempt of those whom he calls "highbrows," by recommending the suppression of the Bureau of Public Health Education, and seeking to demolish all the safeguards put up by medical science to preserve the lives of babies and to instruct the poor and ignorant with regard to the requirements of sanitation and the prevention of disease. Here, too, the long arm of Federal power has already been exerted and is likely to be more fully disclosed to prevent the folly which would be perpetrated by a little man who holds a big job. And who is to blame for the election of such men to such exalted positions? Surely nobody but the people themselves.. We have the sort of government and the sort of officials that the majority of us want.—Reformed Church Messenger.

Beer or Bread

This ten-minute speech was delivered in U. S. Senate, August 1, 1917, in behalf of the National Prohibition Amendment.

Why do we prohibit the boys in the Army and Navy from having booze and insist that those who remain at home shall have it?

When they are willing to die for us, should we not be "willing to go dry for them?"

Will not a sober nation win the war quicker than a drinking nation?

When the food controller asks every one in the country to conserve the food supply, why must the food supply going into beer be excepted?

Is it not as much waste of foodstuff to put it into beer as to put into whiskey?

If more food stuff goes into beer than into whiskey, why do we prevent foodstuff going into whiskey and permit it to go into beer?

Will rebellions come in the cities, as we have been told, if the workers do not have their beer?

If the beer drinkers are going to rebel unless they get their beer, will the temperance people rebel unless they get temperance?

Does the rule only work one way?

Why do not the temperance people claim that they will rebel also? No one has heard any such thing from them, nor will anybody hear such thing.

The temperance people will be for the nation no matter if beer and whiskey be forced on them. Their patriotism does not depend on having their own way.

Is patriotism purchased by beer worth while, anyway?

Sixty per cent of the nation, territorially, is dry. Are the feelings of people living in that territory entitled to any consideration?

If some one were taking as much foodstuff as goes into booze and dumping it into the sea, what would the people of the nation say?

If some one should advance the argument that this was necessary in order to appease certain people who believed in dumping foodstuffs into the sea, and that if they did not do it it would arouse riots, would we accede to their requests?

If some learned Senator, speaking as if the Almighty had delegated to him supreme wisdom, and in a tone indicating that such wisdom would perish from the floor when he retired to the cloakroom, should so claim, would we be sufficiently impressed?

Should not he, after all bulletins issued requesting the people to conserve the food supply, urge them also, for the interest of public peace, to have all the foodstuff they could made into beer?

Is it reasonable to ask the temperance people of the country to conserve and save every particle of food and at the same time permit some of it to go into booze?

Is beer more essential to the American people than bread?

What kind of people are they in this country who are not willing to give up their liquor to help the country?

Is the food conservation to be for the benefit of the many, or is it to be limited in order that the few may have their drinks?

Have we reached a point in this country where the war cannot be won unless the people who drink are permitted to tickle their stomachs with wines and beers?

Will beer-patriots win the war, anyhow?

Are the interests of brewers in this country more important than the winning of the war?

Are we willing to sacrifice everything in the country to win the war, except beer?

If the temperance forces in the Senate were responsible for delaying the food bill, as charged by certain liquor-interest papers, why is it that the food bill has been delayed for three weeks after the temperance sections of the bill were settled?

With the great demand for labor in this country and the high wages, could there ever be a better time, as far as the laboring men are concerned, for the transition from a wet to a dry nation?

When there is a shortage of labor in the important and necessary work to carry on the war, why waste labor in making booze?

If booze is essential to win the war, why stop selling it to the soldiers?

Around the Fireside

On Quien Sabe Creek

BY CORA GOODRICH PARMELEE

"Whoa!" cried Ezra Hay. Then he turned to Joe Woods who was seated beside him, saying, "Jest hold them lines a minute, Joe, while I take in the things I've brought from town f'r the Hermit. Don't look 'sif that feller'd been outside the door f'r some time, does it?" he continued, ploughing his way through the snow. Repeated knockings brought no response, so he opened the door and went in. The Hermit, dimly seen in the early winter twilight was seated before a table, his head fallen on his arms.

"He ain't asleep —he's sick," affirmed Ezra. "Help me get him into bed, an' then one of us can phone f'r the doctor. The nearest phone, I guess, is at the Ranger Station."

"And look here," suggested Joe, who had a strain of romance, "he was writin' a letter—I guess 'twas to that girl whose picter he had stuck up in front of him. He's got the envelope already addressed. 'The letter begins, 'Dearest Elizabeth,' so it's someone he thinks lots of. I don't like to read any more. But let's send a telegram to her."

"Well, it can't do no harm," agreed Ezra, thoughtfully, "though there ain't much to say."

"An' I tell you what," he went on, "if you don't mind, I'll go an' telephone an' then I'll get my wife an' bring her back with me." She's a good hand in sickness, an' this feller hadn't orter be left alone. We c'n bundle up the kids an' leave 'em at Birchs'."

On the way to the Ranger Station he mused over the wording of the telegram. "'Unknown man very ill. Was writin' to you.' How'd that do? I'm most certain the name he goes by ain't his own. He don't never answer to it right quick like a man would to his own name. So it ain't no use to give that. It'd only confuse her. That ain't much, though, for the telegram. I don't reckon she'll come. I wouldn't blame her."

A few days later the narrow-gauge engine was puffing slowly up the canyon, carrying its long train of freight cars and one combination baggage and passenger coach. The seats were nearly all occupied by jabbering Mexicans and the air was close with the mingled smells of bad whiskey and smoking lamps. But Elizabeth Howland noticed these things only with a feeling of detachment. Was it she herself who was here in these strange surroundings—or another? She was coming in response to a very vague telegram, and her friends—those she had had time to see—had tried to dissuade her. But she had acted on impulse—she, who was usually so reserved and self-controlled. "But suppose this is Harry sick and among strangers," she told herself, stifling a sob. "Oh, it is all my fault—I sent him away—and then—and then—he disappeared."

She pressed her lips together and looked around. Her sense of humor came to her rescue. "So these are the Western desperadoes," she reflected. "Where are their six-shooters? I can't imagine people who talk so fast as that ever taking time to kill anyone." And she giggled nervously.

But now they must be almost at their destination—it was the terminus of the road—for the people were all collecting their belongings.

As she dismounted, she was accosted by a kindly faced ranchman whose sunburn all the rigors of winter had not served to bleach.

"Miss Howland, I reckon?" he ventured. "I'm Ezra Hay, the man who sent you the telegram."

She followed him into a low, rough sled—not much more than a box on runners—but no courtier could have been more kind and attentive than he as he tucked the old quilt around her.

"We'll go to the hotel first an' have some supper," he began, "an' I'll tell you all I know about him."

All he knew was not much.

"The man is pretty sick—pneumonia. Us folks out there is takin' turns caring f'r him. Me an' my wife has been there considerable, seein' as we live near—only about a mile away."

"But tell me about him. How does he look? What sort of a man is he?" Ezra Hay smiled, then took a long and noisy swallow of coffee before answering.

"Well, he's a curly-headed, handsome feller, 'bout thirty years old, I sh'd jedge—goes by the name of Will Johnson."

Elizabeth's face fell.

"But I'm most certain that ain't his right name. An' he ain't a born rancher—I c'n tell that. But he's jest so pleasant thet everyone likes him. He won't never go to town though. We allays take his things out to him, but we don't mind that, he's so accommodatin' to us in lots of ways. An' he won't never go to the dances at the school house—he's funny that away. An' oh yes, one thing made me think I was on the right track in sendin' for you—I've took out lots of mail to him a'ready an' there's been papers from that place you come from."

Elizabeth's eyes gleamed. She thought "He wanted the papers to come to an assumed name. And that is the way he knew I was still—"

She did not finish the sentence, even to herself. She was not sure yet that this was Harry.

"We might's well be goin,."

Ezra Hay's voice struck in on her meditations.

He produced a quantity of extra wraps which he insisted on her wearing. There was a man's heavy sweater which she was to wear over her coat and a thick veil which had to be tied down over her hat to keep her ears warm. He also was having the brick for his foot-warmer heated.

"It's twelve miles out there," he replied in answer to her wondering comments.

It was a beautiful, moonlit night and the sky a deep indigo. The snow on the far-stretching(undulating hills was all blue, from the faint, grayish tinge in the foreground of the deep, mysterious shadows of the distant hills. The far-off range lay outlined against the sky by its uneven line of snow-clad peaks painted into the landscape with a fine brush carrying pigment of a steely gray. Single sentinel pines pointed weird blue fingers to the sky and others huddled together, sheltering mournfully howling coyotes. The crisp, cold air seemed vibrant with a blue light. The clear stillness producer a breathless, hushed expectancy—of what?

All this Elizabeth felt rather than thought. Everything was mysterious and unknown but she was not afraid. Perhaps at last those sleigh bells were her wedding bells. What had—Harry—been writing?

Her companion was silent. He had said his say and no other point of contact had been found.

In a surprisingly short time, so it seemed they reached the cabin from which shone the only light for miles around. At first, as Elizabeth stood in the doorway, she realized that her glasses were befogged. She snatched them off impatiently and then caught a glimpse of the bed in the farther corner of the room. Quickly she crossed to it. The face on the pillow was thin and white—but it was her Harry's.

She turned in dumb gratitude to the people in the room, seated by the table with its one small lamp, their faces averted.

As she approached them, one woman rose and went to the stove, remarking "It's a cold night, Miss.. I'll have a cup o' tea for you in a minute."

And Ezra Hay introduced Elizabeth to his wife who, he said, would remain with her that night.

She tried to protest but was interrupted by, "You got to have sleep if you'll be any good at all. I've made a bed f'r you there on the floor. I'm used to bein' up nights with them kids o' mine. Here's your tea. An' I thought this chokecherry jelly with bread an' butter'd sort o' taste good."

The others, after introductions and commonplace irrelevant remarks, left the cabin and Elizabeth's long waiting began. But in the days that followed she was surprised at how many people there were to drop in for a greeting or to relieve her watch.

"Good mornin'," one would say, "I jest stopped to bring you this glass of sarvice-berry jelly. I thought you might like it. Yes, I gathered them berries last summer up in Coyote Park. Thought maybe you'd like to taste 'em. How is he this mornin'? We all like him so much. One time we was goin' to hev a concert at the school house. There ain't much goin' on around here, an' thet's about all the chance we get to see folks, seems like. I was dead set on goin' but one of the kids was sick, an' do you know, he come in an' said he'd take care o' them kids—for me to go to the concert. He did too, jest as good's a woman. I wasn't a bit uneasy."

Or the presentation of votive offering and the testimony would run like this:

"I jest brought you some of our home-cured ham this mornin' an' called to see how he was. He was mighty good to us last summer. We was jest in the midst o' hayin' and hurryin' fer all we was worth to git through before it rained when one of our men was taken sick an' a horse got hurt at the same time. He come right over with his team an' went to work. Left his own hayin' too an' wouldn't take no pay fer what he done. Seems like he don't care whether he gits ahead or not. I don't think he makes much more'n enough to live on. But he says that time, when Charlie told him he hadn't orter, he says, 'You got your wife an' kids to feed. I ain't got nobody, only myself.' Now you go'n lay down an' let me take care of him fer a while. I c'n stay jest's well's not."

One woman told her, "At first we was afraid of him—thought he had killed a man or somethin', because he never would go to town an' seemed so afraid somehow o' bein' with people. Then he was allays so nice an' kind, an' ready to do a favor thet we decided there wasn't no harm about him an' we didn't care about his past. You know it is that way out in these parts. It's what a man is that counts, not what he's been or what his folks was."

At last there came a day when the crisis was expected, and those in the little cabin watched breathlessly for the change. It came—and the patient started his weary climb upward.

"If he had been a drinking man, we never could have pulled him through, remarked the doctor.

Elizabeth started. Then he was not drinking and had not been drinking for some time! It was true there had been no hint of that in anything she had found in the cabin or that the people had told her, but—it seemed like disloyalty even to think about it now.

The next day she came across the unfinished letter which had been so carefully put away that it was mislaid.

It read, "I could not resist when with others; but for your sake, though I have lost you, I have not touched a drop in years. I am sick—I think it will be my finish. But I wanted you to know what— "In a rush she understood it all—his fear of going to town or even to the little social gatherings among the ranchers on Quien Sabe Creek. She knew what it meant to a bright, sociable fellow like her Harry, but now she could share his isolation and loneliness and help him to look to Christ for strength in his constant struggle against the temptation that had so often beset him in the past. At last in the little cabin, far off from the associations she had known, in the company of one who was at that moment too sick to understand or share her joy, she was happy, and the bells that jingled on the passing sleighs outside sounded in her ears like a prophery of wedding bells to come.—American Messenger.

The Sunday School

Daily Devotional Reading

There are many homes in which daily devotional Bible reading should be followed if it were not for the feeling on the part of the head of the household of inability to conduct such a service. This inability may be real or it may be merely timidity and self consciousness.

The reader may not know that provision for daily devotional Bible reading and meditation has been made in our Home Department Quarterly for use by members of the Home Department, which, in late years has become a very important part of the Sunday school.

It has occurred to the editor of this publication that if attention were called to this feature of the Home Department Quarterly an interest might be awakened which would result in a larger use of this publication, not only by members of the Home Department, but by others as well. The use of this publication would quickly encourage daily devotional Bible reading and meditation in hundreds of homes if once it were known that ample provision has been made for this purpose.

With these daily meditations fresh suggestions come for each day's communion. Opportunities for service that the rush of life have hidden from us are right at our door. There is something worth while going on in all of our contact with people and affairs. Our inner life takes on new meaning.

The editor of the Home Department Quarterly feels sure that the daily use of the devotional Bible readings and meditations provided in this publication would brighten each day as the members of the household go forth to their daily tasks and duties, and each battle would be better fought, and each trial more cheerfully borne, and the Father's will better understood by using these suggestions for the day. It would enable us also better to appreciate the psalmist's prayer:

"Let the words of my mouth and the meditations of my heart
Be acceptable in thy sight,
O Jehovah, my rock and my salvation.

For the benefit of those who have not seen the Home Department Quarterly, and for those who have seen it but never carefully examined or followed these daily devotional readings and meditations, we herewith submit a sample which is characteristic of the entire twelve lessons. It is the lesson for next Sunday (June 2), or rather the lesson that should be followed during week beginning the past Monday (May 27). The title of the lesson is SELF-FORGETFUL SERVICE, based principally on the beautiful story of the anointing of Jesus by Mary in Bethany. The lesson comments and suggestions are as follows:

The Bethany Home.—What memories gather about that Bethany home! The names of some towns and places have become immortalized because of their association with the Son of God. Bethlehem, name ever dear as the place where Jesus was born and with him a new hope for the world; Nazareth, the place where Jesus spent his childhood, youth and young manhood; Galilee, sweet Galilee, whose waters carried the Son of God back and forth on his mission of love, whose shores contain the prints of weary feet going to and fro in the earth carrying glad tidings to the children of men; and Bethany,—no other name carries with it sweeter memories than the name of the town in which God's Son found a quiet retreat away from the world's turmoil. Millions of homes since that day have been made sacred and immortalized because they have housed the Christ, God's own Son. Have YOU room for him in your heart?

Our Lesson Today is the third glimpse we have of this Bethany home. Every time we get a look into that hospitable home we are a little better for it. The first glimpse was when Jesus came into the village and Martha opened her door to him. Her hospitality was very beautiful. She wrought earnestly to give him fitting entertainment. During this visit we see Mary, too, for the first time and find her sitting at Jesus' feet listening to his words, which sank into her heart and sweetened her life. Every time we meet her she occupies the same place,—at Jesus' feet.

Since That First Glimpse into the Bethany home, a scene which we shall never forget, some months have passed, and meanwhile there was a great sorrow in the home when again Jesus came, this time to bring sympathy and comfort and life! And now, the third and last glimpse shows us Lazarus and both his sisters. Martha serves—Martha always served. Mary also is in her wonted place at Jesus' feet. And here something wonderful happened, something the world has never forgotten, and never will, for the Master himself gave it the touch of immortality, and as I write and as you study his own words are being fulfilled.

Attar of Roses.—It is said that it required 400,000 roses to one ounce of attar of roses, when pure, which costs as high as $100 an ounce. This ointment Mary poured upon the head of Jesus and then also bathed his feet with it. The act shows the highest mark of honor that she could have shown her Master. It told of her love, love unspeakable. The perfume was a fit emblem of her heart's affection, and the house was filled with the odor of the ointment.

Since That Night the odor has been diffused everywhere, and now the world is filled with it. Wherever the story has been told the sweet story of Jesus and his love for a dying world, this also, that Mary did nearly twenty centuries ago, has been told as a memorial of one who poured out her heart's affection on the Christ whom she loved far and above everything else in this world. Of this woman Jesus said what he said of no other, "She hath done what she could." And again, "Let her alone, for she hath wrought a beautiful work on me." And Jesus had a high sense of appreciation of the beautiful.

Love's Expression.—Like the Master himself, love can not long be hid. There is no such thing as a silent affection. Love always expresses itself in some outward way. It did the soul of Mary good, and it refreshed the heart of her Lord, to pour on his head the precious ointment which she had secured at a cost we do not know. We must not forget the value of such sentiment as Mary displayed. Fine churches and beautiful pictures have their place and serve their purpose. Judas pretended to want the price of the ointment to feed the bodies of the poor; Mary was spending it to feed their souls, and it is the Mary, not the Judas spirit that this day cares for the poor. There are some things that cannot be appraised in terms of money, and they are the best things of life.

The Best for Jesus.—The best we have is not too good for Jesus. Mary could have gotten a cheaper box, of perfume that would have cost less. But she got the best box and put into it the best perfume—the costly spikenard. We owe Christ the best,—the best. Do not give him the odds and ends of your life, the tired moments, the exhausted faculties, the money you can spare after all other expenditures are made. Paul made great speeches, but he made his best speech for Christ. Give Christ the best word you can utter, the gladdest song you can sing, the strongest heart throb you can feel,—give it all to him, he will sanctify and glorify it and transform it into rich treasures for heaven.

A Timely Act.—Such was Mary's act; the Master so said. She anointed Jesus for his burial. It is a fine thing to be able to seize the one great opportunity for doing the fitting and beautiful deed. Just to do the right thing at the right time,—how much it means; to say the right word when your friend is in secret despair, to do the kindly deed at the opportune time. Speak the words of appreciation and kindness while the loved ones are alive and can hear them. Do not save the eulogy for the funeral services. Scatter flowers along the pathway of life, do not save them all for the casket. One never knows how much good may be done to a despairing soul by a touch, a word, a thoughtful act. So little is required to make a dark day bright.

And Judas,—what shall we say of him? His was the blackest deed in history. He went out from that love-laden atmosphere to sell his Lord into the hands of them who lusted for his life. It was this that makes his crime so hideous; he committed it with the memory of the holiest associations fresh in his mind. What nobleness a man can witness and still be base! Watch yourself after you have been in the room with Christ and those who love him. To descend to carnal things then is to desecrate the soul in its holy of holies. We have in imagination been sitting at that table, witnessing that scene, approving the loving service,—to what sort of deeds shall we now go out?

Personal Thought.—How many burdens would be lightened, how many hearts be made glad if the wealth of love and gratitude of which the world is full were but lavished instead of hoarded. Let us not longer hoard our appreciation, our thanks, as a miser hoards his gold. Let us scatter freely. Before love broke the flask of ointment, the perfume was all there, but it could not fill the house. "A hint to the wise is sufficient."

The publishers will be glad to send you sample copies for distribution in the homes represented in your Sunday school and the members of your church.

In the pages not devoted to the lesson articles of special interest and helpfulness will be found, among them these:

In Patience Ye Shall Win Your Souls.
The Bible and God's Angels.
When Altar Fires Burned Bright.
The Habit of Happiness.
The Meaning of Our Lord's Ascension.

A postal card will bring you copies of this publication.

REVIEW OF

The Thought and Work of the Church

ASHLAND COLLEGE TRUSTEES, NOTICE! The meeting of the Board of Trustees of Ashland College is called for Tuesday and Wednesday, JUNE fourth and fifth and NOT May fourth and fifth as the official call stated through an error. All trustees should come, if possible.

The great difference in the nature of people is incidated by the character and tone of the letters recieved by an editor. We will not say anything about the hard things that are sometimes said; we try to forget those, but the hearts of kindness that are revealed to us in the words from others we would cherish forever. This morning we received a letter from a good sister with a remittance for the Evangelist and an apology because it was one week late, and some of our readers seem offended if we remind them of their arrears after they are six months behind with their remittance.

Another report of the splendid work being accomplished by the First Brethren church of Dayton is furnished us by Brother Teeter this week. Their Anniversary Day was celebrated on May twelfth and nearly $5,000.00 was raised to apply on the indebtedness of their church. W. H. Beachler was secured to help them in the work of this day and his efforts were greatly appreciated and brought forth ready response. Brother Bell and family will remove to Long Beach, California early in the fall and L. S. Bauman will come to Dayton to conduct an evangelistic meeting, and E. M. Cobb will then take charge of the Dayton church for a year as supply pastor.

The closing days of Ashalnd College are near and a few notes of interest are furnished our readers this week. Other notes and reports will follow and give the events of the closing exercises, commencement, meeting of the Board of Trustees and other important events.

Though it is a busy time of the year Freeman Ankrum has taken time to report the progress of the Carlton Brethren church, near Garwin, Iowa. From his report we learn that the church is endeavoring to go forward in every department of its work. The greatly increased offering may be viewed from two directions. It was either an extraordinary offering or previous offerings were away below par. Eleven hundred percent is a great increase for an offering and many other churches would have to make a similar increase to do their full duty to God.

While church news may grow scarce through the heated summer months there seems to be something to report from Kentucky at all times, and Brother Carpenter seems to have the happy faculty of finding out about it and of giving the news to the entire brotherhood. Just a few miles above Krypton where Brother Cook has labored faithfully for several years a new work is opening up. One confession was lately received at this mission point and they now propose to build a new church at this point.

Campaign Secretary Beachler's second report from the Endowment Campaign in Pennsylvania is almost as good as his first one. The report this week comes from Listie and the First Brethren church of Johnstown. Listie reached the sum of four hundred dollars, which is good considering the membership and circumstances. The First church of Johnstown came forward with three thousand dollars already made up when Brother Beachler arrived on the field. It seems that Pennsylvania is determined to keep up the high expectations of the brotherhood for the achievements of that state. Watch the thermometer.

The call for teachers to take up the work at Lost Creek and at Krypton, Kentucky has not yet been fully answered. One of Ashland's College students will take up a part of their work in July, but Miss Ruby Brewbaker should have companions to go with her in this work for the Kingdom.

I. D. Bowman met with splendid success in the short revival meeting he recently held in the Brush Valley congregation near Kittanning, Pennsylvania. Crowded houses greeted him night after night and the meetings were brought to a close with many people unable to gain entrance into the church. The total number of confessions was twenty-nine.

The Habit of Giving

A few years ago many people would have been afraid to launch any kind of a campaign to secure funds for colleges, churches or missions in the face of the demands made upon the people of a country that was engaged in the greatest war of all history, but experience has taught that such fears are without foundation and that instead of the one great demand made upon the people being a hindrance to other causes of benevolence in many ways it is a help.

We are largely creatures of habit, and habits are sometimes easily formed, and when a habit is once formed along one line it is not difficult to direct it along other similar lines. Having formed the habit of giving some people who were not used to answering calls for financial support to any special works of benevolence may be more readily induced to recognize other claims upon them as well as the one that first reached them with its appeal. Thus the many appeals for support for every institution that is supporting the American Government in the present war have caused the people to form the habit of giving, and the fears in regard to loss of support for the church and missions and colleges have not been fully realized. In fact there are indications that these things have been helped by the many "drives" for financial help. Many colleges are seeking endowment funds and many churches are raising large sums for various purposes, and the Brethren church should not be behind in this great movement for it is in the atmosphere. A recent number of a Kansas City paper contained the following appeal which we reprint for the sake of the good it may do the Brethren cause and for the help it may be to Brother Beachler in his campaign for endowment for Ashland College.

Endow Now

The Christian college must be adequately endowed. The truth of this statement is abundantly proved by the failure of hundreds promising institutions that tried to carry on their work without endowment and, after struggling vainly for years to maintain their standards, have yielded to the inevitable and closed their doors. Their work has not been in vain. Thousands of lives have been helped by them, and, though their work has ceased, its influence goes on, and always for good.

Our State schools are supported by the State with a lavish hand. We would not take one dollar from their support. But we cannot look to them for the Christian leadership we must have if our Christian civilization is to be maintained. However much they might wish it otherwise, the very plan of their organization and support prevents them from being the fountain of Christian influence, and past experience shows that to hope for it from them is to hope in vain.

The Christian college is the hope of our Christian civilization. To it the world as well as the church turns for men and women consecrated to high ideals and noble service who will stand always for the best things, and will so lead that what is worthy and good in our time will be the safe possession of our children. But, if the Christian college is to survive, if it is to furnish the church and the State wth such leadership, it must be so endowed as to be able to meet the intellectual needs of our young people, and by its moral and religious emphasis to fit them for leadership.

So patriotism, as well as religious zeal, calls for a large, glad, enthusiastic response to the campaigns for adequate endowment now carried on by our colleges. Kansas City university is ready to enter upon a period of expansion, a career of enlargement that will make it a tremendous force for righteousness. The endowment campaign will bring to our people the privilege of sharing in the glory of realizing this end.—W. S. Reese, Dean Kansas City University.

When the Truth Does Not Make Free

Sincere seekers after the truth have long been encouraged in their seeking and have borne the hardships attendant upon their search gladly in the strength of the promise of the Master that "the truth shall make you free." While the greatest freedom in the world is freedom of soul and such is obtained only through truth yet there are times when this soul liberty and the truth that assures it must be obtained at a terrible price.

The one great empire that has stood out from among all other nations of the cultured world in its searching after truth has apparently failed to grasp the real meaning of its search and has at last placed a severe penalty upon the telling of the truth, and today Germany stands as the father of a group of the most monumental lies and misrepresentations and false principles the world has known, and in the place of being a nation of "free-thinkers" its people have practically come to be nothing more than venders of canned thought and the thought has not been any too well preserved in the canning. And today instead of honoring one who dares to tell the truth such a one in the "Fatherland" is pronounced insane and truth has become lunacy to the extent that its advocate is liable to a period of rest and retirement in a sanitarium. Since Prince Lichnowsky's revelation that Germany started the war the Upper Chamber of the Prussian Diet has solemnly debated what shall be done with this indiscreetly truthful diplomat. While a minority of the members considered the Prince insane when he proved England innocent, and thus should be let alone, the majority decided to press for his arraignment for treason before the High Court.

This attempt to crucify the truth is no new move on the part of despotic peoples, for it has long been known that a despot has no more regard for the liberty of thought and soul than he has for the liberty of their political subjects or slaves. Truth and despotism can not exist in the same empire; one or the other must be crushed, and in the crushing process truth must sometimes suffer temporarily, yet in the end it must prevail.

What Real Truth Seekers Say

Germany has not succeeded as yet nor can she ever succeed in crushing out the truth, nor in covering it up with her materialistic philosophy so deeply that it will not rise again, and there are still left some German subjects who will not subject the "freedom of the will" which they regard as a gift from heaven, to the iron will of the Kaiser and his henchmen. They would rather become "lunatics for truth" than to enjoy the favors of Berlin for a season. Such a one is Dr. Hermann Rosemeier, now a democratic refugee in Switzerland, but long a journalist of Berlin, and a most influential political editor of the great Morgenpost.

In the Berne Frie Zeitung, Dr. Rosemeier says:

"In Germany it is permissible to describe Imperialism in general as the cause of the war, but one dare not discuss the question of the Germanic Powers' share in the blame for the war. Liebknecht, the one Social Democrat who opposed the war from the start, is a convict in prison. 'Red Rosa' Luxemburg, called the 'tigress of German Socialism,' is under preventive arrest, and so are thousands like her. Professor Nicolai is in jail. Lieutenant-Commander Paasche, of the Imperial German Navy—the son-in-law of the Vice-President of the Reichstag and nephew-in-law of Maximilian Harden—is serving a sentence of penal servitude. Poor old Baron von Eckardstein, former Chancellor of the German Embassy in London, wanders from preventive arrest to jail and from jail back to preventive arrest. The harmless Lilly Jannasch, secretary of the New Fatherland League, has been locked up for months.

"That unfortunate nobleman who belonged to the political division of the great General Staff and was a Knight of the Iron Cross has been stuck into an insane asylum for giving publicity to Prince Lichnowsky's memorandum, while there is a threat to visit the same horrible fate on Lichnowsky himself.

"August Bebel, the dead Socialist Generalissimo, once coined this aphorism: 'In olden days disagreeable people were banished to a monastery; today they are put into a sanitarium.' Prince Lichnowsky may console himself. As the Prussian junkers are now threatening him, so the slave barons of the American South once swore that they would intern John Quincy Adams in a madhouse."

The London Pall Mall Gazette, however, thinks that Prince Lichnowsky—who is described as "that rarest of things, a German and a gentleman"—is safe enough because he enjoys the support of Maximilian Harden. It says:

"Herr Harden, whose practical immunity from interference is one of the many mysteries of Germany's internal politics, is giving his powerful protection to Prince Lichnowsky. As the princely families of the Fatherland have a fear of what the exposer of Eulenberg may let out, it is quite on the cards that the proposed prosecution of the Prince may be dropped."

Credit Where It Belongs

There are two extremes common to the matter of placing credit. Many people receive credit for things they have never done and many others do not receive proper credit for what they really have done. Sometimes we are made to feel that our efforts are not appreciated and that our accomplishments have not secured proper respects for ourselves.

While the Christian religion is largely a personal religion and one's attitude toward it has much to do with his eternal destiny yet it is doubtful if many of us deserve as much personal credit for what we believe and what we accept as truth as we really desire. There are some things that seem to be human accomplishments while there are a great many others that are apparently gifts from God himself. The Apostles who were so closely associated with Jesus in his earthly career developed many virtues and seemingly overcame many weaknesses and shortcomings, but just how much credit belongs to them personally it is rather difficult to say.

We have long been accustomed to giving great praise to Peter for what has been termed his great confession. When men were questioning as to the personality of Jesus Peter was the one that boldly declared, "Thou art the Christ, the son of the living God." And for this bold confession we have praised him, but we should not forget that it was no great discovery on the part of Peter at all for Jesus very plainly told him otherwise. Peter had not worked this out for himself; flesh and blood could not, but as Jesus said: "My Father hath revealed it unto thee."

There are a great many things about the religion of Jesus Christ that can not be discovered by flesh and blood or that can not be fathomed by the human brain, for it is a part of the plan that these things shall be revealed by the heavenly Father. Too many people are disappointed in their religious experiences because they have tried to discover undiscoverable things and have not placed themselves in a position to let the Father reveal the things to them that are so essential to a saving faith. Reason has its place, but God stands above human reason.

Conditions of Discipleship

There are three conditions to true discipleship that must be met by every one who would become true followers of the Lord. We are inclined to the belief that one of the chief causes of failure on the part of many would-be disciples is that they try to lay down their own terms of discipleship or endeavor or to determine their own conditions when the truth of the matter is that these terms and conditions have been established for many centuries and can not be altered or revised.

Jesus left no doubt about this as he taught his disciples while they were with him in personal association. First of all there is the condition which relates to self. In other words until one has not only learned the lesson of self-denial but has also learned to translate the principle into active life. This does not mean the modern self denying sacrifice that is much spoken of, but rather the denial of self itself, the ignoring of self, taking no credit to self for any irghteousness whatever.

In the second place discipleship is conditioned on one's relation to the world. Man can not live unto himself, especially is this true of one who has a desire to become a follower of the Lord. A disciple must take up his cross, not his crosses, daily or he cannot follow Jesus. The cross meant death to the Master and the cross must mean the placing of one's life at the disposal of Jesus, to be ready to bear the constant burden or even to die at Jesus' command should the need of the world require it. This must be a daily or a constant attitude of a real disciple, in fact it is one of the absolute conditions of discipleship.

The third condition of discipleship has to do with one's personal relation to Christ himself. Jesus said, "Follow me." Following Jesus means trust and obedience. Discipleship means God first and "none of self." We must trust without question and imitate without reserve, and obey without hesitation.

A Spiritual Clinic in Africa

By MISS JEAN MACKENZIE, Metet, West Africa
Author of "Black Sheep," "An African Trail," etc.

At the conference for evangelists at Elat, in December, there were 574 evangelists and 379 wives. If I seem not to have written much about it, that is because it was too big to write about so soon. I am still getting my breath. Those nine hundred people all looked at us with that combined demand which is like a wave coming in from the sea. You dig your toes into the platform to meet it. We white women looked after the women. But at noon I used to sit in the great church where Mr. Johnson met with somewhat over 500 evangelists to answer their questions on the practice of their profession. It used to delight me that the men were no less disorderly at this session than the women when I answered their questions. And the women, being only the wives of evangelists, married to their profession and sold to it, and not always people of a vocation, might have been expected to show poorer form than the men, besides being just women.

It was exciting to both these tribes to be able to put their perplexities up to the doctor, and I never felt more the difficulties that torment them, in their quality of pioneer, than at those noon hours when Mr. Johnson must answer right off the bat the questions which I was likely to meet in the afternoon. We talked on different days about such practical matters as visiting the sick, comforting the mourners, addressing the passerby—when I think how to write of these things I know how little they reveal themselves in their local aspect and it is hard for me to speak further about them.

You see, with us the heathen do actually and exactly rage; they do, to the immense horror and disaster of their townspeople, "imagine a vain thing." Blood and tears lay the dust of the village street in moments of emergency when there seems to be a call for action and, when it seems best for the common good, to deal without gloves. And there stands the evangelist who must not interfere with custom, with the authority of the headman, with "another's thing" bought and paid for, and now to "be the goat." I suppose you know that the goat, so much with us, was not originally a joke. When you live here you see the grim shape under the pantaloon of more than one joke. Well, here is the evangelist from backwaters of the forest, on his feet in the shadow of the great roof of Elat Church, his hand urgently stretched out to Mr. Johnson on the platform, waiting his chance to ask how he is to deal with the goat. Is he privileged to rescue the goat? And Mr. Johnson to whom the goat, in the pitiful form of widows in the ashes, babies whose mothers have died, little girls sold for marriages, bewitched unhappy people—poor Mr. Johnson must answer for the twentieth time that half hour that really the evangelist must use discretion in his function of shepherd. The benefit of the church as sanctuary is certainly limited. After all, the evangelist is not a potentate, though his heart very much draws him to the exercise of all the temporal power that a priest may acquire, and the danger of a hierarchal development is not absent from our pastoral system.

Some Curious Questions

All this white man's wisdom colors every answer of Mr. Johnson when he stands to answer the questions of the evangelists. I hope you don't think that all our evangelists are terribly clever—many of them are certainly the silly babes of the promise and rise solemnly to ask:

"May the bereaved wail on Sunday?"

"Let them wail on Sunday," says Mr. Johnson with a kind of weary patience, "as if it were another day."

"What shall we do," a woman asks me at my own clinic, "when the townspeople beat widows, but will stop if the Christians will pay them? Because in our hearts we very much pity the widows, but we do not know if it is right to pay them."

I say very firmly, because my heart certainly pities the widows, that the townspeople are not to be paid, as they would certainly then find other widows to beat.

"We too have said so," assents the woman, but she is not happy in her wisdom and still looks at me with shadowed eyes. This type of blackmail is ancient; it used to be imposed upon the relatives of the widow, but has been revived for the benefit of the Christians.

It is hard for my women not to be personal in their questions. When we speak of the things of consolation there is one and another woman on her feet to say:

"Tell me what to do, my mother is old, she is all I have, no one else remains to me but just my mother, we are just two, and I know that soon she must die—I ask you how shall I bear that sorrow?"

I turn over the leaves in the hand-book which Mr. Johnson has just got out, and I read to her that verse which says in the Bulu:

"I will not leave you orphaned, I will come to you," and for a minute we speak of the loss of father and mother. That is so unique, because husbands can always be replaced in this country, and because a woman has borne one child may perhaps bear another, but who will ever mother and father us again?

Thus we strive to widen our sympathies as we must do, if we are indeed to serve. And the women look at me with soft eyes and sigh, and say to one another that even the white women know. Well, it is my opinion that the white women can hardly know the forlorn orphanage of this country, where every human being may profit by the sale of women but a woman's mother.

We speak of the duties of women to orphaned babies. Mrs. Hope has been talking of the care of children for an hour each morning, and her pleas must have gone home, for Mendus, young, intelligent, very earnestly a Christian, happy in a good husband and a baby, rises to say that she has never taken thought for the babies of dead mothers until now, and if now she should indeed rise up to pity and to care for them, will the Lord forgive her the things of the past? It is hard, you see, for us to be anything but personal.

Here is a common matter of question: "My husband has brought into the house a poor oppressed widow, she lives with us until her affairs are settled—but will she help me at the garden work or the housework? Not she. And she is cross to the children. I don't say that I grudge the help we can give her, for she is certainly to be pitied. The scars on her body are only now healing and if we don't help her no one will, but I ask you how am I to put up with her?"

To this question, as with all questions which bear upon quarrels, I "pussy-foot." I remind the women that hatred, like a child, is never born of one parent. But in my own heart I despise that widow—her vices are so familiar.

Well, excitement runs high at our clinic, disorder breaks out at the more vital queries, and when every heart is awake there begin to come to the surface the passionate questions about envy. Yes, when these hearts give up the fundamental bitterness it is seen to be envy. How to cope with the envy we meet and the envy we feel. It is well at this point to let Christ reveal himself, who could pass all the traders in Jerusalem and never grieve that He might not adorn himself with their bright wares; who was obscure; who was so little popular with the elders of the church in his own town; who never had a child. We do well at this point to remember the Lord Jesus. This remembrance subdues us and tempers the heat of our heart's fires.

We go out into the later afternoon, where the young girls of the neighborhood have been caring for our many darling babies. We reclaim these and go back to our crowded quarters down by the "engine" or over in the school town, softened surely by a sense of that presence which has not been absent from the "big meeting" at Eclat. The evangelists and their wives say that there must be every year a meeting for them. That is their version of the "three tabernacles" that were to have been the permanent home of those three disciples of Christ had not been a wanderer and a Master of wanderers.

So back again by the many ways of the forest the evangelists and their wives have gone with that leisurely domestic gait that we Bulu call "woman's walk," with their little packs of treasures new and old. These they will be displaying this very night by the light of the one lantern in the town, in the towns of how many tribes, and to the admiration of how many faithful hearts.—Missionary Review.

Who Are The Nupes?

The announcement that a Nupe grammar had recently been published in England would lead most readers simply to ask, "Who are the Nupes?"

They constitute one of the oldest and last of the tribes to be subdued in Northwest Africa. The Nupes were finally conquered by the British. Their country became part of Nigeria, whose territory it increased by something like sixty-four square miles and added to its population about 150,000 persons. For many years it was believed the Nupes had no literature of their own, but lately there have been discovered songs and religious poems written in a corruption of Arabic characters, the Aljemi. These productions date back more than a hundred years, and it is believed were inspired by Mohammedan priests, for they contain distorted, although unmistakable Moslem doctrines.

Our Youngest Readers

TWO SUPRISED BOYS

Anne Porter Johnson

"Sure enough!" exclaimed Mr. Nelson at the breakfast table. "There's no school today—you boys have a holiday, sure enough!" He looked across the table at Edwin and Carl. "If the signs don't fail, we're going to have a fine day. Maybe I can think of something for you to do!"

Edwin shot Carl a worried glance. That was exactly what they did not want their father to bother about. It was a holiday and they wanted to do just as they pleased. "Something for you to do," sounded very much like work, a long, hard job, very likely.

After breakfast they went out noiselessly to the barn. "That's just what I was afraid of—that Father would think up some work for us today," said Edwin.

"I think I know what Father has in his mind. You know the cellar—old potatoes and so on. I heard him say it should be cleaned. Gee, that's the meanest job I can think of--I'd rather go to school any day!"

Edwin gasped. "I never thought of the cellar! If I had, I couldn't have swallowed another bite of breakfast. Well, what shall we do? Father will be out here any minute now. Let's vamoose. We'll go down along the creek to hide, and then we can decide what to do."

They went out of the back door of the barn, picked their way through the orchard, dodging along behind trees and fences, until they came to the bend of the creek.

"If Father doesn't see us around," said Carl, "it may slip his mind. He'll forget and think we've gone to school as usual."

"We'll cling to that hope," replied Edwin. "Anyway, he'll not come down here. I I don't think he knows anything about this sheltered little place at the bend of the creek."

The boys sat on the bank of the creek and threw skippers across the water. "I'll tell you what I wish," burst out Edwin. "You know there's a big parade in Fremont today. I'd give all I have to go!"

"Same here!" agreed Carl. "But it's twenty miles away—no use in wishing. We'll consider ourselves lucky if we get out of that work Father spoke of. I wish you hadn't mentioned that parade over in Fremont—I'd give my head to go."

"It's to be a mile long," announced Edwin. "And six bands! The little dinky parades we've seen don't amount to—"

"Bob Stone is going, and Lester McCune and Harold Dent, and—"

"O' keep still, Carl! Let's talk of something else. If we had an automobile like those folks, we—"

"Boys! Boys!"

The boys jumped. "There, Father has thought of the cellar, I suppose!" reasoned Edwin.

The big strong voice came ringing out again. "Boys! Boys! Whoopee! Boys!!"

"Sounds just like, "come and clean the cellar, boys," said Carl.

"Sounds like work of some kind," Edwin declared, taking a long breath.

"He'll give it up in a minute," Carl said. "He'll think we're out of hearing."

"This is a holiday—our holiday, and it isn't fair to ask us to work at some horrid job all day, and that cellar will be an all-day job, let me say!"

Once more Mr. Nelson's voice came booming through the orchard and across the field. "Edwin! Carl! Whoopee!!!"

"That's three times," said Edwin. "Now he'll give it up."

"It doesn't seem quite right—"

"No, but it's very likely we'll get to clean the cellar anyway, one of these days—it's only that we don't want to spend our holiday at the pesky job."

The calls stopped, and the boys felt relieved. They ventured on down the creek as it wound nearer and nearer the road. A machine came tooting past. "Hello boys, we're going to Fremont!" yelled Bob Stone.

Just behind came another automobile. The boys caught Lester McCune's voice, "Hurrah for the parade!"

"Pshaw!" exclaimed Carl. "I'd give anything—"

"There's another machine," broke in Edwin.

The automobile whirled past, but back on the air floated Harold Den's cry, "So long, boys! All aboard for the parade!"

Edwin and Carl watched the dust of the three machines clear away. Edwin then kicked at a stone, and Carl, with a stick in his hand, whacked at a stump.

"It's a great holiday for us—seeing all the other boys whirl off to Fremont, while we are home dodging work! Great holilay!" Edwin kicked the stone a little harder.

"Here comes another automobile," exclaimed Carl. "Wonder who—it's a new one. I don't know whose—"

The machine came to a sudden stop. "Well, land alive, boys, I've been hunting for you high and low!"

Both boys ran to the road. "Father! Father!" gasped Edwin.

"Whose machine?" asked Carl.

"Ours! Ours!" Mr. Nelson declared, laughing. "I wanted to surprise you, and I believe I've done it. I've been leaving it in the garage down the road, and then while you've been in school, I've learned to drive it. You're really surprised, aren't you?"

"Surprised!" exclaimed Carl.

"Ours!" breathed Edwin. "I—I' can't believe it, Father!"

"Well, it's so, whether you believe it or not! You remember this morning I said I thought I could find something for you boys to do today. And then when I got all ready to start to Fremont for the parade, I couldn't find you anywhere. I called three times! Well, jump in, and we'll be off to Fremont! It's lucky I found you."—Evangelical Messenger.

What I Would Do

If I were a rose
On the garden wall,
I'd look so fair
And grow so tall;
I'd scatter perfume far and wide,
Of all flowers I'd be the pride—
That's what I'd do
If I were you,
O little rose!

If I were a bird
With nest in a tree,
I would sing a song
So glad and free
That birds in gilded cages near
Would pause, my wild, sweet notes to hear—
That's what I'd do
If I were you,
O gay, wild birds!

Fair little maid,
If I were you,
I should always try
To be good and true;
I'd be the merriest, sweetest child
On whom the sunshine ever smiled—
That's what I'd do
If I were you,
Dear little maid! —Selected.

Kentucky Mission Notes

One Confession and a New Church

Brother Cook reports one confession at Napford, two miles above Krypton, where he is conducting a Sunday school and is preaching regularly. It is a union work but Brother Cook is right on the job and he writes, "They are going to begin a new church at once. They are planning to buy an organ. I expect to hold a meeting this summer at Napford."

Dedication

The dedication of the Krypton church will likely take place on Sunday, June 16. If any of the friends of this work can drop down into Krypton on that day a welcome is assured. Go at once to the most beautiful spot in the town and you will be in the place where you want to be.

Brother Cook has been very busy painting and finishing the building and beautifying the grounds preparatory to the dedication. He has not had the usual amount of time for calling but we note in his monthly report to our misison board that during that time Mrs. Cook had made more than a score of "pastoral calls." Maybe that has some relation to the item in the report which shows an average attendance of more than sixty at prayer meeting. Thanks, Sister Cook, your loyal help is greatly appreciated.

"A New Song Needed"

"Riding toward the station to catch an evening train, I was attracted by the sound of a childish voice coming from an humble home near the roadside. It was growing late and by the light of an open wood fire I could see a little girl with a baby sister in her lap. In a sweet, childish voice she was singing 'Liza Jane.' As I stood there listening, the tears came to my eyes. There was song in this childish heart but the only words with which she could express this song were unworthy of her childish lips.

"She needs a 'new song in her mouth.' Our home missionaries are trying to meet this need. The teaching and training that will give this little girl a 'new song' will also place a new joy in her heart and a new light in her life. Is it worth while? Are you doing your part toward the support of our missionaries during these trying times?"—The Soul Winner.

"Better Things""

Brother Drushall writes that he expects to have "better" things" than ever to report at the coming conference at Winona. He is anxious that we find another teacher soon who will help at Riverside this year beginning in July. Two more teachers for grade work are needed, a young man, if he can be found, and a young lady. Who will say, "Here am I, send me?" Miss Ruby H. Brewbaker of Ashland College will be one of the Kentucky workers this year and another will be Miss McKinley Rodgers of Port Republic, Va. Those who will consider taking this work or who know of possible applicants should write us at once.

Filipino Boys and the Base-Ball Missionary

BY PAUL P. FARIS

Editorial Staff of The Continent

The town boys stoned the missionary when he first entered Cebu in the Philippine Islands. Four years later they triumphantly carried him on their shoulders from the Cebu baseball-field. Consecrated athletics, principally consecrated baseball, produced the climax to this remarkable contrast.

Ten years or more ago George Dunlap was catcher on the Boone baseball nine of the Iowa State League. There often he opposed Archer, later catcher on the Chicago National League team, but then behind the bat for Ottumwa. The same season that saw Archer's call to the Chicago "Cubs" brought a "scout" of the Pittsburg "Pirates" with a hint about the possibility of taking Dunlap to Pittsburg.

"There's no use in asking him," the Ottumwa captain told the scout.

"Why not?" demanded the Pennsylvanian.

"Because he is going to what he calls a bigger job than any National League baseball berth," was the emphatic reply. Even the captain of the team that was opposing the Boone catcher knew of Dunlap's ambition to become a foreign missionary.

And a foreign missionary Dunlap became. Having been ordained a minister, he was sent by the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Misisons to Cebu, in the southern part of the Philippine archipelago, where he came into intimate touch with the Cebu high school. Then the street boys stoned him, not violently but mischievously, for he was a Protestant; and not once, but whenever the suggestion and the opportunity smiled on them.

Mischief was not the only characteristic of Cebu boys ,the young missionary early discovered. They loved to foregather about a cockpit and bet on the relative prowess of two bleeding but game roosters. They rejoiced in gambling of other forms, too, and they had become quite expert in the pastime. Whether gambling or cock-fighting, stoning a missionary or quietly talking with one another, moreover, they swore and cursed as naturally as they ate and breathed. The Cebu boys, from environment and inclination, were unquestionably "a bad lot." And not one of the Cebu high school students was receiving any instruction in voluntary Bible classes as sources of counter-impulse; they had interests greater than those offered by any proposed Bible class.

Then the American remembered his early athletic training, and proceeded to organize among the high school boys a baseball nine. He organized it; he coached it; and he made it a winning team. Other nines were formed under his direction, and an inter-island league was established. He took his team to other islands, and then achievements of the Cebu nine brought fame to Cebu and to the Cebu missionary wherever it traveled.

An education in itself was what the new league early became. Boys of one tribe soon were talking freely with boys of another clan and language; for they found that they needed to speak English, the common tongue of the southern islands, if they expected to play effective ball. At first many of the players knew only a few words of English, and these were oaths. Later they learned the baseball terms, and so gradually they waxed fairly fluent as speakers of English. With a common language and a common athletic sport these representatives of different provinces and islands rapidly lost their age-long provincial spirit, and began to develop into veritable Filipinos.

One reason they had to grow beyond the merely swearing stage of their English knowledge lay in the spirit of the Cebu nine. "Don't swear on the diamond, you!" ran an expression common to the Cebu field. "The missionary doesnt' like it." Because the Cebu team itself outgrew the cursing stage other nines followed its leading, and swearing among southern Filipino ballplayers now is in danger of becoming a lost art.

Baseball did not mark the limit of the missionary's consecrated enthusiasm, however. After a while he was organizing track-teams and developing runners, shot-putters, record-making swimmers, and volley-ball players. With the co-operation of Secretary Brown of the Manila Young Men's Christian Association a great international league of sport was organized, which prospered so notably that now the "Far Eastern Olympic games" are held regularly, the meets being staged in Shanghai, in Manila, and even in Japan.

Always the Cebu boys are winning fresh laurels at the Far Eastern Olympic games and at All-Philippines games. Mr. Dunlap has taken his teams to Manila—an honor that in itself pays one for submitting to many a perhaps irksome athletic rule—not only one year, but five years. Four times out of the five, furthermore, the missionary's teams have gone back to Cebu bearing away the highest athletic honors of the Philippines.

Meanwhile what has happened to the early habits of the Cebu boys? They have stopped swearing; there's one habit gone. They have discovered also that they have no time for cock-fighting, if they are to win in baseball, basket-ball, volley-ball, and the rest; that makes two habits shattered. And it has dawned on them that gambling presents no more numerous or promising facilities for excitement, exercise of skill, and abundance of uncertainties than the American game of baseball; and there a third bad habit goes glimmering.

What of the Bible? Among the six hundred boys of the Cebu high school there were organized within four months fifty-four classes of voluntary Bible-study. No, it is not a misprint; fifty-four is correct. From these and later classes many efficient, consecrated Bible-teachers have been graduated for the instruction of peoples and tribes in other parts of the island. Each of the fifty-four classes was formed, moreover, through the direct influence of the Filipino captain of the Cebu baseball nine. Thus mighty has been the power of baseball on young Filipino moral and spiritual life.

Scores of ball teams of brown-skinned Filipino lads are playing baseball today in the ports of the islands, in mountain fastnesses, and even in jungle hamlets Dialects of two-score or more island tribes are being merged on diamonds and along the side-lines into the baseball language, the English tongue. But, whether in native tongue or in baseball talk, the spirit of that Cebu dictum is likely to find wholehearted expression: "Don't swear on the diamond, you! The missionary doesn't like it."—C. E. World.

The Worm

By HARRIET PRESCOTT SPAFFORD

The slow worm crept along the stem,
And ate the green leaf just before him,
And in some dull instinctive way
Knew that an unknown change hung o'er him.

The butterfly went flashing on
Above the loathly worm's slow measure,
Folded his wide emblazoned wings,
And sipped his honey-dew at leasure.

In his bright life he gayly flew,
And had no thought or pain or dolor,
A part of the great azure plain,
A gorgeous flame of living color.

Perhaps he wondered at the worm
Cropping his leaf by morn and even,
Who never saw the butterfly
Fluttering across the great blue heaven.

News From the Field

College Notes

It has occurerd to the writer that the readers of the Evangelist might be interested in a few Ashland College notes. We are nearing the close of another year's work and everybody is busy.

Dr. Furry has been doing considerable speaking at patriotic meetings during the past winter and spring. Last week he spoke at Mansfield and Jeromeville on the Red Cross work. He also delivered three Baccalaureate sermons during the past week and will give the Memorial address at Savannah.

Prof. J. A. Garber delivered the Baccalaureate sermon at West Alexandria, Ohio last Sunday. Upon his return from there he attended the Ohio State Sunday School convention at Springfield. On this same trip he gave the Teacher Training commencement address at Dayton. Prof. Garber has been very busy and has been doing a fine piece of work in the College and among the churches along the lines of his work. Churches and Sunday schools ought to use him more.

The Board of Trustees of the College will hold its Annual Session during Commencement week. Ashland has been most fortunate under the stress of the times to be able to carry on her work so little interrupted. At this meeting of the Board, perhaps from many points of view the most important of many years, plans will doubtless be perfected to carry forward the work of the College. Dr. Furry has these plans well worked out and the co-operation of Faculty and Board, and what is most essential the united co-operation of the brotherhood, will assure to the whole church a better Ashland and greater service than has hitherto been possible.

Monday morning, May 27th, four more Ashland College boys responded to their Country's call and entered upon the service of a soldier. A week ago Prof. Nielson answered the call. Our Service Flag now has more than forty stars. Who from among the men of the church will take the places of these at Ashland College and enter upon a preparation for service to the church?

The first session of our Normal School has been in progress for three weeks. There are about twenty-five people in for this work. Prof. L. L. Garber, Superintendent J. A. McDowell of the Ashland Schools and our own professors are doing this work. The second session will begin June 17th, and continue six weeks. This work is accredited, and there are many from the Ohio churches who teach that ought to take their Normal work here at Ashland.

The graduating class of this year has eight members who received the A. B. degree. Seven are ladies and to say the least we are very proud of them. The only gentleman of the class is a Seminary student. The speaker for the class address this year is President J. Campbell White, of Wooster. See the program below. A full report of the Commencement exercises will appear at which time the complete class roster will be given.

The following is the full program of Commencement week. The readers of the Evangelist and friends of the College are invited to these exercises.

Sunday, June 2, College Chapel at 3 P. M.
Baccaulaureate Sermon,
Pres. W. D. Furry, Ph. D.

Monday Evening, June 3, College Chapel at 8:15 P. M., Senior Expression Recital.

Tuesday Evening, June 4th, at 8 P. M.,
Patriotic Pageant (written by Advanced English Class), presented by the two Literary Societies.

Wednesday, June 5th, at 1 P. M.,
Junior Luncheon (Dormitory).

Wednesday Evening, June 5th, Presbyterian Church at 8 P. M.,
Class Address by J. Campbell White, President of Wooster University.

Thursday, June 6th, College Chapel at 9:30 A. M., Commencement Exercises.

Brazzaville, French Equatorial Africa,
Mar. 5, 1918.

Dear Little Friends:

We are now in the French Congo. I wrote you from Loanda, and now I want to tell you about the days between. We left Loanda on the "Wall" a strange little boat without sufficient railings; Little Lokangi and I could very easily have fallen off, but mamma told me she could take no risks, so Daddy tied a rope around me, and the time on the Wall became an irksome one to me, for I was always either tied to a post; or some one was leading me by my little rope. It was easier after Daddy explained to me that the rope was to prevent my falling in the water.

Our next port was at Boma. Here mamma got me a new hat called a helmet. It was the first place she had found where she could get a child's helmet. There were some other little white children in Boma, and I would see them walking on the street with their black nurses and wonder how they could do it, for I am a poor sort of a missionary and am still afraid of the black people. We staid in Boma only two nights. Everywhere we change we have to sleep in a hotel where they charge Daddy and mamma and Aunt Mae and Aunt Toddy many francs, but I am glad to say that except at Cape Town and New Orleans they charge me nothing at the hotels. So far we have traveled on many boats with very strange names—The City of Cairo, The Outeniquea, The Wall, The Mouette, etc., but they have only charged me on one of them. Mamma often speaks of how wonderful the Lord's provision for me is in making it possible for me to take such a long journey with so little expense.

When we left Boma we came up the Congo River to Matadi on the governor's launch which is called the Mouette. We were only on this launch about four hours, but it was rainy and cool and I enjoyed the trip. At Matadi we stayed all night with a Baptist missionary named Dr. Sims, who has been in Africa many years, for he came out here before Daddy was born. When he looked at Lokange and me, he said, "Those beautiful children, it is a shame to bring them out here to die." Then he told Aunt Toddy, who was sitting at his table how other beautiful children had gone up the Congo River with their parents never to return. But although the tears came to mamma's eyes, she says I belong to Jesus, and she cannot take me anywhere for his sake where I shall not be safe in his arms.

After staying one night at Matadi, we left at 6:30 the next morning for another far away place called Kinshassa. And now for the first time since we left America we traveled by train. Such queer little cars I never saw. The seats had very small tables between them, and Aunt Mae held me while I sat on a table and looked out of the window. Uncle William's (Mr. Haas) hat blew off, and they stopped the train and went out to get it. At one of the stations they left some papers and they stopped the train and waited while a man brought them. We had only 200 miles to travel by train but it took us two whole days. We did not travel at night, but the train stopped on top of a mountain where there was a town with a fine hotel in it. Aunt Mae said it was the finest building she had been in since she left Dayton, Ohio. It seemed nice to be able to sleep without our mosquito nets, as we do not expect to be able to do so again. The next day we arrived at Kinshassa, we expected to cross the Congo River that night, but the boat had gone so we had to stay at the hotel in Kinshassa until Monday. Mamma is going to write you herself how wonderfully the dear Lord opened up the way for us to go on.

While we were in the hotel in Kinshassa mamma and I were accidentally locked in a little room. Mamma said, "Marguerite, let us kneel down and pray that Jesus will send some one to unlock the door." So we knelt down, and I am sure in all my little life I never wanted anyone so badly—I said, "Dear Lord Jesus," but mamma had to say the rest. When we got up, I said, "Mamma, pound," and mamma pounded and called. Aunt Mae was looking for us and she heard mamma call and came and unlocked the door. I shall always remember how Jesus answered my little player, and mamma says I must always remember when I pray to ask Jesus if he has anything for me to do. Mamma says you at home must pray and we out here must pray and pound, and some day here in the French Congo, Satan will be defeated.

I asked you in one of my other letters to pray for me that I might control my naughty temper. Jesus does help me to be a better girl, and he has given me not only Daddy and Mamma, but Aunt Mae and Aunt "Toddy" too, to help me to be good. Some day I shall be more worthy to be called

YOUR LITTLE MISSIONARY.

Garwin, Iowa

As this is a very busy time in this part of the state it is very easy to neglect writing for publication. After spring came and the roads returned to a normal state our attendance regained normal. And has been good since, except when the weather interfered. The Sisters' Society presented the church with a fine Service Flag. Five stars are thereon and two more to be added. An Easter program was prepared and given before a large audience. We went over expectations and raised more than our portion for Forign Missions. While I do not say that many gave until they felt it, in the light of past events this is the best response and the largest offering ever given here for missions. It is an increase of eleven hundred per cent over the offering for the same cause a year ago. Those who are acquainted with this field know that there are conditions here that are different from many of the fields. For example the majority of the members have little knowledge of the history and fundamentals of the Brethren church at large. Thus a course of education is necessary. Growth may not be so slow but the long distance necessary to be traveled may make it appear so.

A Mother's Day program was given, and the large audience that packed the house pronounced it the best they had ever heard.

Three farewell receptions have been given for the boys who have left for the service. Special services are being prepared for Decoration Day. A committee is now at work preparing a Children's Day program for next month.

Plans as yet have not been completed for our meeting this fall, but we hope to have them completed in the near future. We desire the interest of the brotherhood at large in the work here. We are not striving to make any advance that cannot be held, we have so far held all the trenches captured. We have reached a number of the goals of the Four-Year Program and still have some to reach.

FREEMAN ANKRUM.

Kittaning, Pennsylvania

We just closed our meeting at Brush Valley. This is a country church about ten miles from Kittaning. We started in here on the first day of May. We had large congregations from the beginning. We intended to hold but two weeks but the interest was so great that we ran four nights more.

Again and again the house would not hold the people. Several nights there were almost as many outside as inside the church.

Interest continued to increase until the last night of the first week we had the first confession. The end of the second week we had 25. Ten came the night we were to close. Almost unanimously they voted I should stay on. We stayed for four more nights, two confessions the last night. We had 29 confessions altogether. We closed Saturday night, May 18, with an overflow house. Possibly 100 could not enter.

Twenty-five of those who newly confessed were seated together, and arose and sang "Nearer My God to Thee." This was a beautiful and touching scene.

It would have been better for us to have continued another week but the summer is so rapidly approaching that we felt it was necessary to open up at once in Kittaning.

We have preached here two nights. Sunday night it was as hot as in July. This cut the first night's congregation almost in half. Last night a great thunderstorm came up just before church time. Hence I preached to one-fourth of a congregation. Tonight we have a funeral of a popular young man within a few doors of the church ,and Brother Smith and I are to conduct the services. Hence we lose a half week in getting started here.

We expected to hold this meeting first, but a smallpox scare hindered. Now the hot weather is here. This is a prospective field. whether we will be able to reap much of a harvest or not may depend upon weather conditions.

We will give a full report when this meeting closes.

Doings at Dayton

In our last communication to the Brethren Evangelist readers, we forecasted a drive to be made by the First Brethren church of Dayton, for Anniversary Day of dedication to be observed. Since the new church was dedicated six years ago on May 12th, and as Sunday fell on May 12th, this year, it seemed very fitting to observe Anniversary Day on the Twelfth, and "Woman's Day" was set forward to the Nineteenth instead.

In the preparation for its observance a men's get-together service was slated and enjoyed on Friday evening the 10th, in which a hundred or more participated, and the women of the chruch served fine refreshments. Outside speakers made the occasion very helpful and inspiring, among whom were: Rev. J. B. Lambert and Rev. Alva J. McClain, Attorney Pearl N. Sigler, President of Montgomery County Dry Federation, and Mr. C. C. Palmer of Dayton. The special drive was anticipated by the speakers and other vital topics discussed, particularly the saloon issue, which is again before Ohio for 1918, to the profit of all present.

As mentioned in advance, the services of our esteemed brother, Elder Wm. H. Beachler, of Ashland, were secured to assist us on Anniversary Day. He preached for us morning and evening very acceptably and made us feel like doing things worth while. Having assisted us several years since on a similar occasion we knew what to expect. Since he is becoming known as a prince among the Brethren as a money getter for important interests, we felt sure he could help us "Go Over the Top." The goal was set at $4,000 for the day, but a drive for $5,000 was rushed instead, and would have been realized except for the unfavorable weather which prevented many from being presnt, yet $4,750 came in view, and the $5,000 was reached till "Woman's Day." Thank you, Brother Beachler, come again!

The following Tuesday evening our semi-annual communion was celebrated, and we quote from our Sunday church calendar of the 19th. "One of the largest attended communion services ever held in the First Brethren church was conducted last Tuesday evening. If six more had been present we would not have had room to accommodate them. Larger provision will have to be made in the future and the balcony utilized to furnish ample space. It was a disappointment and regretted that Brother Beachler could not remain over the communion season as we had planned. Brother A. J. McClain and local officers of the church assisted Pastor Bell in the conduct of the services which were enjoyed by all present, and declared to be the "best ever held!"

On Wednesday evening, May 15th, a specially called congregational business meeting was held. As Pastor Bell had placed his resignation into hands of the Advisory Board about the first of the year to be considered as final or for leave of absence for a year, the matter was taken up for disposition. The church would not consider the final resignation of Brother Bell, and was sorry to lose his services for a time, but in view of the urgent need of a change for him and his family for awhile, his request for a year's leave of absense was granted. When his wishes were made known to the Advisory Board they appointed a pastoral committee to secure a supply during his absence. This committee was called to report their findings, and reported that fortunately they had secured the consent of Elder E. M. Cobb of Los Angeles, California to act as supply pastor. The report was accepted and passed the house with no opposing vote and Brother Cobb was called.

Pastor Bell and his family will leave early in September for Long Beach, California, to take charge of Brother L. S. Bauman's work while he is in the East conducting revival work. The church also at their meeting invited Brother Bauman to hold a revival for us this fall, which he had consented to do in view of the situation.

On Sunday morning, May 19th, Woman's Day was very fitly observed and the women of the church conducted the program. Miss Mary Maud Billman of Ashland College gave a very helpful address to an appreciative audience! An offering was lifted for the College and some $22.00 was received. During the services of the day four were received into church fellowship by letter, relation and consecration. Since our last report some twelve or fifteen have been received in the church by baptism, consecration or relation. Pastor Bell is a great evangelistic pastor and we regret to be necessitated to give him leave of absence for a year, but trust he may return after his vacation more invigorated and the family in better health for future years of service amongst us, though we believe our supply pastor will serve us very acceptably during his absence.

Elder W. C. Teeter of our congregation is acting pastor of the First Brethren church at Camden, Ohio, for the summer, and reports the work holding up well for a new congregation, with 83 at Sunday school, May 5th, just one year from the time of its organization, and that all stay for church services which is very unusual in many places. We solicit the prayers of the Brethren everywhere for our work at Dayton and Camden, and assure you of our mutual obligation to the whole Brotherhood.

Ashland, Ohio

On April 21 our Sunday school lesson was the beautiful story of the transfiguration, one of the marvelous scenes in the life of Jesus, when he took Peter, and James, and John up into the mountain to meet two of the saints that had gone before.

What an inspiring gathering that must have been on the mountain top, away from the noise and bustle and hustle of the world with its folly and wickedness communing with the heavenly guests. No wonder Peter wanted to stay there, for it was indeed a very good place to be. And I have wondered since how many professing Christians ever climb as Jesus did to the top of the mountain for quiet communion with the heavenly Father and the saints that have gone before.

Just recently I read in Evangelist No. 8, page 3, the article by Brother Bell in which he reminds us of the place of prayer and the rebuilding of family altars, advising pastors to make the prayer service the best and most inspiring service of the church. Verily they need such advice. Show me a praying church and I will show you a growing church, a church alive for the kingdom. A church without a prayer meeting seems to me like one without a pulse. It has been said that the prayer meeting is the pulse of the church. At any rate it is the place where we enjoy the mountain top experiences of communion with the Father.

While it is true, we can have these mountain top experiences in our homes, in our closets, alone with none but God, yet we should not be selfish in this matter. Let us invite Peter, James, and John to accompany us. Those who are interested in Christ and his work are the ones that will be there, and that is the place to get power and strength for the work God has for us to do in the world. If we could get church members sufficiently interested to seek the mountain top of prayer, the picture shows would get less of our money and our missions more. The prayer meetings would be crowded while places of foolish amusements would go begging. If we could get people interested to attend that inner prayer circle, we would be more ambitious to get our children into the Master's service rather than push them into worldly fame. We talk about the children of Israel being slow in traveling to the promised land, but let us look at ourselves for a moment and see what we are doing.

We have a splendid S. S. C. E. at Ashland. Our devotional meetings the first Sunday of each month are well attended and very interesting. At our May meetings we had talks by Mrs. J. A. Garber, Mrs. J. Allen Miller, and Mrs. Slotter, a song by Miss Kanaurer, a reading by Ruth Lichty, and a splendid talk by Rev. A. D. Gnagey. These also are mountain meetings and much enjoyed by all. Let us keep close to the Master.

ELLEN GNAGEY LICHTY.

CAMPAIGN NOTES

We were at Listie from Tuesday night to Saturday night and preached each evening to nice audiences. Brother H. S. Myers of Scottdale is now serving this congregation as pastor. It was not possible for Brother Myers to be present during our canvass at Listie. I am sorry, as I would have been glad to have become better acquainted with him.

All things considered, the results of our work at Listie were satisfactory. There are a number of people in the Listie church who have given considerable assistance to the College in years past by way of Temporary Endowment. And I found most of these folks ready to help in the cause of Permanent Endowment. The Listie congregation is not large, and their membership is badly scattered. Besides, they have their own local obligations, which are particularly heavy at this time owing to certain improvements which must be made in their church property. Hence the $400 which Listie gave was good when all things are considered. And I am glad to say further that there are two young men in the Listie congregation who are thinking seriously of entering Ashland College to prepare for the ministry.

Brother Clarence Larmon aided me greatly with his Ford in getting over the congregation. And in his home, and the home of his parents, Brother John Larmon and wife, and the Mostoller home and in other homes I was afforded genuine Christian hospitality.

From Listie I came to the First church in Johnstown and preached one Sunday morning, May 19th. The report of my canvass of this congregation will necessarily be brief, because I did not make a canvass here. A committee of the laymen of the church executed the canvass before I arrived on the scene: And when the results of the canvass were placed in my hands at the close of the Sunday morning sermon it came as a complete surprise. The results were $3,000 in notes, Liberty Bonds and cash. However this result may be reguarded by the brotherhood and the other churches of Pennsylvania, whether good, very good or medium, the Campaign Secretary is in no way responsible for it and is therefore entitled to no mention in the matter. I think I might say, however, that the committee of laymen who made the canvass are satisfied with the result, in view of two considerations, first that in time past much money has flowed from this congregation into Ashland College; and second, in the comparatively near future this congregation will erect a new edifice.

Now then, it is the judgment of the Campaign Secretary that no other committee of laymen in the brotherhood could have done a finer piece of work than this——without the aid of the Campaign Secretary. But naturally the Secretary laments that he did not have his finger in the pie too. Because he is conceited enough to believe (pardon his conceit) that if he had helped in the canvass, the Johnstown pie would have been bigger around, deeper, and more juicy. But I have a lingering suspicion that Myersdale is glad that the Secretary had no part in making this pie; for now I suspect Myersdale will feel that her place at the head of the list of Pennsylvania churches is assured. And I may confess that I have about come to share the same notion with Myersdale. However, I shall remember a remark which a member of the Johnstown committe whispered in my ear—said he, when you come to the close of the Pennsylvania campaign and you need more money, maybe Johnstown can hit this harder. That sounds good. And now listen—All of you churches yet to be canvassed don't get it into your heads that because Johnstown could do this splendid piece of work you can too. Maybe you can and maybe you can't. At all events you will find that I will prove of real help to your churches in determining your part of this $100,000 and I believe I can help you a lot, too, in working the canvass. See?

In this part of the report I have not mentioned the name of the pastor, Brother J. F. Watson. You might think he had no part in this just because the laymen of the church did it. And yet I know he did have a part. In looking through the notes I saw his name signed to one which was very substantial for a preacher to give. And I also know he helped in other ways because he is a former student of Ashland College and in hearty accord and sympathy with the Institution.

Just briefly, the other day I went to see Juniata College at Huntingdon. It was a privilege I long had coveted. We were shown extreme courtesy on every hand. It was Alumni Day, and the special feature of the day was the launching of what is called "The James Quinter Memorial Foundation." The aim is to raise in a very few months $100,000 Permanent Endowment in addition to what the school already has, in honor of James Quinter. Governor Brumbaugh was present and made the main address of the afternoon. There were present from 250 to 300 pople—many of them former students of Juniata. The striking thing about it all was to see $22,000 was raised in about 25 minutes to start the campaign. The Governor set the pace at $1,000. (I wish we had a couple of governors in our church). The present student body of Juniata gave $1,200 and they are going on up to $2,000. And there were several more $1,000 gifts.

The lessons I brought away with me were at least two—First, our old mother church can teach us some valuable lessons on how to make right and proper use of the sentimental in our nature; and second, she can teach us a whole lot as to what it really means to dig down deep in our pockets to endow our Educational Institutions.

Buying Up the Opportunity

In St. Paul's very earnest letter to the Ephesians, 5:16, and also in his equally serious and thoughtful letter to the Colossians, 4:5, he uses the words at the head of this editorial. These are most portentious words when noted in their setting. For he immediately adds in Ephesians "For the days are evil." In Colossians the context is ,"Walk in wisdom toward them that are without." In both places the words are addressed to the "Saints." Let us note their import and apply them to our day and our tasks.

The authorized and the revised versions render the words, "Redeeming the time." This is quite right when we remember the words in their original meaning. First is the verb, to redeem or to buy. This comes from a root meaning to frequent the marketplace. The proposition with which the word is compounded is an intensive. I am saying all this just to be able to stress the real meaning of the word. It is,—"Buy up for yourself, for your own use." Now the words rendered time or opportunity is also worthy of special notice. It is not just time; it means the fit time. It has the idea of suitableness in it. It may be a fixed and definite period but with the aded idea of opportune, suitable. In the language of another the two passages have the same meaning and it seems to be;" "To make a wise and sacred use of every opportunity for doing good, so that zeal and well-doing are as it were the purchase-money by which we make the time our own." This is a characteristic of a Christian, namely, that he with wisdom, promptness and discerning zeal makes every opportunity his own, permits no fitting season to pass unused.

Apply this exhortation to the individual. Opportunity for service is constantly passing. The saddest words of tongue or pen yet remain, "It might have been." This is true in the daily affairs that pertain to this present age. It is far more true and insistent as it pertains to the spiritual life and work of the Christian. It is zeal as individual Christians that we lack most of all. Zeal for the Lord's work,—oh, that we had it! The greatest defects in the personal life of the average church member of our day is just here. We are often too much engrossed with the affairs of the present life. Our time and our money, our thought and our effort, sacrifice and laborious endeavor we freely give to gain a transitory and oft-times doubtful reward. We buy up every opportunity for material gain or a fleeting pleasure. Paul's word to us is far otherwise. He means that we should know what the "will of the Lord is" and spare no pains to meet its ends. And he adds that unless we do this, that at least as "Saints," we are foolish and lack the Spirit.

Jesus has a solemn word on the awfulness of the lost opportunity. He speaks of the supreme loss, that of life itself. I refer to Matt. 16:26 which is as follows: "For what shall a man be profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and forfeit his life? or what shall a man give in exchange for his life?" Read this also in Mark 8:37. Note the terrible words: "Forfeit his life!" The second member of the question really means, "What price will a man pay to buy back his life?" Have you wasted your opportunity for this life? What would you not pay to buy it back? Have you thrown away the gift of God for the world to come? What price would be too high to pay to buy it back? But both are impossible. Not long since I was deeply moved by the plea of a young man whom I met. He plead with the passion of youth and the fervor of an intense appeal, "I want another chance."

But the exhortation of St. Paul applies to the individual church. Again and again I have noted Brethren churches which had an open door before them. They failed to enter. Time, the fit time, passed. I have rarely seen opportunity return to any such congregation. Vacant houses of worship and a lost and discredited cause are the silent but convincing proofs of lost opportunities. Lack of leadership and lack of vision, weak and dim faith and a worldly spirit spell the death sentence of many a congregation's opportunity. Many times between a firm establishment in a community and total and shameful failure after a long death struggle there is only the matter of a single strong evangelistic service. An awakening along this line of a considerable number of our local churches is absolutely essential if they are to at all meet the requirements of our day and times. Many a struggling congregation could by a supreme effort of faith and consecrated life in a place of power and usefulness in the community. Brethren churches,—You must buy up for yourselves your opportunity.

But the words of the Apostle apply with especial fitness to the work of our church as a whole. We have a great Four-Year Program on. The program is really worth while and to any man who has an abiding interest in the work of the Brethren chuurch it seems to me it ought to appeal with persuasive eloquence. The program embraces just those elements which will give us a measure of success and without which we must be doomed to stagnation. There is no disgrace in being small as a body of Christions but it is an unpardonable disgrace to remain small and powerless as Christians. I want to commend the efforts of our committee in carrying forward this great program. Brethren, strike hard and often. The church must rally to your commands.

As a denomination I believe we have set before us a great open door to press the call, "Back to Christ." I covet for our churches everywhere the reputation of being thoroughly and loyally devoted to the Word of God. I believe our churches ought everywhere be the masterful champions of the New Testament doctrines and the New Testament type of the Spirit-filled Christians. We need a slogan. Our slogan must be a propaganda. Always and everywhere all of our churches should have the same watchword. I suggest we make it: For Christ and the Church, all he taught and wrought, the saintly life, the joy of service and the realization of all his promises."

I believe we can as a people become great in our ministry. I plead for a freedom from the conventional and the stereotyped in the ministry. I plead for the banishing from the minds of all the thought that the gospel ministry is a profession, however dignified. I protest that it is the means by which a man gains a livelihood for himself and his family. I insist that no man has a right to occupy the sacred office of the Christian minister as a matter of choice on his part. It is wholly a matter of the will of God ,the plan of God for a man's life. God has given to the ministry of the Brethren church an opportunity. Ours can be the greatest message ever delivered to any age. As we find and deliver the message our ministry will be great. Brethren of the ministry buy up the opportunity!

"The night is far spent and the day is at hand." "We must work the works of him that sent me, while it is day: the night cometh, when no man can work."

MILLER.

From the Editor's View-Point

Combing the State

This week marks an epoch in the state of Ohio that may or may not prove the mettle of which the state is made. When the order went out a year ago for all men between the ages of twenty-one and thirty-one to register for military service it was supposed that though many people preferred not to enter the service that most of the men of the specified age would register, and most of them did.

Occasionally a man of draft age was found who could not show a registration card during the past year and in some sections of the state some attention was paid to the "rounding up of slackers," but no really systematic effort was made to get the last man that may have failed to comply with the law of the nation in regard to his registration; but now a special effort is being made by the authorities and the whole state is to be carefully searched and with a sort of a "fine comb" system that is expected to reach every man of the state of draft age in an effort to discover any slackers that may remain. It is said that Ohio is the first state in the union to make such a systematic search and the success of the effort will be watched with interest by other states that may have a number of slackers among their own citizens.

While all of us should be interested in the aims of our government and in the attempts made to realize those aims and should lend what assistance we may be able at such times as this, yet to some this effort of the state and federal police to discover all slackers in the state offers a valuable suggestion as to how Christian forces might organize to leave no part or section of the state or people unevangelized.

There may be some who are not in favor of overmuch organization in the work of the church, and in some instances it seems the work has been over-organized but it has never been so effectively organized as to be able to reach every man in the state within a period of one week and to discover his standing in regard to his relation to God and Jesus Christ. The church can learn many things, if it will, from the plans and methods of the state or nation.

Human Vultures

The words of the sacred scriptures which declare, "where the carcass is there will the eagles be gathered together," are found to be true in every age of the world. When the present great war was brought home to the American people and it seemed impossible to longer remain out of it there were those that hoped that this would be one occasion when graft and greed should not be permitted to prey upon the American people because of war conditions, but all who had hoped such things seemingly must be disappointed for all such hopes for a patriotic response on the part of all men of big affairs have been blasted.

Earnest efforts have been made by the government to forestall all attempts on the part of "profiteers" to take undue advantage of the situation and to fatten their purses on the needs of the people, but these plans have met with only partial success, for quite frequently men are found who are not only attempting to profit unduly from their dealings with the people or the government, but in some instances these endeavors are made in a manner that may effect not only the health but the lives of the American men who are in training for service in the army that is going to France to help civilization's fight against the brutality of what has hitherto been known as the highest culture of the world.

In spite of the efforts made to furnish wholesome food to our men in training it has been reported on good authority that two of the five leading packing companies of the United States have been furnishing meat and chicken that have been pronounced "unfit for human consumption" to our armies.

These charges have been pretty well substantiated, but because no penalty is attached for the violation of that portion of the law which governs this case the charges have been dropped by the federal authorities.

The boycott may not be the best system of dealing in many cases, but it does seem that human vultures who will prey upon their fellow Americans in this manner should not be permitted to do business in the United States.

High Wages and Personal Industry

It has long been charged that the colored portion of the American people have a peculiar habit of doing only enough work to manage to keep body and soul together and that the average negro will not work more than three days out of a week if in that time he can earn enough to support himself in idleness the remainder of the week. While such a charge, if true, does not speak well for the habits of industry of our colored brethren, when you come to think about it is it not about the same principle that controls the man who attempts to make enough money by the time he is fifty years old to enable him to retire and cease all productive labor or business?

If a man has a mission in life that mission does not cease as soon as he reaches a point in his finances where he can live the balance of his days in idleness. If there is nothing more to be desired for himself or for his own comfort there are always other demands that are made upon the time and labor of any one who has any time he can devote to the welfare of others.

It has sometimes been claimed that many men become indolent and thriftless because they have so little opportunity to get ahead in the world, and that their earnings or wages are so low that they feel their condition is helpless and as a consequence they make no effort to better their station.

Some have asserted that one of the greatest inducements to cause a man to become industrious is to compensate him sufficiently to make his efforts to get ahead worth while, but it has been noticed that in a good many cases a sudden increase in wages or earnings has a very marked tendency to cause one to feel that the necessity for constant labor has been removed by this advance and as a result the earner of high wages does as little as he possibly can and yet draw his pay; and quite frequently he becomes like the colored brother who does not feel the necessity of working every day. Recently Theodore Roosevelt said, "If any man works three days at high wages and loafs the next three because of the high wages he has received during the first three, he is an enemy to America and an ally of the Kaiser."

The Normal Life

For many years health enthusiasts have been urging upon the people the necessity of living the normal life if they would be well and happy. It has been pointed out again and again that any abnormal living is sure to work harm in some manner and that sooner or later this condition will be manifested in the broken down physical and perhaps mental condition of the one who has insisted on living the abnormal life. "Back to nature" has been the cry of the physical culturist as "Back to Christ" has been the slogan of the religious restorationist, and from such advocates as the late Count Tolstoi and Pastor Wagner down to the simplest rustic that has sought to live close to mother earth the cry has been "Live the normal life." And why should this not be the best life that can be lived? Is man able to improve upon the laws of nature? He may direct the law of nature in a manner to improve the quality and quantity of some of nature's products, but nature itself is beyond his reach.

It is well known that many people have been living an abnormal life for so great a length of time that they would about as soon die at once as to be compelled to reduce their lives to normal channels. In speaking of our present day civilization a lady of prominence recently said, "Our civilization as it stands is built only for normal conditions." We take it that this statement was meant as a reflection on the efforts of those who have been responsible for the making our present civilization what it is.

We are compelled to admit that present conditions in the world demand just a little more than normal action upon the part of the best nations in the world, but because this is true in this once case does it indicate that our civilization has failed because it has been only normally developed? We think not, and so far as we can understand life the best civilization that can exist is that which is and can conform to and co-operate with normal conditions even though abnormal work must sometimes be done in order to restore the world again to a normal state.

A Systematic Drive for Goal Four

The writer has always considered the tasks falling under the Church Extension Department as the Herculean labors of the Four-Year Program; namely Goals IV, V and X. A year's exhaustive study of the situation has not minimized the magnitude of the situation at all. In fact, at this moment all other goals seem so sure of accomplishment at the present rate of effort that the result can be safely discounted. Therefore, I feel perfectly justified in calling to the whole church to concentrate its thought and prayer on the tasks involved in the righteous, spiritual, Christ-like objectives we have set for ourselves under the heading of these goals. As a matter of fact, the initiative, toil, planning, sacrifice, and adaptability demanded of the whole church by these three goals is at least equal to that required by all the other goals put together. The truth of this apparently radical statement will come to every one of us before we succeed in our purpose; and our success will be indefinitely postponed till that day that a large part of the church realizes its truth. Mind you these things cannot be attained by a few weeks' campaign ending in a day. On the contrary, they call for an unremitting program of toil, prayer, sacrifice and giving extending into the years.

To build one new church from the ground up requires toil and sacrifice with the sweating of blood for from ten to thirty years. Just look into the history of your own congregation and see. There is no royal road, no hocus-pocus, no strange and miraculous power in any man to do it quicker and easier.

We are saying these things not to discourage but simply to warn against any visionary calculations and to prepare the church for drastic and far reaching suggestions which we shall make as we go into this whole situation from this page in the months that intervene before the next general conference. Is it too much to ask that every pastor shall consider them prayerfully with his local leaders and that every district mission board as well as all the members of the General Missionary Board upon whom this burden also rests shall give them the closest attention possible? This battle is to be won only by unprecedented team work and a general policy of advance supported by all. Until we agree on methods and policy no real advance can be made. Final decisions will be made at the meeting of the General Missionary Board at Winona. All district board secretaries should be there or send representatives and come with an open mind to plan together for the extension of the Kingdom of His Grace. So much in general. Now for the specific work of Goal Four.

June to be Membership Month

As our annual statistics are gotten out soon after July 1st, we have set the month of June for membership month for the whole church. We urge all pastors to conform to our suggestions and make the membership list their chief thought and study for this month. The suggestions are gathered from the successful experience of the whole church and are workable plans. Others have made them work and so can you by thought, prayer and effort in the proper proportions.

Our plans to attain Goal IV fall under two heads: Conservation and Increase. By conservation we mean definite efforts to reclaim some of the dead wood in the membership lists and thus gain a part of the thirty thousand required by the standard. Increase refers to definite efforts for the year following in the nature of an incease campaign for new converts.

Conservation Plans

1. Cull from the list of church membership all doubtful members, arranging them into resident and non-resident lists. It is very convenient to have these lists as well as the regular church list in a vest pocket note book always with you as many of your best opportunities will come incidentally. This is the plan of many pastors. Successful pastors are generally thorough students of their membership lists as a merchant must be of his customers.

2. Resident members in this list should be looked up by classes and individuals and a systematic, prayerful effort be made to reclaim them to active service. This work can be directed without publicity by the pastors and officers. The pastor should visit them and have a few words of prayer if possible. The latter is too much neglected in pastoral visiting. If only a few words, standing, at departure it will do its work and bring a blessing and results that cannot be won by hours of persuasion. Don't forget the prayer. It is the peculiar and only wizardry that great soul winners among us use.

3. Non-resident members should be reached by correspondence at least once annually. The letter form is suggested and recommended to official boards for action after which the pastor may feel free to use it to the full. A method almost identical is used by several of our churches with great effect and has been for years. We hope it will have a wide use this year and by another year will be universal.

Suggested Letter Form

Dear Fellow-workers in Christ,—

The month of June has been adopted as membership month by our church for the purpose of checking up on the membership of the entire brotherhood. Accordingly, I am sending out this letter in common with my brother pastors. Read it carefully as the question involved is of vital importance to the progress of our beloved faith. The church ought to know with certain definiteness where you stand. It is only fair and right that we should not be in doubt regarding any of the names on our church books.

As a general guide we are enclosing the following:

STANDARD OF MEMBERSHIP FOR BRETHREN CHURCHES

1. It is expected of the members of the Brethren Church that they shall live a consistent Christian life.

2. Members of the Brethren Church are expected to attend the communion services of their church unless prevented by sickness or unavoidable circumstances.

3. Members of the Brethren church living within reach of their church are expected to attend the public services of the church with some regularity unless prevented by a legitimate reason.

4. Members of the Brethren church living within reach of their home congregation and so unable to attend the regular services of the church or its communion services are expected to make some financial contribution to the church at least once a year, and to write the pastor annually at the time of this notice, of their desire to be continued as members of the church. Others must be counted as uncertain after July 1st, and so reported to the official board of the local church for whatever action seems best. Those who are not able to contribute and will so inform the pastor will be continued on their simple request.

5. At least one dollar a year should be contributed by every member, as the local congregation is assessed more than this amount by the various general agencies of the church and delinquent members become a liability to the active members of the congregation.

All members, whether local or isolated, who do not measure up to the above standard must be considered uncertain in standing and subject to definite action of the official board without further notice. Kindly let me hear from you.

Fraternally your pastor,

Increase Plans

1. Every pastor should begin during this month a list of prospectives for the increase campaign of the ensuing year. Start with the lost members from the church list and put them down. Go over the church list in order and work out all the relationship of the members who may be available. Interested members will assist in this as the pastor goes about in his regular visiting. It will form a most vital topic of conversation with many a fruitful by-way. Take in, as you go, the immediate neighbors of all members. Catch the names of visitors at regular services. Keep a close watch on newcomers into the immediate neighborhood of the church or the members. Such are generally lonesome for acquaintance. Enlist the Home Department and Cradle Roll visitors, as these two agencies are very fruitful of results. By all and every means build up your list. Do not wait for the revival season. Do it now!

2. Make a map of your entire parish with roads and streets on which the names of the members are written or numbered and starred. Use a different mark for the location of the prospectives. Have this map large and in a prominent place where you and your people (workers) may see it often. It makes no difference how well you are acquainted with your field, this map will be a time saver and clear up the confusion of the unfinished task which is the bane of every pastor's life. Also it will serve as a reminder till the system becomes a habit.

3. Take up definite prayer for the prospectives every day by following either the map or your note book from page to page. Intercession must be the real leverage and results will be beyond belief. It is remarkable how many are trying to save souls without the leverage of constant, systematic intercession for individuals. If Goal IV is to be won at all it must be won by prayer.

4. Let the church plan its increase campaign at once. Either by personal evangelism, the use of a professional evangelist or neighboring pastor, pastoral evangelism, gospel teams, or a combination of all. Conditions differ from place to place and year to year. Whatever the method, ask God to fit you to win men.

Let us make June a great month of checking up on all things and if we do our part God will give the increase.

G. T. RONK, Extension Director.

A Memorial Day Sermon

BY MILES J. SNYDER

TEXT: "Their line is gone out through all the earth." PSALM 19:4

Memorial Day has come again with all its hallowed memories. It is a day devoted to the memory of those who in the hour of their country's need offered their lives on the altar of service for the preservation and perpetuation of our American institutions. And as we think of the day and what it should really mean to us our hearts beat faster and our heads are bowed in reverent gratitude and our souls are thrilled anew with a deeper love for the country of our birth.

The love of country is not only a natural sentiment in every true heart but it is also right in the sight of God. Go far back in the dawn of human history and we hear these words fall from the lips of one who was loyal both to God and to his native land: "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning; if I do not remember thee, let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth." And then later when we stand in the radiant presence of Jesus Christ we find that he too loved his native land. He loved his own nation above every other in the face of the earth. He came first to his own people, preached first to them, and wept when they would not attend to the things which would have made for their joy and peace and righteousness.

But, with each recurring Memorial Day we are reminded anew of the cost of patriotism. The day comes with a flood of memories and we recall again that they were purchased at the cost of blood and sacrifice. The memories that cluster around this day and its annual observance come to us as a priceless legacy stained with human blood and scarred with the conflict of battle.

Though comparatively young in years, it has been my lot to know something of the cost of which I speak. At the age of nineteen my own father responded to his country's call and entered the conflict and gave three years of his life before the issue was finally determined. And as one journeys through the southland and sees the national cemeteries, those silent cities of the dead, one after another, he realizes something of the price that was paid. This thought was strongly impressed upon my mind several years ago when I visited the national cemeteries at Chattanooga and Memphis, Tennessee and Vicksburg, Mississippi, where many thousands of brave soldiers and sailors found their last resting place. And a few years later this same thought was uppermost in my mind when on a number of occasions I spent many hours tramping over the battlefields of Antietam and Gettysburg and looking at the almost endless rows of white markers breaking the monotony of God's green sod stretching above the many thousands of patriotic dead buried there who made the supreme sacrifice that the union of these states might be preserved and that a government of the people by the people and for the people should not perish from the earth.

Bitter was the conflict known as the Civil War, or the War of the Rebellion, and the intervening years have been many and long but neither time nor events have availed to diminish the importance of that struggle nor to lessen the value of its results. Long ago the grass and flowers healed the scars that cannon-balls had made, but still the southern hillsides are billowy with our country's dead. Quite fittingly then is Memorial Day dedicated to the sacred memory of fallen heroes, and we do well to recall their struggle and to celebrate again their undying victory.

And today our chief joy is that this can be done by a united people. For over the mouths of cannons now marking the fields of battle from which once belched fire and death, the spider today silently and undisturbed weaves his web. The crimson swords once crossed by blood-brothers are now sheathed nevermore to be drawn from their scabbards; while tattered banners now hang as cherished tokens in the halls of fame. And this morning, whether living where the wild Atlantic frets against the rock-ribbed New England shores or amid the beauties of the Golden Gate, whether dwelling in the region of the Great Lakes or in sight of the cypress groves of the sunny south, one united chorus rises to heaven:

"My country, 'tis of thee,
Sweet land of liberty,
Of thee we sing.
Land where our fathers died,
Land of the Pilgrim's pride,
From every mountain side
Let freedom ring."

Great wars, like great mountains, need perspective. And now that fifty years have passed, we are far enough removed from the Civil War to understand something of its meaning and message. Slavery as an economic mistake and industrial sin has fastened itself like a cancer in the very vitals of southern life, while for a generation the people were drilled and steeped in the un-American doctrine of state's sovereignity. In the north national sovereignty was persistently emphasized while there was a growing tendency to coarseness and a dangerous drifting into materialism. With such conflicting and opposing fundamental differences, the war came on and was fought to a bitter end while the nation moved toward perfection through suffering. Looking back across the intervening years we clearly see how God and not man overruled the events and outcome of that conflict.

The first and most direct result of the Civil War was the burning away by the battle-fires of all barriers between the north and the south so that henceforth there should be one nation united and undivisible. You would better appreciate how effectively this was done if you could have attended, as I did, the fiftieth anniversary of the battle of Gettysburg, when in July 1913 the veterans of the conflicting armies met in a great reunion on that memorable battlefield. There once more, from all over the nation, the Blue and the Gray came together, not as enemies this time but as true friends under the same glorious flag. And joyous was that reunion and most touching were some of the incidents there showing the honor and respect and love of the men for each other. And now in the south you will find the same fidelity to the republic that you will find in the north, and Chicago and New York have no monopoly on patriotism and love of country above that of New Orleans and Atlanta.

But the greatest and most far-reaching result growing out of the war in which these battle-scarred veterans participated was the focusing of the thought and attention of the old world monarchies upon the American republic. Seldom considered in any respectful or prominent way before the Civil War, suddenly that war caught and held the attention of foreign governments. They began at once to compete for our favor, and students of government came from foreign capitals to study our institutions. In letters of living fire God wrote across the sky the lessons of this young republic so large that people beyond the seas began to read our message of freedom and justice and liberty.

In a very true sense it was that war under the providence of God that put this republic on the map of the world. And out of the smoke of that conflict came two of the world's six greatest generals. It gave us three of our country's greatest inspirational orators. And from it emerged one of earth's greatest statesmen—Abaham Lincoln. If some historian were to call the roll of those whose names give distinction to the pages of our history you would find many belonging to that period which culminated with the great Rebellion.

Well may you rejoice then this morning that you were privileged to have a part in that historical event. Important therefore are these national anniversaries which recall the past and give continuity to our country's history. They enable us to touch hands with heroes gone by and inspire us for the tasks of our day. And as we seek in our Memorial Day services to show our appreciation of what you have done, and place on the graves of your fallen comrades wreaths of flowers symbolizing the living fragrance of their sacred memory, listening hope faintly hears their footsteps yonder and love is stirred by the rustle of their presence; for men and women faithful to the call of duty are never forgotten, and we gladly celebrate their valor, their loyalty, their devotion to a righteous cause.

Turning from the past and looking at the present and into the future, it can truthfully be said in the words of the text: "Their line is gone through all the earth." Time was when we were an isolated people, when our nation exerted little if any influence upon the affairs of the world. But long ago the seeds of democracy as opposed to aggressive autocracy were planted in this virgin soil. And through the one hundred and forty years of our national history each succeeding generation has contributed its part, whether in war or peace, in nurturing, developing and strengthening this new government, until it has recently stepped to the forefront among all the nations of the earth; and today there is no man in all the world whose every utterance is listened to with such breathless concern and who is so universally respected and admired as the beloved, God-fearing President of this republic, Woodrow Wilson.

It therefore becomes the sacred obligation of the American people today to take the great institutions of our government which our fathers in the providence of God created and hand them on both to the coming generation and to the whole world not only unimpaired but enlarged and enriched. Heretofore they have largely been our own cherished possesisons but now old world barriers are breakiny away and "their line is gone out through all the earth."

The ideals for which the people of this nation in the past have lived and fought and died, and which have made it supremely great in the parliament of the world, may be broadly described as three:

First is the ideal of freedom. For this our forefathers crossed the pathless seas and endured the rigors and hardships of a new world-freedom for the individual, freedom for the individual government.

The second ideal may be expressed by the word equality—equality of all men before a uniform law, the full enjoyment of the inherents rights of every man.

The third might be called national altruism. It means forbearance toward others, and a desire for the good of others. Our freedom, our equality, our liberty, our institutions, are not for our own selfish purposes but to gladly and generously share wtih all mankind.

It was for these three major ideals that the American people heroically contended in the past, and they are still uppermost in the hearts and minds of the people amid all the din and confusion of the present world war in which we are now engaged. We entered this war for no selfish purposes, prompted by no unworthy motives. Over and over again the reasons for our being in this conflict have been clearly stated. Without hate or pride or wrongdoing we are engaged in it and it is the united purpose of the nation to battle with patience and tenacity and unswerving devotion for justice and righteousness and humanity's good. And this same glorious flag, in which are blended the fadeless colors of the light of heaven and the lifeblood of humanity and the purity of the overarching sky, is again leading the way, and we believe and confidently hope that it is once more the way to victory.

But this morning I would not close without referring to a still more important thing, for I am thinking of another warfare than that which makes sacred to us this Memorial Day, more important even than that in which the nations of the world are now engaged. As we scatter flowers upon the graves which make billowy the cemeteries of our land, I would have you think of another battlefield than the one upon which our fathers bled and died. I would have you think of the Christian warfare; I would have you contend earnestly and faithfully on the battlefields of life; I would have you think not of fading flowers upon earthly graves but of a blessed immortality beyond the skies.

You have fought a good fight, but have you kept the faith? You have been good soldiers of your country, but are you true soldiers of the Cross? You were obedient to your commanders, but have you responded to the call of the Captain of your salvation?

True patriotism is that love of country which translates itself into terms of service and consists in the faithful performance of duty whatever that duty may be. And no one has done well his full duty and performed his highest obligation, to himself and to his country, who has not answered the call of the Christian life. The highest type of patrioitsm is that which seeks to get one's country in right relation to Almighty God. For it is righteousness that exaleth a nation; it is a sin that is a reproach to any people.

What is the matter with Germany? What has caused the devastation of western Europe, and all the suffering and sorrows and atrocities of which we have read and heard? Why, a nation has forgotten God and rebelled against his commandments. Long ago Martin Luther and the Protestant Reformation gave the Bible to Germany and through it she became a mighty nation. But for the last fifty years she has been tearing the Bible to pieces with her destructive "higher criticism" and has substituted for it a false, godless philosophy of her own making. The result is that she has reared a generation of atheists, agnostics, infidels, and unbelievers, who scoff and sneer at the Bible, the supernatural, the deity of Christ, his atonement, resurrection and church. And their present day religion is the heartless doctrine of the survival of the fittest and its resultant dictum that might makes right.

But Germany in all her ruthlessness is no miracle among the nations. Any other people may become as heartless and cruel and godless as that country is today. Germany now is only a frightful exhibition of what any nation will come to that forgets God and throws away the Bible. And with such an outlaw abroad in the world today the future looks dark enough, but there is one bright ray of hope; and we have the confident assurance that there is one power, but only one that will bring order and happiness and peace out of the present world chaos, and that power is not money, not men, not munitions, not ships, not food, but it is the unadulterated Christian religion. As Henry Watterson has recently said, "Even democracy is a side issue. The paramount issue confronting the world is the regilion of Christ and him crucified. That is the bedrock of all enduring civilization, the source and resource of all that is worth having in the world that now is and that gives any promise in the world to come. The gospel of Jesus Christ, delivered by the Man of Galilee upon the hillsides of Judea, sanctified by the cross of Calvary, must save the nations of the world, and the individuals in the nations, or they will not be saved at all."

May we then so live through all the days of our lives, and manifest that true patriotism in the performance of every duty that when the great roll is called and taps sound for the last time we shall be able to say with St. Paul, that faithful battle-scarred hero of the long ago, "I have fought the good fight, I have finished the course, I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give to me at that day; and not to me only, but also to all them that have loved his apeparing."

The Deacon's Tenth

MARY S. CHAPMAN

Ye see, the elder had preached a most powerful sermon on Christian givin', in which he took what I called purty strong ground. Among other things, he said we'd ought to do as much for our religion as the old Jews did for theirs, an' while it was all right to lay up for a rainy day, an' to get ahead if we honestly could, we should set apart at least one-tenth of our income as the Lord's money.

"Now, I think the elder went a leetle too far," says I to my wife, Huldy, as we was drivin' home from meetin'. "Givin' is well enough, but I get a'most tired a hearing these ministers forever a dingin' about it."

"Waal, Lyman," says Huldy, "why don't you try givin' a tenth —try it for one year anyhow.' '

"My!" says I, "as if I didn't give more'n that now; it's two shillin's, an' fifty cents, every time I turn around, to say nothin' o' the contributions to big objects. If I get home with a dollar in my pocket I think I'm a lucky fellow."

"Then, I'm sure," says Huldy, with that queer little smile o' hern that she sometimes has, "it'll be a real savin' to ye to go into systematically a givin' yer tenth."

Now, I hadn't any idee of doin' it, an' keepin' a reckonin' of what I contribute—in fact, I thought that verse about lettin' yer right hand know what yer left was a doin' was rather ag'in it, but somehow Huldy has a cool way o' takin' things for granted, an' though the mildest of all women, she ginerally manages to carry her p'int.

Next mornin' I see her a makin' a book out o' some sheets o' paper, an' rulin' 'em off and stitchin' on to 'em a pasteboard kiver an' on the outside she writ in big letters that was as plain to read as printin', "The Lord's Money." This she handed to me an' said nothin'.

That very week I got pay for my wheat; it was an uncommon good crop; it come to six hundred dollars. I was a settin' by the fire a countin' it up with some satisfaction, when Hudly jest stuck under my nose that book, "The Lord's Money."

"What's that for, Huldy?" says I.

"Why, for the tenth," says she.

"Bless my soul!" says I, a wrigglin' an' twistin', "that would be sixty dollars; I can't stan' that."

She didn't say anything, but set a watchin' me, and I knew it warn't no use a dodgin' her, so I took six ten-dollar bills, all crisp an' new, an' laid 'em in a pile.

"Yis, yis," says I, tryin' to screw my face into a smile, an' to act as if I'd been a calkerlatin' all the way through to give 'em.

Ye see there was an awful sight o' old Adam in me. I jest set there a begredgin' that money. I most wished the wheat had'nt come to so much. Then I happened to remember what the elder had said in his sermon—that it would be a mighty hard wrench on us at first to give a tenth—that when the fingers had got crooked up a graspin' this world's goods 'twas hard to get 'em straightened out, but that when we'd become used to this way o' givin', we'd enjoy it an' be blessed in it as much as in prayin' an' readin' the Scripters. A thinkin' on that sermon, I made up my mind I'd double my subscription for the elder's support, an' that would just take the sixty dollars.

As I harvested my crops an' sold 'em, I was astonished to see how the Lord's pile grew, an' I had to think it over middlin' sharp to know where to invest it so 'twould do most good, an' I was gettin' over the wrench a little until my interest became due. The year before old Uncle Nat had died, an' most onexpectedly had left me five thousand dollars. If the legacy had dropped down from the skies I couldn't have been more surprised. Now I had three hundred a comin' in from it, and it most killed me to take thirty on't an' put it aside for the Lord. I couldn't help whinin'.

"Now, Huldy," says I, "don't ye believe the old Jews deducted their taxes afore they laid by their tenth?"

"I dunno," says she; "we hight read up Leviticus an' Numbers an' Deuteronomy an' see."

"Bless my soul, Huldy," says I, "I'd ruther pay the whole thirty dollars then wade through all them dull books. An' then," says I, a thinkin' hard, "accordin' to what these agents that come around beggin' say, I s'pose it would be a good pecooniary speckerlation to give to the Lord. They tell about throwin' out crackers an' comin' back loaves, an' show how them is blessed in their basket an' in their store that bestow their goods on the poor. Anyhow, I've made up my mind to try it."

"Now, Lyman Tubbs, don'e ye go into this tenth business with no such worldly motives. If ye do ye'll be worse than Ananias and Sapphira, but who was struck dead at once. Not but that the Lord has said, 'I will never leave thee nor forsake thee', and 'Prove me now herewith,' but if ye undertake to drive a sharp bargain with Him, ye'll find out that He'll git ahead of ye every time. No' He's given us all we have, an' I'm thinkin' He'll ask us some mighty close questions about the way we've used it."

Huldy didn't very often preach, but when she did her sermons were what I call p'inted.

Times passed on, an' I got used to givin' my tenth. I didn't squirm over it as I had; in fact, I got kinder raised, an' to feelin' liberal. I didn't sell so much as a turkey without puttin' aside tithes of it.

It happened in the summer that my wife's cousin Silas an' his family came to see us, an' I was a braggin' about givin' my tenth, an' I supposed he'd never heerd o' such a thing; but Silas says, says he, "I've done it ever since I was converted. I airn two dollars a day, an' every Saturday night I jest lay aside one dollar and twenty cents, an' I pray over it; it's sacred; it's the Lord's money."

"Don't ye take yer livin' out o' it first?"

"Yer what?" says Silas, amazed. "It's jest so much I airn, an' the ability to earn it comes from the Lord, an' I joyfully give back to him the little part."

"But," says I, "ain't that kinder resky? Ye might be took sick, or yer work give out; I should be a little fearsome."

"These are the promises," says Silas; 'My God shall supply all your needs,' an' 'Lo I am with you.' These are all yea an' amen.

Waal, if I didn't feel small after that. I had simply given a tenth of all I'd sold an' grumbled over it at that, an' there were all those broad acres that had fed us, an' those big trees in the woods that had kept us warm—blessin's upon blessin's that I hadn't counted, an' here was Silas with nothin' but his hands, an' yet so willin' hearted an' doing so much. When I carried him an' his folks back to the city I jest filled my wagon box full o' things, an' felt as if I was givin' directly to the Lord.

One day the elder an' his family was over to our house, an' we was a talkin', His son Fred was a playin' with my Thomas—they was awful good friends—an' says the elder, "If I had as much money as you have, Deacon Tubbs' I'd send Thomas to school, an' ask the Lord to make a minister o' him."

"Bless my soul!" thought I, that's the last thing I want him to be." Ye see I had other things for my boy, but I said nothin'.

My next neighbor, old Mr. Hodges, had a son who went to the city an' studied law, an' got to be a judge, an' comes home in his big carriage once in a while to visit the old folks, his wife an' children dressed to fits, an' seein' them I had a natural hankerin' for Thomas to turn out like that. I was a sayin' this to Huldy when the elder's folks was gone.

"Now, Lyman Tubbs," says she, a lookin' at me with them great, earnest eyes o' hers, "would you really like to have our Thomas jest like old Mr. Hodges' son—a breaking the Sabbath, he an' his boys, a shootin' ducks an' a drinkin' an' a playin' cards? Be you a deacon an' a member of the church an' not feel as if 'twas bigger business to persuade men to forsake their sins an' to love the Lord Jesus Christ?"

Ever since Silas was here my mind has been dreadfully took up with somethin' he was a tellin' me. He said some good Christian men had hired rooms in the worst part o' the city an' made them bright an' attractive, an' was a singin' hymns an' a preachin' to the folks, all without money an' without price, an' some sech work as this is what I'd been a wishin' my boy could do, an' jest then Thomas came in an' stood beside his mother. He had the same hair as hers an' the same brown eyes, an' somethin' told me that if he took to preachin' he'd be one of the convincin' sort, for I must say that nobody's words ever took hold of an old sinner like me as Huldy's does.

Well, my tenth money grew; half the time I didn't know what to do with it. I was over to the elder's one day an' he was a tellin' me of a school near by which he thought would be a good place to send our Thomas—he'd noticed how crazy the boy was for books an' learnin', an' the minister said he'd a cousin a livin' jest out o' the village that would take good care o' Thomas, an' board him, an' he'd be under good Christian influence.

"What do you say, Huldy?" says I, as soon as I'd got home.

"I'd like him to go," says she," an' for the elder's boy to go with him."

Sure enough he should, an' that would be a use for the rest o' my tenth, an' Thomas an' Fred was awful good friends; they was like David an' Jonathan, an' what do you think, there was a big revival that, jest like a big wave, struck that school, an' in fact the whole community, an' both the boys was converted, an' you can't think how I felt, so glad about it, an' kinder streaked, too, for I knew it warn't none o' my doin; I'd been sech a poor, good-for-nothin' Christian all my life, it was enough to set my Thomas again' the Lord.

We got the good news on Saturday mornin' and' in the afternoon was the covenant meetin'. It was jest about a year from the time that Huldy handed me the "Lord's Money" book. I remember how I got up in the meetin' then and talked, not because I'd anything to say, but bein' deacon, I felt as if I ought to, an' told the brethren I hadn't made no progress, an' all that—jest what I commonly said. How could I talk that way now when I'd had a year o' sech oncommon blessin', an' with Huldy besides me a cryin' for joy because our Thomas had been converted. No, I couldn't keep from breakin' down, an' thankin' the Lord for His goodness to me an' mine, an' I knew that givin' my tenth, though it had come so begredgin'ly, had been a help to me. I warn't sech a small, waspish critter as I was afore.

The next year I was man enough to divide my tenth with Huldy, an' sech good times as we had investin' it. Now, Huldy was great on what we call the "Inasmuch charities"—"Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one o' the least o' these," etc. She was always a findin' some bedridden old woman to help, or crippled child, or some other case o' need, while I couldn't hardly sleep o' nights a thinkin' o' the great West, with the foreigners a comin' into it, an' of the poor freedmen of the South, or of the great heathen world that so needs the gospel. We spent hours an' hours a talkin' it over, an' as we did so we'd get nearer to each other, an' I trust nearer the Lord.

It's now been a good many years that we've been a tryin' this tenth business, an' I wouldn't go back to the old helter-skelter way o' givin' for anythin'.

Huldy has jest been to the city to see the children, an' she came home with her face all aglow. Our Thomas an' the minister's Fred, who married our Mary, have gone into business together, an' are doin' first rate; but that isn't the best of it; they've started a mission in the wickedest part o' the city, and Huldy said it did her old soul good to hear those young voices a tellin' them poor, ignorant ones of the love of Jesus' an' to see 'em listenin' an' a comin' into the kingdom.

As I'm closin' I've got this much to tell you: if you want to be a happy Christian you must let your prayin' and praisin' an' givin' go together, an' I will say that Huldy never did a better thing for me than when she gave me "The Lord's Money" book.—Selected.

The Sunday School

World Wide Sunday School News

Wayside Sunday Schools in Korea

Hundreds of Sunday schools in Korea have started in the following manner:

A missionary well supplied with brightly colored pictures or text cards goes to some village and sits under some tree or by the side of the road. Very soon one child and another gather in front of him to examine him and hear what he has to say. The missionary says a few words and perhaps sings a verse or two of "Jesus Loves Me" and gives each of the children a card and tells them to come again next Sunday and bring others. Next Sunday he comes to the same place and the children are there to meet him. A few will perhaps spell out with him a verse or a text. Some Sundays later the children will look for his coming and the class will take on regular proportions, and quite a number will join shyly in the singing. It may be that a child or friendly neighbor will offer his house, yard or room and from that time more or less regular work may be begun. Some "Schools" we have seen have met Sunday after Sunday through a long bitter winter under a tree by the roadside, but the good done was not measured. Since these schools started only a few years ago thousands and thousands of children have been reached. Just the other day a Korean said, "It is curious that when I used to go to such and such a village the children sang all sorts of heathen songs, but now I only hear "Jesus Loves Me."

First the children, then the home and then the church. This is the story in thousands of cases in the Orient. Such work is part of the rising tide of Sunday school interest as promoted by the World's Sunday School Association.

Flashlights in a Year's Progress

Sunday school progress of world wide scope was reported at the recently held Executive Committee meeting of the World's Sunday School Association, which met at the home of the Chairman, Mr. H. J. Heinz of Pittsburgh. From Rev. George P. Howard, South American secretary, comes such heartening items as an evangelistic campaign in Chile. Under his effective leadership 657 adults decided the all important question of personal relationship to God. In one school 90 of the adolescent age came up and made ther choice for Christ and His Kingdom. In Buenos Aires Howard prepared for and presided over the first Father and Son banquet ever held in South America. There were more than 100 fathers and 100 sons present. Howard's report closed with this ringing message, "If we can capture the children of these lands for Christ, if we can train their boys in the virtues of the Christian gentleman if we can teach the sweet voiced daughters the songs of the Christian home, these republics will feel the mighty influenc of Christianity and you will behold the genius of a mighty race awakening from its sleep of centuries."

Bishop Hartzell, for the Moslem Lands, told of the administration of Relief Funds under the direction of Secretary Stephen Trowbridge, who has temporarily left his important work in Egypt for this special need in Palestine. More than $50,000 is being expended each month among those who live in the land of Jesus' birth. Money sent to Persia for Sunday school work has been well used in conducting Refugee Sunday schools and in publishing a catechism in Turkish for the combined use of the East and West Persia Mission. Dr. S. M. Zwemer has just made a trip in the interest of Moslem work to Malaysia and China. He states that the Moslems in China are more open to Christian approach than in any of the Mohammedan fields. Suitable literature is being prepared in Arabic-Chinese for use in China.

In the Philippine Islands there is no indication that the growth of recent years is lessening. The increase is from 8,000 in 1911, to 60,000. Organized adult Bible classes are making good. Such a class among the university students in Manila had a membership of twenty. They decided to get real busy and increase that membership to 1000, and called themselves "We Brothers of 99." As will be shown in a moving picture film during the Sunday school Convention at Buffalo the class at last account numbered 717.

China's growth is indicated in part by the number of lesson helps that are now printed regularly. In 1911 the Uniform lesson issue was 27,000, and in 1918 the edition amounted to 184,400. There are 10,000 graded helps in addition. The estimated number of Sunday school scholars in China is no less than 200,000 in 4,000 schools.

Japan Sunday schools as well as those in Egypt, and Brazil gave liberally for the Armenian and Syrian Relief Fund last Christmas. The summer training school at Karuizawa, Japan, is an outstanding feature of their work in training a leadership. The session lasts for ten days. Scholarships amounting to $10 each are being sought in America for Japanese students who could not otherwise attend.

REVIEW OF

The Thought and Work of the Church

The main contribution for this week is that furnished by Miles J. Snyder, Milledgeville, Illinois, and is the Memorial sermon preached by Brother Snyder on Memorial Day just past. Brother Snyder's contributions are always of the highest order and we are sure our readers enjoy them all. If we could persuade a sufficient number of our pastors to furnish us with an occasional sermon we are sure the isolated members of the church who are faithful readers of the Evangelist would be greatly pleased. We have had a number of requests for more sermons.

W. T. Lytle who is closing a seven years' pastorate at Flora, Indiana is endeavoring to make the closing months of his work as profitable to the church as possible, and as easy for his successor in the work as it can be made. Brother S. C .Henderson has been called by the Flora church to become their pastor in October. During the past few weeks sixteen members have been added to the church at this place.

It has been frequently said there are people still living far back in the mountains of some of the southern states that do not yet know that the Civil War is over. We have long regarded that statement as a joke, but we are almost made to believe it may be true, for there are still some members of the Brethren church, and pastors at that, who do not seem to know that Brother Gnagey has not been editor of the Evangelist for nearly three years. Only last week Brother Gnagey turned over to us a letter that had been written by one of our pastors to him as editor of the Evangelist and asking for certain consideration in the paper. We refuse to admit that we are jealous in any way, but do think any PASTOR in the Brethren church should know who the editor of the church paper is.

A. E. Thomas, after a season spent in evangelistic work is at his home in South Bend, Indiana waiting for the season to open next fall. His last meeting was held at Brighton, Indiana and resulted in nineteen conversions.

These are busy days at Ashland College. By the time this paper reaches our readers the college year will have come to a close, and only the normal department will be in session. We hope to have a full report of the closing exercises of the College for next week's paper. Many visitors are already here, a number of them coming in time to attend the baccalaureate services on Sunday vening. W. H. Moomaw and son and daughter were here last week, the father and son going on to Detroit after automobiles, but the daughter, Reba, remaining for the College commencement exercises. A number of the relatives of Mrs. A. L. Lynn have also been here for a week. Mr. and Mrs. John Lichty are here fom Nebaska. Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Smith and several members of the family are here from Syracuse, Indiana, as is also Mrs. John Bricker from Rossville, Indiana. Mr. and Mrs. Ira C. Wilcox are here from Pittsburgh, and Mrs. Wogoman and daughter from Clayton, Ohio, and still other visitors will be here for the commencement before this paper reaches our readers.

The second Ashland College annual, gotten out by the Junior class, is now on sale. It is a book of real merit and is gotten up in a practical but yet artistic manner in half morrocco. The Junior class has put over four hundred dollars in this publication to "boost" the College, and to make it a financial success practically every copy must be sold. To help the class we give it this free notice and we trust there may be many members of the church who will feel inclined to invest $1.50 in a copy of this book. You will get value received and help the class of the College. Order a copy from Pauline Teeter, Business Manager, Ashland, Ohio.

If there are any young men of the Brethren church in the training camp at Camp Custer, Michigan and they will make their presence known to Mrs. Roy Decker, Augusta, Michigan, she will promise to invite them to visit her home which is near the encampment. Parents can take notice and send word to Sister Decker, she will render what service she can for them.

The Summer Slump

What a multitude of shortcomings and sins are hidden behind that one little expression, the summer slump. It is a veritable rock of defense for many a preacher, Sunday school superintendent or teacher, or Christian Endeavor president. That there is such a thing we will not deny. We served too long in the pastorate not to have learned that much, but we feel that we learned something else while we were learning. It may startle some of our Brethren in the ministry, but I hope they may not feel too greatly shocked when I say that in a great many instances the summer slump begins with the pastor himself, is handed down to the Sunday school superintendent and is then passed on to the Christian Endeavor president, and by that time the entire congregation is pretty well inoculated with the germ, which apparently, like the whooping cough, must run its course; and it is to be noted that the disease is both a contagion and an infection so that it is readily caught either coming or going.

It is easy for the pastor to let up a little in the thorough preparation of his weekly messages and to lessen his efforts to have the prayer meeting lesson or mid-week talk thoroughly prepared. It is easy for the Sunday school superintendent to feel that because some of the members of the school, including a number of his teachers, will go visiting and automobile riding on Sunday it will not be necessary for him to plan as many interesting surprises for the school as a part of its regular morning session; and it is not at all hard for the C. E. president to say,and the prayer meeting committee to feel that since so many of the young people would rather take a sunset stroll than to come to Endeavor meeting it will not be necessary to lay such careful plans for the meetings, because those that do come will come any way for they are always interested and will be present whether any effort has been made or not to make the meetings of special interest. In these ways the summer slump begins with the leaders, and it is now on. It has come early, and it has begun with the preachers this summer. Do you ask how I know? Let me tell you. Not since coming into the position of editor have we had such a famine of church reports and news as during the past week. Wo have become used to receiving scanty reports from the churches during July and August but that the slump should come upon us the last week in May is something to consider both carefully and prayerfully.

We said the slump has begun with the preachers, and we intend to stand by our guns until the fortress falls or until the victory is ours.

A Strenuous Season

We know the past season of church work has been a strenuous one. We know it as few of our pastors know it, for much of the strenuousness has passed through our office; and we know the pastors and workers of the church have been exceedingly busy considering the requirements of our Four-Year Program and they have been endeavoring to meet the requirements of that progam, thus a busy winter has been passed, but the Four-Year Program is not a winter program, it is an all year program, a program that can have no letup until its goals have been accomplished in nineteen twenty or until the program has been abandoned. The question is, What are we going to do about it? Do we think the goals can be reached through a campaign covering eight months of the year and that the remaining four months can be spent in idleness or in resting? If we do we are badly mistaken. There can be no letup in this effort. It must be pushed twelve months in the year and seven days in the week. The churches, Sunday schools and Christian Endeavor societies must be busy when the thermometer registers ninety-eight in the shade as well as when it registers twenty degrees below zero. Practically every church in the brothrhood accounted for some of its failure sthe past winter by getting behind the cold weather and the fuel shortage. We should hesitate now to hide behind the sunshine that God is sending us. Let us keep busy, every one, and pastors send in church news and reports of your work, so it will not be necessary for us to convert the Evangelist into a fashion plate or a farm journal.

The Power of the Gosped

St. Paul had in mind distinct things the gospel could and would do when he said he was not ashamed of it and declared it to be "the power of God unto salvation." It is the power of God unto salvation as millions can testify who have come under this power, but the salvation it brings is something more than a mere saving from the future punishment that sin deserves; it is something more than a preparation for entrance into heaven to be with the Lord where he is and where he expressed his desire to have his disciples.

The power of the gospel is manifested in its frequent success in turning its enemies into zealous friends. The Apostle Paul was himself one of the most striking examples of this power, and practically every age since has furnished the world with similar examples.

It has been said of some who came to religious services to scoff that they remained to pray, and this may be said of some who have directly opposed the gospel and its principles, for they have come to see its most beneficient influence and instead of offering further opposition they now are offering their assistance in maintaining it where they had formerly opposed it.

One of the great obstacles that foreign missionaries have had to overcome in sections of the heathen world where commercial interests are at stake has been the opposition of men and corporations that are engaged in exploiting the labor or the products of the labor of the people the missionaries would teach the way of life. Many an organization that has only its personal greed for its motive to enter foreign lands has offered this oppostiion, but such opposition is gradually breaking down. Many years ago it was said that one of the greatest obstacles in the way of missionary work in India was the opposition of the old "East India Company," and only recently an example of the gradual breaking down of such opposition has been made known. It has been reported that a tea company in Assam that lately did not allow missionaries to work among its employes is building a church and helping the missionaries.

It might be a charitable view to take of the incident to say the directors themselves have been converted and want to give expression in this way to their change of heart, and we hope this is the truth of the matter, but from past experiences we are almost compelled to say that what these directors or managers have done is to recognize that Christianity will make their workmen more faithful to them and to their interests and that from a business standpoint alone it is a good move on their part to lend some practical assistance to the missionaries. In either case it is a good work and in either case it shows the power of the gospel, not only to change the hearts and the lives of the natives of heathen lands but also to change the attitude of hard-headed and sometimes hard-hearted business men in their attitude toward the work of the missionaries. Such men may be of great help to the missionary workers of the world and they really are paying only a small portion of their indebtedness to Christianity and to missionaries when they do so great a favor as to build a church for the natives.

Safety First

This slogan has been pressed into most every conceivable service since it was prominently brought into notice a few years ago by the railroad corporations and made such a conspicuous part of their advertising plans to further their business. It is a good slogan and could well be adopted by practically every industry in the country to the advantage of both the industry and the workers carrying it on. Some lines of industrial work are especially dangerous and too great precautions against the injury or death of those engaged in it cannot be taken, for after all human life is one of the most valuable commodities that the world offers in its market and trade.

But a new movement has been started only recently that should prove as popular as that which sprang into prominence so quickly as the result of nation-wide posting of "Safety First" advertisements. Publicity is one of the greatest factors to be reckoned with in the pushing forward of any business or propaganda. The new movement to which we have reference is the effort now being made to post the Ten Commandments in large type in prominent places in courts, schoolrooms, and factories throughout the country. Not every one who sees such posters will stop to read them, but some will do so and in doing so make acqquaintance with rules of conduct that the world very much needs. Then Ten Commandments were not good for the ancient Hebrew alone but they are good for every people and for every age since. Not that the strict letter of these commandments is binding upon people who have passed into the higher atmosphere of the Grace of Jesus Christ, but the foundation principles are such that they need to be made familiar to all people. And if there is an advantage to be gained by posting safety first, and test your seed corn, and fire prevention and food conservation bulletins in every conceivable public place then it is good to call the attention of the people to the greatest bulletin of all times: the very commandments of God who has promised to be with the people who keep his laws .

Milk and Honey

The great inducements offered to the descendants of Abraham to become a people separate and apart from the ungodly nations of the world were many and varied, one of them being the promise of a land for a habitation that should be flowing with milk and honey; and we have been told of the fat valleys and rich plains of the Palestine of old, but of recent years or even centuries the fatness seems to have been consumed, the milk has apparently dried up and the bees have ceased gathering the honey.

Few lands have suffered more from poverty and starvation than those very ones that God had said should supply his children in abundance. Is it a question of the veracity of God or of the voracity of man? may very properly be asked of the condition. While the hills of the Holy Land do seem barren and the valleys may seem exhausted, yet we are told that they only seem that way and that in reality there are yet great possibilities lying undeveloped in this promised land and that there are sources of riches untouched.

Now that the miiltary posession of the land has passed from the hands of the Moslem rulers and into the hands of a people that recognize the religion of Jesus Christ we have a right to expect to see some of the promises of old fulfilled before our very eyes and the Holy Land may again become a land flowing with milk and honey, that is with the products of the earth that shall supply the needs of many people.

A recent magazine article tells us that there will be much to exploit in this ancient land and that the hope of the country is in the Zionist movement that shall save it from the parasites of progress.

The Dead Sea and Hasbeya produce asphalt of a superior quality; there are numerous beds of phosphates throughout Transordania, notably near Es-Salt. The water of the Dead Sea contains nearly twenty-five per cent of salt desopits rich in bromides and potassium. There is oil, too in the district. In Sidon there are iron ore, coal, and yellow ochre. Chalk deposits exist in the mountains and in the Jordan valley. There are great possibilities in the cultivation of sugar cane, which thrives on the coastal plains and in the Jordan valley, and in the extraction of olive oil. The Jordan valley, too, is declared by exports to be suitable for cotton growing, while the differences of level of the river afford a ready means of motive power.

From these statements of this magazine writer one is made to feel that a new world has been discovered and that great riches are yet in the earth and only awaiting the hand of man to uncover their abundance. And yet in the face of all these facts we presume there are critics of the Word of God who stand ready to contend the promises of God were never made to Abraham as we have them recorded in the Word, or if they were there never was any hope of their fulfilment. There may yet be Jews who feel that God failed to keep his covenant with their father, Abraham, and that their sufferings through the centuries have been the result of a delusion. But we believe God's promises are sure and that though it may take centuries and many of them to work out his plans yet God is faithful to keep his covenant with them that fear him.

The Sixth Sense in Missionary Training

Ever since writers began to write and lecturers began to lecture on open doors in missionary training they have shown us charts with five avenues through which the individual may be reached. We have had the missionary possibilities of the five senses presented again and again. Woefully overlooked, however, has been the importance of the sixth sense in missionary training.

What we do is not only a result of missionary training, but a part of it. Only three-tenths of what we see is so impressed upon us that we do not forget it, yet we remember nine-tenths of what we do. A man may forget in a few days the most eloquent missionary address he ever heard, but he remembers for years, as if it were a thing of yesterday, the dollars he gave to missions. Cyrus Hamlin may have forgotten many of the best missionary addresses he ever heard, but never did he forget that seven cents he droppd into the missionary contribution box. As a venerable old man with a snow-white beard, the famous founder of Robert College remembered to a penny that thing he did as a boy, when he gave up his gingerbread in order that he might put the whole of his lunch money into the contribution box.

Pete Parker, as a boy, visited the poor and suffering and ministered to them. As a Yale student heroically he nursed the stricken ones during a cholera epidemic in New York and New Haven, when some other students were so terror stricken they scarcely dared to put their heads out of the door. The things that Pete Parker, the boy, did entered into the making of the great Dr. Peter Parker, the famous surgeon who opened China to the Gospel with his lancet.

No part of the training of that faithful-unto-death young missionary, William Whiting Borden, was worth more than the actual missionary work he did, when he put the automobile he might have had during his college days into funds for the Yale Hope Mission and knelt there, night after night, with his arm around some "down-and-out" trying to lead him to Christ.

Expression is not only a result of, but is a part of, impression. The old story of the boy who cried "Wolf, Wolf" has been given a new interpretation by a modern missionary leader who says:

"The first day the boy called 'Wolf, Wolf!' the men ran out with their arms ready and their purpose unhesitating to kill the wolf and to protect the boy and the sheep. But there was no wolf for them to kill and nothing for them to do, so they went back home. The second day the boy called again, "Wolf, Wolf!" A few men answered his call with less determination than on the preceding day. There was no wolf and they returned home having done nothing. The third day a terrified call rang out, but the men paid no heed, even though there was a wolf to be killed. Had they killed a wolf the first day they would have returned in full force the second day ready to slay a dozen wolves. Had they killed another wolf on the second day they would have been ready to face and extinguish the whole wolf tribe by the third day."

The deadening effect of constantly receiving impressions through the five senses without deepening and expressing those impressions through this sixth sense makes our missionary zeal a matter of sham and vencer. Here lies the explanation of the contradiction of the people in our churches who can listen to the presentation of the dire need of non-Christian peoples with a casually sympathetic murmur of "Poor things. Isn't it a pity?" Here lies also explanation of that other group who are moved to tears by the recounting of those needs, but whose tears so flood their eyes that they are completely blinded and they do not see the contribution plate or any other relief agency which offers opportunity for speedy betterment of the conditions which they so much deplore. Truly "Impression without expression results in depression."

Program Preparation. The people who get most out of a program are those who put most into it. Here indeed is something to do. Most of our denominations furnish to their societies excellent canned programs. The writer has conducted a program cannery for years and pronounces the same to be a legitimate and needful business, but this pronouncement is followed by a plea to the presidents and program committees that they prove themselves something more than mere can openers. Misisonary programs have a distinct tin-can flavor if they are merely run around, poured out and served. The cannery officials expect the local societies to run out into their own gardens to pluck a crisp, fresh sprig of parsley which has grown since those programs were published, with which to garnish them before serving. They expect the program leaders to sometimes add a few ingredients from their own larders and once in a while to evolve appetizing croquettes from the plain canned salmon shipped to them.

"How can we get our women to take as much interest in the missionary programs as they take in the Woman's Club programs?" comes the query.

"By getting them to put as much into the missionary programs as they do into the Woman's Club programs" is the answer.

Instead of having programs which show the wonderful versatility of the pastor's wife or some other woman who is expected to open the church, distribute the hymn books, play the organ, lead the singing, lead the prayers and do most of the talking, make your meetings depend on as many people as possible.

Missionary Personals

Miss Jean McKenzie, author of Black Sheep and other fascinating stories of African life, is returning to America from West Africa, Kamerun Mission, where she went at the special request of the missionaries to help establish the work that had been somewhat unsettled by the war.

Gipsy Smith has been made a member of the British Empire Order, an honor bestowed by King George for exceptional service to Great Britain. This service has consisted of work for the soldiers in connection with the Y. M. C. A.

Dr. John R. Mott and Dr. Charles R. Watson have gone to England in the interests of the work of the "Continuation Committee of the World Missionary Conference." From there they expect to visit the Y. M. C. A. camps in France and Italy. They plan to return to America in June.

Rev. S. Guy Inman,, secretary of the "Committee on Co-operation in Latin America" has just made a hurried trib to Cuba in the interests of missionary work.

Bishop F. W. Warne, of India, has arrived in New York and will take part in the Methodist Episcopal Centenary campaign. Bishop W. F. Oldham has come from Buenos Aires, Argentina, to participate in this campaign.

Dr. John Fox, secretary of the American Bible Society, has suffered a paralytic stroke, but is slowly recuperating.

Dr. G. Sherwood Eddy is engaged in the evangelistic campaign began in China in February. A missionary in Canton says that over one hundred students of Canton Christian College have accepted Christ as a a result of this campaign.

Wm. E. Holloway, a lawyer, banker and Sunday school superintendent, has become a member of the secretarial staff of the Laymen's Missionary Movement.

Rev. Alfred Williams Anthony, D. D., has entered upon his work as Executive Secretary of the Home Missions Council, with headquarters at 156 Fifth Avenue, New York.

Brigham H. Roberts, the Mormon is serving as a chaplain in the United States Army, in Southern California, by appointment of the Governor of Utah. A few years ago this polygamist was barred from Congress by the representatives of the country as a whole, but now is selected by a governor of a state to help mold the character of the young men of the Army.

terian church, died at the age of 87 in New York on February 25.

S. P. Teng, a Chinese indemnity student at Princeton University, died on March 21. Mr. Teng was near the end of his senior year. He took a prominent part in all student activities, being the first foreign student to become a member of the senior class cabinet.

Commissioner Charles Jeffries has been appointed by General Booth to take charge of the Salvation Army's work in China. He has been Field Secretary for Great Britain in Australia for six years.

Bishop Hiraiwa, of the Japan Methodist Episcopal church, will visit America this month and attend the General conference of the M. E. Church South at Atlanta.

Bishop Burt, who has been visiting the Methodist Episcopal Missions in Asia, and has presided at twelve Conferences, has returned to America.

Fennell P. Turner, general secretary of the Student Volunteer Movement, has accepted the appointment as secretary of the Committee of Reference and Counsl and began his service on April 1st. Mr. Turner will continue his work with the Student Volunteer Movement.

Miss Elizabeth D. Putnam, of Davenport, Iowa, assisted by two women of New York City and one of Birmingham, Alabama, will have charge of the Y. M. C. A. canteen activities at Camp Upton. In France there are more than two hundred women in canteen service, and it is expected that this number will soon be equalled in American camps.

Relief Work in the Jerusalem Zone

The American Relief Committee in Cairo have received the $50,000.00 cabled recently from America for relief work in the Eastern War Zone, according to a despatch received fom Stephen Trowbridge. In the same mail with the acknowledgement of the money came a report of the relief work in the Jerusalem Zone.

Eleven hundred children are being cared for in the orphanages, and plans are well under way to greatly increase this number.

Clothing Distribution

Up to date 2333 garments have been given out by Miss Fisher, the relief worker, 31 persons have received tins of milk, 22 received rice and 1001 soup tickets for the new soup kitchen.

Industrial Work for Women

Mrs. Vester, in charge of the industrial work for women now has 250 refugees employed for plain sewing. Thousands are asking for work and the wide-spread distribution becomes more apparent. Women previously in excellent circumstances gladly accept the most menial kind of labor. Mrs. Vester will soon extend her industrial work to the towns of Ramallah and Bethlehem.

Major Scrimgeour reported 12 free dispensaries in the Jerusalem Zone. Approximately 6,500 cases have been treated. A nurse goes out from headquarters and gives one hour a day to the refugees in the Bokhara quarter.

The Food Supply

The committee are purchasing corn and other foods locally as far as possible, because of the difficulties of transportation from Egypt.

For Jerusalem

$10,000.00 has been sent by the Christian Herald of New York to the American Colony in Jerusalem for the encouragement of the lace industry. The Syrian women have long been famous for their beautiful laces and the editors of the Christian Herald, who have so generously given to Armenian and Syrian Relief, have felt that they could best help the refugees in Jerusalem by giving them an opportunity to earn a livelihood.

A Refugee Boy

Work Among the Greeks

A great number of Greeks have been deported from the coast regions along the Black Sea, the Marmora and the Aegean into the interior, especially into the villages of Konia, Tocat, Sivas and Angora. Some have been sent as far down as the Chilican plains in the regions of Adana and Tarsus, and several thousand have reached even the Syrian desert. Thousands of them are in a pitiful condition especially the women and children.

The American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief is doing all in its power to relieve the terrific suffering. During the recent fighting in Trebizond many of the Greeks escaped to Batoum and other places in the Caucausus and fifty thousand or more are reported in flight to Crimea. Trebizond, when it was in the hands of the Russians was a place of refuge for thousands of exiles from the Black Sea coast towns and villages.

Syrian Relief

The American Committee for Armenian and Syrian relief have 70 workers, chiefly American missionaries working without expense to relief funds, distributing relief in Syra. These 70 are in addition to an equal or larger number of workers engaged in other areas throughout Asia Minor.

"For Greatest Usefulness"

By Hilda Richmond

Mrs. Benner was washing in the laundry of the big house up on the hill from her humble cottage when Archie French came in with his curly dog in his arms. "Please, Mrs. Benner, will you wash Toodles?" he asked politely. Archie was a polite little boy of seven and a great favorite with poor Mrs. Benner. "Why do you put that blue stuff in the water?"

"Wash Toodles!" cried Mrs. Benner with her wet hands held up. "You don't wash dogs in with the clothes, Honey. The blue stuff is to make the clothes nice and white." "We're going to have a Pet Show," said Archie, "and all the other children are going to have their pets washed up slick and clean. Maybe that blue stuff would make Toodles nice and white."

Toodles was a fluffy, curly white dog that had just come to live with Archie, and of course he thought his pet was the finest in the world. He was sure the little fellow would win a prize if only Mrs. Benner would wash him. Mrs. French was away from home taking care of her sick father, so there was no one else to ask. Archie's young lady sister was supposed to look after him, but she was very busy getting ready for a party and could not be bothered.

To please Archie Mrs. Benner put Toodles into a tub of warm suds and scrubbed him well, though all the time she kept saying it would do no good. But when he was washed and rinsed and blued and dried in an old blanket he was so beautiful that they were both delighted. "I'll bet he'd never win a prize if Johnny Smith took his dog," she said when Archie was sure Toodles would get one of the prizes. "Dandy is the smartest and nicest and best dog I ever saw. And tricks! Why Dandy knows almost as much as folks do."

It cost Archie a great effort to say, "Tell Johnny to bring his dog to the show. It's tomorrow afternoon and it doesn't cost a penny. There's prizes and ribbons, and the ladies are going to serve cake and ice cream. It's on Mrs. Turner's lawn." Of course if Johnny Smith had the nicest dog he would get the prize, but then he ought to have it if he could get it, for a ragged boy with very few good times and a boy who has to work all the time out of school deserves some fun.

Mrs. Benner hurried home as fast as her tired feet would carry her and hunted up Johnny Smith. Together they put Dandy into a tub of warm water, and for the first time in his life he had a bath, that is, a bath that he did not give himself by swimming in the river. By this time all the neighborhood was interested, for Dandy hitched to an old cart did errands and carried washings and delivered parcels for all the people in Jimson Court. Emmy Peters gave her best hair ribbon for a bow, Cobb'e Brooks made a collar of a piece of old leather, Mrs. Brooks brought some scraps of fat meat to help fill out the thin sides, for even making his matted locks clean and silky could not conceal the fact that Dandy was thin, and each and every one felt sure that Dandy would get the prize.

The children with pets could scarcely wait for Saturday afternoon to come, and before one o'clock Mrs. Turner's lawn was the noisiest place in town. Many of the children carried their pets to the place for fear they would soil their feet, but Dandy being too big to carry had his feet nicely done up in old stockings made for him by Mrs. Benner. These Johnny whisked off when they reached the velvet grass.

But when Dandy was tied to a stake, and his master made the rounds of the beautiful dogs, cats, rabbits, white mice, birds, chickens, and other pets, he began to feel a little doubtful about that prize that had seemed so sure when he left home. Though Dandy had been stuffed with all the things the neighbors brought, and though he wore the big red bow ribbon, somehow he didn't look quite like the pampered pets of richer homes. Johnny was troubled, but his loyal little heart would not allow him to admit even for a minute that any dog or any pet was nicer than his own. He felt like slipping away with Dandy and sneaking home, but he could not do that because so many of the ladies were crowding about his dog and asking all kinds of questions.

"That's the little boy Mrs. Benner told me about," said one lady to the judges as they were making their rounds. "He hitches up that big, ugly,—that one with the bright red ribbon bow,—and does errands for all the folks around. Mrs. Benner says some of the old people would never have any attention if Johnny did not do their errands. We're going to look up the old folks on Jimson Court right away, for one little ragged boy must not put us all to shame. No wonder the dog is thin. Mrs. Benner says he drags an old cart that is too heavy for him with washings and parcels until he is almost ready to drop."

And when other ladies said the same things to the judges they retired behind the big clump of lilacs and whispered together earnestly. In a few minutes they came back and some of the ladies were rubbing their eyes, as if the sun were too strong that beautiful afternoon. "We've decided to offer an extra prize," they announced, "and it will be the first one given. It is a prize to the pet that has shown the greatest usefulness, and it goes to Master Johnny Smith for his Dandy. Of course Dandy could not appreciate a gold-piece, but we are sure his little master will use it to buy a new wagon for him. We also give to Dandy this collar with the silver plate. Now we will give out the other prizes."

Johnny did not wait to hear anything else. He even forgot to put Dandy's stockings back on his clean feet. Together they raced joyously to Jimson Court where the folks were all waiting anxiously, and as Johnny displayed the five-dollar gold-piece and the beautiful collar they all said with one voice: "We knew it. It's a wonder Dandy didn't take all the prizes. He deserved them." And I think they were right, don't you?—Selected.

Three Dreams

By Rev. Francis E. Clark

President of the United Society of Christian Endeavor and of the World's Christian Endeavor Union

The executive committee of the foreign-mission board of the Southern Presbyterian church has a full-page advertisement in the April Dixie Endeavorer, which is significant in more ways than one. Here is the "ad" as it apepars, only condensed in smaller type:

Three Dreams

Livingstone dreamed that some day one man would support a whole mission station. That dream has come true.

Our dream is a Christian Endeavor society in every one of our 3,409 Southern Presbyterian churches and every Endeavor society alive to the preaching of Christ in the regions beyond.

Earnest Christian Endeavor leaders dream of having Christian Endeavor missionaries supported by Christian Endeavor gifts and prayers in every one of our seven foreign fields.

Executive Committee of Foreign Missions,
P. O. Box 158,
Nashville, Tennessee

The significance of these three dreams is threefold. First, that the leaders of another strong, conservative denomination like the Southern Presbyterian should dream of having a Christian Endeavor society in every one of its 3,409 churches. Other denominations have dreamed this dream, and in some of them it has largely come true, as it doubtless will in the course of time in this great communion of the Southern States. Because the Society has had the right of way and has been fostered and welcomed it has taken its place loyally side by side with the Sunday school and the distinctive missionary society as one of the agencies of the church.

In some denominations the Society has had to fight its way for recognition; the young people have received no encouragement, and, in some, obstacles have been put in their way in the shape of purely denominational societies without any interdenominational features.

The significance of this deliverance from the South lies largely in the fact that the Southern Presbyterians fully and fairly considered the question, weighed it in every respect, tried other organizations that were purely denominational, and did not rush into Christian Endeavor hastily. For more than thirty years the Society had very little standing in this branch of the church of Christ; but deliberately and with painstaking care to do the right thing the denomination decided that it would indorse and adopt the Christian Endeavor movement, and now it "dreams" of a society in every church.

But this is only one of its dreams. The second and third are equally important, that "every Endeavor society should be alive to the preaching of Christ in the regions beyond," and that in the course of time Christian Endeavor missionaries may be supoprted by Christian Endeavor gifts and prayers in every one of the seven foreign fields of this church.

It is by no means an extravagant dream. Already the Dixie Endeavorers have a goal of $15,000 for missionary work through their churches of all denominations for the coming year. As the societies in the Southern Presbyterian church grow stronger and more numerous, they will doubtless be able to support seven foreign missionaries; and have as much money for home-missionary work and other important causes of benevolences that come before them.

Of course the leaders in the various denominations will remember that the Christian Endeavor gifts are largely an extra, which would not come except for the existence of these societies; for the Endeavorers, almost without xception, belong to the Sunday school and give through the Sunday school. A great majority of the older ones are members of the church, and give through other channels of the church, so that what comes from the Endeavor society is over and above what would otherwise be received. This is true in the Congregational denomination and others, where the gifts from the Endeavor societies are all in addition to what the members give through the other church channels.

I feel confident that the cordial adoption of the societies by the Southern Presbyterian churches will meet the equally cordial response on the part of the young people of these churches, and that in the course of time they will come up to the full expectation of their elders and leaders. A grudging, half-hearted attitude, which is continually finding fault with the young people, questioning their loyalty and striving to substitute something else for the society which achieve these results. The Southern Presbyterians surely have shown themselves wise in their day and generation, and have set a worthy example to others.

Now consider for a moment the other side of the shield. What is the duty of the societies to the denomination? This is not a new subject. Perhaps you will think that I have worn it threadbare. A fundamental principle of the Christian Endeavor movement from the beginning has been loyal co-operation with the denomination to which we belong, co-operation in all kinds of service, in working and giving and praying, co-operation even when the denomination has been, as has sometimes been the case, indifferent to the claims of the young people upon it for care.

But let me wear the subject even more shing and threadbare by urging that a place be found in our State conventions, as there always is in our international conventions, for a denominational programme. Let a session of the State convention be set aside, or at least an hour of the day for the presentation of any plans that the denomination wishes to present to the societies. If any authorized denominational leader wishes to speak to the young people of his own denomination, give him a chance. There will be plenty of time left for our interdenominational and fellowship programme. The two features are not inconsistent with each other.

All who remember the great Boston Convention of 1895 will recall some of the overwhelming denominational gatherings. It was said that more Baptist young people met together in the Baptist Christian Endeavor rally than had ever come together before. The same was true of the Congregational rally, and would doubtless have been true, as it has been at other great Christian Endeavor conventions, of the Presbyterians and the Disciples of Christ, had Boston been in the territory where the churches of these denominations were numerous.

Even in some of our great county gatherings an hour out of the day may often be profitably given to denominational interests. We shall not love our brethren of other denominations the less because we feel that we have a special obligation to the work of our own. "Loyalty and fellowship," "fidelity and fraternity," have been the watchwords of Christian Endeavor from the beginning. They mean no less today than they ever have done; and, as the denominations are becoming more and more interested in the Endeavor movement, indorsing and adopting and promoting it as have the Southern Presbyterians, the obligation of the Endeavorers becomes even stronger to do their part for the support of every good work for which their denomination appeals.

I am confident that no wise denomination will wish to weaken the interdenominational ties or begrudge the comparatively small sums of money that are necessary to carry on the interdenominational work.

Like my friends of the Southern Presbyterian Church, I, too, have three dreams:

First, an Endeavor society in every church in every evangelical denomination.

Second, every society contributing to and supporting the missionary work of its denomination.

Third, a constantly increasing fellowship of the young people of the churches, challenging one another and stimulating one another in their united capacity and through their denominations to spread the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ throughout all the world.

Amen, so let it be!—C. E. World.

Georgette and Gingham

By Janet T. Van Osdel

For the third time Irma Inness, in the hammock under the horse-chestnut tree, heard her mother call. The slight scowl that marred her pretty face for a fleeting second after each call was the only indication that she heard. With one slender foot upon the ground she pushed the hammock back and forth as she read. Occasionally a stir of air brought the scent of the blossoms to her and she stopped reading to raise her eyes to the green and white canopy above her.

Her mother appeared in the doorway. Mrs. Inness had been making currant jelly and jam. Her face was flushed and her hair, damp with perspiration, lay matted against her forehead. Stemming the currants had blackened her fingers, and on her gray gingham dress there showed spots of red where the juice had splashed. Irma viewed her mother with distaste.

"Oh, here you are!" said Mrs. Inness, dropping down on an upturned box. "My, but it's warm! I suppose the heat put you to sleep., I've been calling you for the last half hour."

"Finished the currants?" asked Irma.

"I've just sealed up the last jar of jam—fourteen quarts of it and fifty-nine glasses of jelly. It's mighty nice to have in winter, but it is a job to make it this hot weather. I thought maybe you'd do up the dishes, Irma. The sink's stacked full—all the dinner dishes, besides those I made with the currants."

"O Moth-er!"

"What's the matter? You surely don't mind helping me that much! I have to go over to Mrs. Black's to pick gooseberries. She telephoned that I could have what I wanted if I picked them. You wouldn't want to do that and get all scratched, to say nothing of sunburn. So do the dishes like a good girl."

"Mother,I—won't!"

The word out, Irma looked chagrined. Never before had she used it to her mother.

"Irma!"

"I can't help it, mother. You oughtn't ask me to do such work. It's always something. This morning John asked me to mend his knickers, and yesterday Frances wanted me to show her how to knit."

"And I suppose you did it?"

"Can't you understand, mother? Am I to be treated just as I was before my story was published? How can I ever become a famous writer if I have to do such common things?"

"Helpfulness isn't such a common thing. We could stand a lot more of it," remarked Mrs. Innes. "What are you going to do then, this afternoon?"

"I'm going to call on Ainslee Persons. This is one of her books I'm reading. Mother, she's wonderful! And isn't it great to think that she's taken the old Douglas place and will be within two miles of us all summer?"

"If you wait until I get over this berry rush I'll call with you," suggested Mrs. Inness.

"But I don't suppose she'd want everybody calling on her," protested Irma. "I wrote to her that I was a writer too, and she said that I might come to see her."

"That was kind of her. Did you tell her the extent of your writing?"

"No-o. That's why I've got on my Georgette dress, mother, because I'm going to see her. It was too early to start, so I thought I'd read in one of her books so as to get into the spirit for my call upon such a great woman."

"Your new gingham would have been better suited for a walk over these country roads, and then you could help out as soon as you get back without changing."

"Well, I pay Ainslee Persons the compliment of having a soul above gingham. She'll appreciate this Georgette. You never did care for it."

"No, I like you in other things better. You'll probably want to be starting now, and since you pass Mrs. Black's I'll walk that far with you."

Irma looked at her mother's currant-stained gingham and then at her own dainty dress, made with such infinite care by those toil-soiled hands, and wished that she need not walk down the road with her mother. There was no excuse to be thought of, however, so they set out together.

The thud of hoofs on the road behind them caused Mrs. Inness to look back.

"Who do you suppose that is coming?" she asked. It's a new outfit to me."

Irma turned to see a tiny pony drawing a small cart, from the sides of which there seemed to overflow a bulk of black and white polka-dot calico.

"Somebody who wants to make herself ridiculous riding in that baby rig," said Irma scornfully, and then uttered a cry of dismay as she stubbed the toe of one of her white pumps against the gnarled root of a tree.

"Botheration! Why couldn't you let me watch where I was going?" she scolded, stooping to smooth the scuffed leather. But Mrs. Inness did not even hear her daughter's remark.

"I believe it is!" she was exclaiming joyfully. "It is! It actually is!"

When Irma looked up from her damaged shoe it was to behold her mother in the arms of the polka-dot lady, who, in the low cart, was at just the proper level to embrace Mrs. Inness comfortably without moving from her seat. Between laughter and tears the two women were kissing one another and exchanging tender words of recognition and greeting.

Why would her mother take on so with such an ordinary woman? thought Irma despairingly, and when Mrs. Innes presented her to Mrs. Worsfield she acknowledged the introduction none too graciously.

"And where are you bound for, Mary?" asked Mrs. Worsfold. "I'd say jump in, but where'd you jump to? Hop-O has a cartful when he has me, but it's not cruelty to animals, as you might think to look at us. It's the delight of Hop-O's life to take me about, and he's as strong as an ox."

"I'm going to stop right down here at Mrs. Black's to pick gooseberries. Hers are spoiling on the bushes and so she's offered me as many as I want to pick."

"Well, I've a busy afternoon ahead of me, too, and my job's a worse one than yours," said Mrs. Worsfold. "Now, remember, Mary, you're coming to spend a whole day with me—no skimpy call. You're to be there for lunch and for dinner, and then we'll take you home. Oh, Hop-O isn't our only means of getting about! Get up, Hop-O!"

The little pony trotted on as gayly as though he had naught but a bit of thistledown behind him. He had gone only a few rods when his mistress pulled him up to call back, "I say, Mary, I've been wondering why they call them gooseberries, and I conclude it's because nobody but a goose would run the risk of all those prickers for the sake of the sour old things." Her hearty laugh floated back as Hop-O jogged on again.

"Hannah! Hannah!" murmured Mrs. Inness. "After all you have been through to have kept the merry heart of years ago!"

"I think she's horrid," burst out Irma. "So common and stupid and silly!"

"Irma, be careful how you use such adjectives. She's—well, some day, my child, you'll be wiser."

Angrily Irma parted from her mother and walked on to the old Douglas place. It was only when she pulled the china-knobbed door bell that her former anticipation of meeting a kindred spirit returned to her.

But though the bell clanged harshly three times, there was no response to its summons. Keenly disappointed, she turned away and had nearly reached the gate when she heard a hallooing. Sure that it must be meant for herself, she followed the sound until it brought her to the side of the house, and there, in the middle of a potato patch, she discovered the polka-dot lady.

"Well, if it isn't Mary's daughter!" cried Mrs. Worsfold. "I'd like to take both of your hands in mine in welcome, but mine aren't a pretty sight with Henry's old socks on for gloves. You see, honey, I'm picking potato bugs. Henry—that's Mr. Worsfold—has been sick for a week and he's worrying his head off for fear the bugs will get all his potatoes, so I'm taking a hand at it."

"There's some mistake," said Irma stiffly. "I understand that Ainslee Persons had taken this place for the summer, and it was she I came to see."

"No, it's not a mistake. In plain, everyday conversation I'm Hannah Worsfold, but to my reading public I'm Ainslee Persons."

"You!" gasped Irma. "Ainslee Persons, and picking potato bugs! You're joking, of course, just as you did about the gooseberries."

"No, my dear, I am not joking," replied Mrs. Worsfold, and Irma, looking into her sweetly grave face, knew that she spoke seriously.

"It's a humble enough task for anyone, I know," she went on, "but who am I to shirk a duty when it lies at my hand to be done? If I neglected these potatoes now our crop would be a failure. That in itself would be a sin, and it would nearly break Henry's heart. He's cut off from the work he's best fitted to do, but so long as he feels there is something at which he can be of use he's a happy man. He's worked out here so hard that I wouldn't have this crop a failure even if I had to sit in the patch day and night to keep these striped animals from banqueting off it."

"But father uses Paris green."

"Yes? So would I if I had it. That's what Hop-O and I went away over to Hilton after. But the drug store there was out of it, and we can't be idle until it comes. Now let's go to the house."

"But your potatoes," hesitated Irma.

"I'll do them later," said Mrs. Worsfold.

"If I were dressed for it I could help, but this dress—"

"I have it!" interrupted Mrs. Worsfold. "Slip on one of Constance's big aprons. She's my daughter, and I believe you can wear a pair of her shoes. Maybe we'll have a better visit in the potato patch than in the parlor."

Late in the afternoon Irma burst into her mother's kitchen.

"I see I'm in time for the dishes, mother!" she cried. "I hurried so for fear I wouldn't be. And, mother, I want you to forgive me for that 'I won't' and for being so generally horrid lately."

"So a wiser little daughter has come back to me," said Mrs. Innes gently.

"Wiser? I've been a perfect silly. Why didn't you ever tell me what you have done? Mrs. Worsfold has been telling me that you were wonderful at college. Here I've been putting on all sorts of airs about my little five-dollar story, and she says you really could write, and that if I have a speck of talent I've gotten it from you. I know now that fame flees from those who pursue it. Think of me ever exepcting to accomplish anything when I was despising all the useful things of life! So long as you have to work so hard I'm going to be on hand to help. I guess if I'm to have any ideas worth while you'll be a good person to associate with, and if there is anything in the fame line ahead for me my gingham and not my Georgette will lead me to it."—Lutheran Young People.

Wanted—Young Men

By Geo T. Bennett

Wanted—young men who are willing to fight,
Clad in God's armor, with swords gleaming bright,
Wanted—young men whom no foe can affright,
To join in the ranks of our King.

Wanted—young men who will enter the fight,
Noble young men who will dare to do right;
Stalwart young men who will strive with their might
To further the cause of our King.

Wanted—young men who'll be loyal and true,
Men who are willing to side with the few.
Come on, young men, for our leader needs you
To fight in the ranks of our King.

Wanted—young men who are healthy and strong,
Who never will shirk, though the battle be long;
But fight 'neath the banner of truth against wrong
For the sake of country and King.

Wanted—young men who for Jesus will go
Gallant young men who will face any foe;
Bright, earnest young men with their hearts all aglow
To enlist and fight for the King.

Wanted—Young men who will stand firm and fast,
Plucky young men who will stand to the last.
Wanted—young men, till the battle is past
And victory is claimed for our King.

Wanted—young men when the battle is done;
Wanted—young men when the victory's won,
"Well done"
From the lips of Jesus our King.

A Good Text for the Times

Ye shall be ashamed of your revenues because of the fierce anger of the Lord.—Jeremiah 12:13.

The brewers of the country are consuming millions of bushels of rice and barley that ought to be put to some good purpose. The recent Senatorial election in Wisconsin showed conclusively the attitude of men whose influence made Milwaukee famous. Why tolerate the liquor traffic longer?—The Iowa Farmer.

The Southern Methodist General Conference showed its determination to press the liquor fight to an issue by naming as one of its new bishops Dr. James Cannon, Jr., Chairman of the Legislative Committee of the Anti-Saloon League.

The saloon exists for the sole purpose of creating and profiting by liquor appetites. Can we afford to legalize an institution which is engaged in the propagation of that which everyone knows is a curse to the country?

Nearly every drug fiend drank first.

Secretary of the Navy Daniels has ruled that the issuing of bar permits at dances in Chicago must stop for the protection of the men at the naval training camp.

Jacksonville, Florida, which had been cursed with a peculiarly obnoxious liquor traffic, has gone dry.

The Conneaut Citizen sent the following question: "Do you favor the ratification of the federal prohibition amendment?" to prominent Grange members in all parts of the State. Seventy replies were received, 67 yes, one blank, and two nos.

Senator Sheppard is pressing for a bone-dry District of Columbia.

A grave suspicion is growing that the German government is behind the effort to maintain the liquor traffic in the vicinity of American industries.

The liquor people of New York have launched the misnamed Temperance Forum in an effort to force the German beer policy upon America.

At the recent elections the drys added 80,000 to the number of people residing in prohibition territory in Wisconsin.

For sale: One jail at Briston, Virginia; jailer retiring on account of prohibition.

The Chicago Herald early in the year predicted that the last stand of the liquor traffic against ratification must be made in California, Connecticut, Delaware, Maryland, Massachusetts, Nevada, New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Texas, Vermont, Wisconsin and Wyoming. Since the prediction was made the drys have secured ratification in Delaware, Maryland, Massachusetts and Texas. Texas has also gone dry.

George Ehret, Sr., owner of the well-named Hell-Gate Brewery, New York, is now in Germany, to which country he has always been greatly devoted. His fortune of $90,000,000 is now in the hands of the custodian of alien properties.

"The greatest enemy of the army is on this side of the sea," says the Patriot Phalanx.

Since Sir Frederick Smith's visit to America he has written a book in which he comments upon the appalling dryness over here. He says, however, that no one spoke of this as a grievance to him and that the people have adapted themselves to abstinence in a surprising way.

J. Denny O'Neil, candidate of the Anti-Penrose faction of the Republican party for Governor of Pennsylvania has announced that he stands for immediate statewide prohibition in Pennsylvania in the interest of war activities.

Mr. R. H. Greenfield, founder and organizer of the Ulster Temperance Council of Ireland, has recently visited a number of American cities, where he has found much interest in Irish conditions.

The same thing that makes a man a successful bartender will make him a good salesman.

The South Dakota legislature before its adjournment ordered a petition to the Congress and the President of the United States asking for war-time prohibition as an immediate necessity.

News From the Field

Flora, Indiana

We are glad to send out a report from this work, as it has been showing some wonderful, and hopeful signs of advancement, with new zeal in every department of the work.

In the first place the brethren have not only the mind to work, but they are of one accord, and they have been able to get the co-operation of all.

Since a year ago it has been announced that there would be a change of pastors at the beginning of the new pastoral year in October.

The committee have agreed upon the man, considered his proposition, and Brother S. C. Henderson, of Hamlin, Kansas, has been called, and has accepted the call from the church to begin his services in October.

We will try and turn this field over to our successor in a way in which he will not find anything as far as we are concerned that will embarrass, or handicap the future of the work here.

We have been requested to help to guide this church in her efforts through the entertaining of the State Conference, which will convene here this fall, when we will be glad to have this one of the largest that has ever been attended in Indiana, for this year there will be many a problem for us to try to solve together.

The Brethren church has taken her stand, assumed her place in this community, and with their oneness to do, have acquitted themselves worthy of the call to which they have answered.

To our Brother Henderson and family we will say, "that if he manifests the life of a faithful pastor, and if the family will allow convenient kindnesses shown them, they will find this one of the best fields they have ever been called upon to serve. We will announce later where we will go next year in the Master's Service, as we expect to be used to duplicate the same thing that the Lord has blest us here to do. Now we will try and interest the Brethren who read this with a report of the work and then all can see that the Brethren are in the finest of spirit.

On Easter Sunday we had two accessions; April 14th, one accession; May 12th, three accessions; and after a few evenings of service preparatory to communion on last Sunday, May 26th, in the morning service we had nine accessions, and in the evening service one accession. They have all been baptized, and taken into the church, except one, and at a very early date he will be baptized.

One of the beautiful sights was when ten children were baptized on the afternoon of May 27th. In this number there are only two adults, all the rest are children ranging from nine to fourteen years of age.

All these children come from Brethren homes and the two adults unite two homes so with this number of additions the home base is strengthened, but we will not have to add any more to our Evangelist subscription to keep it coming in every Brethren home. We are trying to get the Brethren to make it possible to have from now on, a confession, at least one, at every regular service.

We had our Communion service on the evening of May 28th with 124 present which was a large number considering the evening. We were counting on at least 175 but at four o'clock a very hard storm began to rage, it seemed that the lightning was terrible. At seven o'clock our phones were out, and the electric lights were burned out, so we had to use other lamps and it just seemed to rain very hard in every direction, but we knew the rain would be useful and the Lord blessed us in our patience.

We hope this report will encourage others to do likewise and that churches that are not in one accord, just take note to what they can do, if they will GET TOGETHER. Pray for us Brethren that we may be found loyal in the Master's service.

Awaiting Orders, Article No. 4.

We are now at home awaiting orders and getting ready for our next big drive on sin early next fall.

Our last meeting for the present season was at Brighton, Indiana. The victory was ours 19 confessions were made. Brighton is a little place but is very active in all things that pertain to the kingdom of God, and presents to us a very worthy field for our best endeavors. The favors shown us were many, and we are thankful to our Heavenly Father for the many new friends we have met as we journeyed along the pathway of life. Our prayers shall go up to him for these people as they labor together.

We are glad to report that we have enjoyed the work of the past winter and have been made to feel that God hath honored our feeble attempts to bring across for him the wounded and the dying in sin. The work was made as a whole pleasant by the splendid spirit manifested by our pastors as well as their people with whom we labored.

In these days of stress and burdens, it has certainly been uplifting to present to the people the story of a world Redeemer, to whom we can go and find comfort and peace.

We shall be glad to serve our people anywhere and in whatever capacity they shall need us. May God help us all to remain true and steadfast.

In concluding my last message I wish also to express my appreciation of the way in which our writeups have been treated by the church paper, and the fair, impartial way in which they have been given.

Yours in the service,
A. E. THOMAS, Evangelist,

Our Dead

HAMILTON—Nain Delp Hamilton was born March 26, 1879, at the home of his parents in Wells county, Indiana. He was the son of Rev. William Marshall Hamilton, being the fifth son and the eighth child born to this marriage. He leaves surviving him his aged mother, Mary E. Hamilton, and four brothers and four sisters. His father preceded him in death on August 18, 1917, and one sister, Sarah A. Roe, died July 25, 1897. There also are surviving him twenty-two nieces and nephews.

The early life of the deceased was spent on the farm of his father and he completed the common school course at the age of fourteen entering North Manchester College the next year, and took up the profession of teaching at the age of sixteen; he taught in the schools of Wells and Allen Counties, the High schools of Bluffton, Indiana, Rock Island, Illinois, and Dubuque, Iowa, teaching in all seven years. His later education was at the Indiana State Normal, and the Indiana University from which institution he graduated in the qear 1902 with the degree of A. B.; later he took up a fellowship in the University of Illinois and received the degree of M. A. in applied Chemistry.

His death occurred on March 11th, 1918.

SUMMERS—Angeline B. Brumbaugh entered upon her earthly pilgrimage near Randolph, Portage county, Ohio, July 11th., 1858, and entered into the joys of life eternal April 24, 1918, in the fifty-ninth year of her age.

She was married to Sylvanus Summers December 11, 1875, to which union six children were born. Her death leaves one son, three daughters, one sister, one brother and four grandchildren to sorrow at the parting; the husband and two sons having preceded her to the glory world.

Sister Summers was a consistent and faithful member of the First Brethren church of Canton, and a loyal supporter of all its enterprises. But her family will miss her, especially for she was indeed a true Christian mother, the point around which the home life of her family centered. But church and family rejoice together in the knowledge that she knew and loved her Savior.

On April 19th, 1918, she was, at her own request, anointed by her pastor, to whom she expressed the human desire for the continuation of physical life, but also the Christian resignation to the Divine will.

And so in quiet confidence in the righteousness of God's dealings we bow in submission and look for the coming of the day when all things shall be made plain, all broken hearts find surcease of pain, and all faithful souls receive the rewards of Godly living.

Funeral services were conducted at the Brethren church of Louisville, Ohio, April 26, in charge of the undersigned, assisted by Brethren Alvin Byers and George S. Baer. Burial in Union cemetery, near Louisville, awaiting the glorious second Advent.

DYOLL BELOTE.

OBER—Obediah S. Ober was born April 18, 1837, and died April 22, 1918. His age at death was 81 years and 4 days.

Brother Ober was an active member of the New Enterprise Pennsylvania church throughout its history. He was always faithful and was found at his post of duty. The membership of the church sustains a heavy loss in his absence, but his Christian influence is a constant inspiration for his life was spent in "doing good."

He leaves a wife and a number of children who shall miss his presence in the home circle.

Funeral by the writer, assisted by Rev. D. T. Detwiler of the Church of the Brethren.

EDWARD BYERS.

STRAKA—On April 17, 1918, Frank Mason Straka, only child of Mr. and Mrs. C. A. Straka, Milledgeville, Illinois, departed this life aged 18 years, 5 months and one day. He was confined to his bed since last October with an affliction that did not yield to the most skillful treatment. Ten weeks before his decease he was taken to Chicago where he was in a hospital for more than six weeks after which he was brought home. All that medical science and loving care and devotion could do was gladly administered. With his passing there ended the earthly career of one whose years were full of hope and promise. Though young in years, he lived long in thoughts and ideals. He was always ambitious to be and do good; and in him seemed the making of high citizenship and true manhood. He was a faithful member of the Brethren church and secretary of the Sunday school. His constant example in loyalty and devotion was always refreshing and inspiring. He uncomplainingly bore all his suffering with sublime Christian faith and fortitude. While his life has passed, its helpful influence remains with us as the seed perishes and the harvest enriches. May the great Comforter give the bereaved parents sustaining power and abiding peace.

THE WORD AS SEED

For many days the agricultural world has been busy handling seed. When Jesus was on earth he recognized its importance and did not hesitate to draw spiritual lessons from those who were sowing seed. Analogy is one of the simplest and clearest ways of teaching. In explaining one of his forceful parables he says, "The seed is the word of God" (Luke 8:11). Let us get the mind of God on this important subject.

Now, seed contains life. It will reproduce of its own kind. It may look dull and dead, but within is the life germ which under proper conditions will assert itself. Its vitality is only dormant, not dead. We are told that in Dorchester, England, about fifty years ago, an excavation was made in sinking a mine shaft, and about thirty feet below the surface of the earth the body of a man was found. In his stomach were raspberries in a perfect state of preservation. These berries were planted and a fine crop resulted. Coins found on the body showed that it had been dead 1,700 years. He doubtless met a sudden death after eating the berries, otherwise the digestive fluids of the stomach would have destroyed the life in them.

History informs us the Pyramids were built for the tombs for Egyptian kings. At death their bodies were embalmed, dried and wrapped in bandages and deposited in these tombs. A grain of wheat was once discovered in these bandages, preserved with the body. After 2,500 years of dormant life held by that little germ, it was planted and produced like other wheat.

Did Jesus teach that the word of God, like seed, contains life? He certainly did. "The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life." (John 6:63). "For the word of God is living, and active, and sharper than any two-edged sword, and piercing even to the dividing of soul and spirit, of both joints and marrow, and quick to discern the thoughts and intents of the heart" (Heb. 4:12). I do not see how it would be possible to declare in stronger terms that the Word, like seed, has life. Some one has said that if all the wheat in the world were ground into flour, except one grain, the price of the flour would be enormous. Yet this one grain would be worth far more than all that flour. Why? The flour is without life. It has been crushed out of it. But the grain of wheat has life in it and a bountiful harvest can soon be realized from that single grain. And the analogy is, with the Word faithfully preached and lived, spiritual harvests will soon be ripe, and the reapers will soon fill the garner of God with the golden sheaves—the souls of men.

But some one says, "The Word, the mere Word, is a dead letter, and before it can possess this life-giving power it must be energised by the Holy Spirit." There are at least two objections to this old-time theory—for theory it is, pure and simple. First, it is very unbecoming to speak of God's word as the "mere Word." The mind of God concerning us and eternity is couched in that Word. How would you feel for me to say of you, after you had told me a certain thing that I had only your "mere word' for it, and that it would take more than that to convince me? Would not this be a more hurtful reflection on your character? God and his Word are one. To make known his mind concerning sin and redemption cost the life of his dear Son. Is there no reliance to be placed in that Word until some other agency makes it worth while? When James says, "Receive with meekness the engrafted Word which is able to save your souls," did he mean it is only "able" sometimes? When the Governor sent a telegram changing the "decree of death" to imprisonment for life, did the sheriff and the warden have to sign the message before it had any power to free from death? Not at all. A dozen signatures would not increase its power. Likewise God does not need his Word O. K'd before it can be received as final. He can tell the truth the first time he tries it.

Second, the Master in the parable of the sower locates the trouble with non-production in each case with the soil, the heart, AND NOT WITH THE SEED, THE TRUTH. And Satan, that wise old serpent, also teaches the same thing. He stole the seed of the sower. If it was a "dead letter," why interfere with the seed? Ah, he knew better; he knew it possessed life-giving power, and he was busy in getting rid of that seed as soon as possible.

Then some one else says, "But the Spirit must precede the Word and prepare the heart for its reception." But the Master is clearly against THAT THEORY. Here is his word for it: "I will pray the Father and he will give you another Comforter, even the spirit of truth, WHOM THE WORLD CAN NOT RECEIVE." (John 14:17). The expression "the world" means the unconverted, and of these he says they "can not receive" it. In Acts 19, Paul says, "Have ye received the Holy Spirit since ye believed?" "SINCE YE BELIEVED," not to make you believers. "The gospel is the power of God unto salvation TO EVERY ONE THAT BELIEVETH." Paul in Gal. 4:6 says, "And because you are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts crying, Abba, Father." "BECAUSE YE ARE SONS," not to make you believers. Evidently, Paul did not think the Spirit preceded the gospel and prepared the way for its coming. Just the reverse: faith which results from hearing the truth preached, prepared the way for the reception of the Holy Spirit. In Eph. 1:13 Paul further says, "In whom also ye trusted, after that ye heard the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation; in whom also, AFTER THAT YE HAD BELIEVED, ye were sealed with the Holy Spirit of promise." The thought is this: The human heart is a filthy vessel; and before our Father can send into it the abiding Comforter, the Holy Spirit, the vessel must be cleansed by the gospel. "Now ye are clean through the word which I have spoken unto you" (John 15:3). The gospel of Pentecost looked to this very thing. Peter's sermon was what produced faith. For "when they heard this, they were pricked in their hearts, and cried out, 'men and brethren, what shall we do?'" And the answer of the man of God was, "Repent and be baptized, every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, AND YE SHALL RECEIVE THE GIFT OF THE HOLY GHOST." Faith was a factor, to change the heart; repentance was required to change the life; and baptism insisted upon by these gospel preachers, to change the relation of the individual from a worldly state to that of the people of God. And the grand consumation of it all was "THE GIFT OF THE HOLY SPIRIT."

Against the Goads

The Apostle Paul was not the only man who found in his life that it is hard to "kick against the goads." But there are many men who are not as willing as the Apostle was to cease the kicking when they discover the hurt. One of the puzzles of modern life is to understand why men who must know of the effect of certain harmful habits and practices insist on supporting them in the face of most positive evidence of their influence over both the character and efficiency of men.

In the matter of the use of alcoholic drinks it is no longer considered as primarily a moral question but it has become more of an economic question that is vital to the welfare of a people because of its effect upon their efficiency.

Men in authority must know, they can not help knowing, of the effect of even an occasional use of even the milder forms of alcoholic beverages and yet many of them will not yield to scientific conclusions and will insist and persist in kicking against the goads of scientific investigation and of actual experience and observation. Vice-Admiral Jellico of the British navy says, "Careful and prolonged tests have proved that the shooting efficiency of British gunners is thirty per cent poorer after the rum ration," and yet the British navy allows rum to be served to its members.

Since such demonstrations as this have been made in almost every walk and avenue of life we repeat that it is one of the mysteries of the twentieth century how intelligent people can support a traffic or a business, if they want to call it such, that has no good effect upon any who use it. There may be two sides to all questions but for a great many years we have been able to see but ONE side to the liquor question and after more than thirty years' observation we have not come to any other conclusion than we had thirty years ago and that is that no regulation will meet the requirements in the case and only total and absolute prohibition of the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors for beverages will answer the need of human society.

When some of the disciples of Jesus complained about the breaking of the alabaster box of ointment for his anointing and said it had better be sold for cash and the money given to the poor, the Lord justified the act of the woman by the statement that it was for his burial and therefore not a waste of material and not a waste of affection because he would not be with them long any more, but as for the poor they would have many an opportunity to minister to their needs for they should always be with them.

This is not decreeing poverty as the lot and portion of certain numbers of men and women and making it impossible for them to escape the decree, but it is a divine statement of FACT. It can not be said that Jesus approved the situation or the condition of everything of which he spoke in his ministry, and it is certain that he said or taught nothing that can make it appear that he favored the wealthy class of the people or condemned those who must always appear around the ragged edges of poverty, though he on frequent occasions pointed out some of the blessings of poverty and the dangers of riches.

Jesus never attempted to reconstruct society in such a manner that there would be or could be no poor among mankind. To make such a condition possible more than a reconstruction of society would be necessary; it would be necessary to reconstruct the human race and make all men perfect, not in a moral sense, but in a physical and intellectual sense. The poor are here and the poor will always be here so long as one man is stronger than another, not that might makes right, but that might achieves success. The moral or the sociological phase of it is an altogether different matter. Many men have had dreams of a society where human poverty shall be abolished and they have attempted to make their dreams come true. Some of the socialistic teachings of certain Russian agitators apparently have had this object in view. How well they have succeeded may be understood in a measure when it is known that in Petrograd a ham costs $300.00, cheese and butter about $10.00 per pound, and eggs $9.00 per dozen. The socialism of the Trotzky type as applied in Russia has not done much to alleviate the poverty of the poor. We would not say this is the cause of the poverty, but it is most certainly not able to relieve it. It will require a more stable government than Trotzky or his kind can offer to the world to relieve the poor through any political action. The relief that must come to the poor will be the relief that comes through the establishment of Christian principles in a social body that recognizes its responsibility in caring for the weak in its midst and thus relieving the consequences of poverty. When we talk about removing the CAUSES of poverty we are talking about an accomplishment that is in a large measure beyond human power. Poverty has been called all kinds of names to signify its reality and its nature, many of which we may not accept as really representative, but whatever else we may call it, it is human weakness, and can be overcome only by the strong bearing the burdens of the weak, and the duty of doing this is a fundamental Christian doctrine.

The Insufficiency of Self

All men may not admit that "no man liveth unto himself,' and that no man dieth unto himself," but the admission or the denial of a statement or principle by man has absolutely nothing to do with its correctness or its truthfulness . The truth can not be altered or killed by anything man can do or say. It may be crushed to earth for a time but as has been said in the words of old, "it shall rise again."

Some of us may feel that we are not dependent upon the achievements and works of others for our comforts and our prosperity in life, but even the most talented and the most favored could have few more human comforts than the savage were it not for the help he receives from the labors of others.

It has been said of some nations that a high wall might be built around them, shutting them off from all the rest of mankind and still they could get along in comfort and meet all their requirements and supply all their needs. In a measure this may be true of such a nation as the United States but even in so great a country as this it would be exceedingly inconvenient to be shut off from the rest of the world, its products and the products of its people.

Perhaps no nation has claimed to have greater power within itself and to be more self sufficient than the German Empire, but it has been shown that few nations have drawn to a larger extent upon the resources and skill and invention of other peoples than has Germany herself. The Kaiser is reported to have said, "It is time to abolish all that is foreign." That may sound patriotic to some, but it is the patriotism of egotistical and ignorant despotism. The Chinese Boxers undertook long ago to drive out of China everything that was foreign. The effect of such a policy is perhaps best represented in this large but helpless nation. One of the oldest in the world, is yet one of the weakest, and this is very largely true because China has refused to accept the help and knowledge of and an association with other people and with other nations and governments.

Germany might be able to abolish everything foreign without reverting back to the condition of China but we are sure she would suffer untold injury were this condition to actually prevail within her borders. The Wall Street Journal has pointed out that if Germany were to abolish everything foreign she would have to abolish the airplane, telegraph, telephone, submarine, quick-firing guns, automobile, anilin dyes, locomotives, gas and steam engines, and about everything connected with Germany's military and industrial life, except poison-gas and treachery."

For years the world had been taught that much of the industrial, scientific and inventive genius of the world was "made in Germany." Now we know better; we now know that Germany is really strong along the line of "applied sciences," that is along the line of applying what the brains of other nations and other people have produced. This has brought strength to Germany but it has not given superiority to her people and should such a thing as a super-man be found he would not be found among the subjects of the Kaiser. But self-sufficiency belongs to neither man nor to nations of men.

NOW THEN DO IT.—II Samuel 3:18

Conducted by Charles A. Bame

No Program Page

Twice recently, we were disappointed in that there was no "Program Page." I hated very much to see that. Several of the Directors of this Program have pledged themselves a number of times that if they could help it, there would be no such thing happen. I had so planned; I have again and again promised myself that if there was anything that was demanded of me, for the sake of the Program, nothing but unavoidable circumstances could thwart my resolve, to do the utmost, but,

Somebody Failed

I do not know who it was and do not expect to inquire. Save to tell you who are interested, that I had made a program of writers for the time of my shifting from my pastorate at North Manchester and the time that I should be well settled, on my farm here for the summer. Somewhere there was a slipping of cogs and the machine did not rattle at all. But I hope that the pastors are not failing. I hope the churches are not. Soon, we shall call for the last report. Get ready in rapid time for the final count of the year.

Can't Do It Here.

I know it is mighty easy for the pastors of small churches to say, "Well, we can not do very much with the Program here." Yet, right from some of the smallest of the churches will we get some of the best reports. "With God, all things are possible." Are we not with him in this. Is he not with us. Sure he is; He is with every one who is trying to make the Kingdom come with more rapid pace. And, is that not the purpose of the Program? You know well, it is.

A Fine Proof.

Just look at what the congregations are doing with the Ashland Endowment! With what fear and trepidation did the Trustees finally launch the Endowment feature! How long did Doctor Furry preach it up! And, who ever thought that the church would go away over the top like a whirlwind with that project? That shows that, when the church is awakened to a sense of the need, she is ready to get results. Now, I'd like to have provisions made that each Director could take the field as does Beachler, even if he could not "blow it up" quite so well. Of course, that is out of the question; but it does seem to me that provision might be made next year through some of the Boards or several of them, so that some man might go among the churches and show and help them to get results with the whole Program.

Good Missionary Work.

What better missionary work could be done than to have a good live fellow among the churches launching them into the spirit of missionary giving? What better bringing of responsibility to the churches and pastors than to have them know that brother Expert of the Program Directors is coming soon to measure them on the Program? I wonder if some of them would not copy Johnstown, and have it done before he got there, and make him talk like Beachler did about Johnstown!

"If We Only Could."

Now, somebody is saying, "If we only could; if we only could." When the chorus they should sing is, "If we only would, If we only would." There can not be the slightest doubt that this is entirely feasible, possible and to me, it seems altogether necessary to the reaching of the Goals by 1920.

1920 comes apace.
1920 starts the race.
Now, we're trying out for speed,
That will meet our larger need.

1920 is the year,
When to Goals we'll answer "Here."
Then, the pace we'll set for aye,
With all Goals, we run away.

Take It Seriously.

It may be that many, when they first voted for the Program, thought that it was simply one of those flashes that flash and then go out. Well, you were fooled, then. The Program is going through. Some of the churches have set themselves the standard of the Program and are going after it as if they meant to believe that it is better not to vow than not to keep the vow. The serious thing is, that every church is not doing it. No use to smile out of one corner of the mouth and let it pass. It is to be done and it will be done by a vast majority of the churches and the ones that do not try, will feel mighty badly when at the close of the term of enlistment, many of the churches at Conference—the largest in the history of the Brotherhood, that 1920 conference—received a beautiful wall chart that will say something about being a Gold Star church in the greatest four years of the church's history.

Who's To Blame?

Well, some of the pastors can answer that right now. Some carping fellows can not be led, coaxed, shamed nor driven to do anything that they do not originate. Their program is the only one. This is the one for all Brethren churches for the Brethren churches originated it. If means are used to get it accomplished, let it offend the other fellow rather than you for you can have your part of the Program so well executed, that anything that might offend cannot offend you because yours has been done.

Symmetrically.

"Your Whole Body, Soul and Spirit," be preserved wholly, is the rest of it, I believe. That is the way to be preserved and if we grow that way, we shall be preserved that way. The Program is presumed to be the line of expansion for Brethren churches. None think, I presume, that we ought to make every attainable Goal of the program this year; but the difference between what we think we ought to do and the thing we really do, is often too great to be right. Aspiration may not always keep pace with accomplishment; Indeed, it ought not; but aspiration to do our part in this symmetrical development of ourselves, can not be born of the evil one, and therefore, is of God.

"Go On, Sir, Go On."

Thus we are told, an ancient teacher wrote to a pupil who had all but solved a difficult problem. We pass it on to the struggling churches and pastors. It may not be quite possible for you to reach all the Goals. It may be possible for you to reach but three or four this year; but, keep your eye on the goals and your church thinking of them. Keep thinking of the symmetrical development of the sister churches and what you shall miss if you are not a part to the extent of your possibilities. Go on, sir, "Go on to perfection.

BAME.

"Leaving Your Mark on the World"

DR. J. CAMPBELL WHITE, President of Wooster College

In a most forceful and masterful manner, in which he made a very strong and earnest appeal to members of the graduating class of Ashland College to leave their mark on the world by following a plan of human life as God in his infinite wisdom and love has prepared for them and identifying themselves with world conditions and problems, Dr. J. Campbell White president of the Wooster college, delivered an eloquent and powerful address before the Class of 1918, the college faculty and a large and most appreciative audience, on Wednesday evening.

The address was given by Dr. White in the First Presbyterian church, the auditorium of which was completely filled.

American flags and potted plants on the rostrum furnished the appropriate decorations for this, a noteworthy occasion in the history of the local college. At 8:30 o'clck, Mrs. Geo. B. Smith rendered on the organ a processional, as the college faculty and members of the class marched down the two main aisles in the front of the church, where seats had been reserved for them—the faculty occupying the pulpit with the speaker. While all remained standing, the audience then joined in singing "America," after which Dr. W. D. Furry, president of Ashland college led in prayer. A male quartette, composed of Fred R. Vanator, Edwin Boardman, J. E. Potts and Lester King with Miss Marie Lichty at the piano. A few timely and pleasing remarks were made by President Furry, who stated that the college was in the midst of the closing exercises of another school year with the past year having been replete with marked achievements and success and with a bright future before it.

Prof. Edwin E. Jacobs, who recently had the honor of having the title of Dean of Liberal Arts bestowed upon him, presented in well-chosen words the speaker of the evening.

In opening his address Dr. White said that he felt very much at home in Ashland because of the very close connection of this city with the origin of Wooster college, of which he is now the president and for the further fact that his mother and father came from Ashland county. He paid a tribute to Dr. John Robinson whose name he noticed on a marble tablet on the east wall of the church, who for so many years was pastor of this church and who had been so slosely affiliated with the Wooster university. Dr. White then congratulated this community in having a college in its midst, emphasizing that our people should realize the great value of a college here. It always seemed to him, that there was something different in the atmosphere of a town having a Christion institution of this kind. He also congratulated the trustees of the Ashland college for the standing of this institution and its marked success, and said that the fact that the student body is the same this year as last is remarkable, for most colleges over the country have been cut down from 20 to 50 per cent by reasons of the war.

Dr. White declared that the colleges in America have been rendering a wonderful service to the nation and said that if it had not been for the great work the colleges have been doing we would not now have the efficient officers and soldiers in the field.

Referring to the theme of "Leaving your mark in the world," Dr. White said it was possible for all the graduates and every one of us to leave our mark on the world—by helping to lift up the world and making it better by having lived in it. Is it not true, he asked, that a very large proportion of the men and women of the church are spending their time in doing unimportant things, when they should be investing in things worth while and for the divine purpose in life. It is possible for us to prevent the possibility of failure in life. Great is the tragedy of those who, having a college education, yet fail to take advantage of their opportunity—fail to find their place and do the work as set forth in the plan of God. No one ever became great who has not identified himself with some great cause, thought or work. No one ever made anything great in life unless he has been identified with world conditions and world problems we are to solve, and there are no problems too great or too deep on which we should not invest our lives. We are God's poets created to the work He has prepared for us with infinite wisdom and love. Every one's life is a plan of God, but we must discover that plan. God does not reveal his plan merely to satisfy man's curiosity. We do not need to go around the world to find his blue-prints or plans of our life. We have them right here, but we must decide in advance to fulfil those plans no matter where. Obedience to God and his will is the origin of spiritual vision. While it is true that every one's life is God's plan, yet he never forces anyone to do that which he plans, for he is not in the forcing business. If we fail to fulfill God's plan we spoil it—and too many of us are doing this. It is the love and will of God that we accept or set aside his plan by forming a plan of our own and thereby take way all our talent possibilities. Dr. White said that he hoped no member of the class will come to the conclusion that any plan of his or her own will ever equal God's plan for the development and usefulness of the human being. The planting of the truth of the kingdom of God is absolutely dependent upon human agency. God stands to fulfill every promise of his, and he is doing everything he can to live up to the word. When God proposes a cure for our maladies he does it with a thorough diagnosis and analysis of our case, and that cure is fund in the word of God. People must think wrong, before they can do wrong, and this day and hour affords a wonderful opportunity for Christian thinkers. We should work under God's influences and inspiration and not yield to ignoble impulses. Perfection of character is the decision to do right, though the heavens fall.

Dr. White emphasized there are two great questions uppermost in the world today. First, what needs to be done in this world? Second, where can I take hold to get those needs and problems solved? God will solve those questions through us.

The speaker, in touching on the causes of the present war, declared that we have had enough German materialism to last for a million years. The greatest enemy in the world war is not the German soldier in the field but the Prussian state of mind.

Dr. White stated that in practically every church there was on display a service flag with from one to twenty-five stars, each star representing a young man—the flower of American manhood from the church—who are enlisted in service in this war. It took less than two years, he said, for the church to have from one to twenty-five of her young men go forth to war, but in nineteen centuries only 1 to 2,500 have gone forward to deliver the word of God and to prevent war. The expenditure of money to carry on this war is stupendous, the amounts not being in thousands and millions of dollars but billions, and the speaker declared that two of those billions of dollars that have been spent in the war would evangelize the world. He declared that Christianity would be the greatest factor in preventing a greater war in the future than the present world war, stupendous as it is.

In conclusion, Dr. White said that when the nations of the world walk in God's way, then the war will end. Only a miraculous spread of Christianity can prevent conflicts in the future with parties of the world not now in the conflict. The Christian college must work for Christianity to make war forever unnecessary, and he commended every one of the class of college graduates that they develop their own possibilities to the utmost in this most critical and stormy era that has come into the world and make sure that they get into practical working relation to the Redeemer of the world.

Dr. J. Allen Miller pronounced the benediction.—Ashland Press.

Salutatory

M. MAE. SMITH, A. B.

As a representative of the class of nineteen hundred, eighteen the honor has fallen to me to speak the words of welcome of the class of 1918. The occasion which brings us together is the one event of our college days about which we have thought more than any one single occurrence. For indeed it means the culmination of two, four or more years' work in the fundamentals of real living. It means for all of us that within our own thoughts, ideals, motives, ambitions and conduct there has come a sifting. It means that some of our youthful visions and plans have been buried and in their stead have been resurrected newer and larger understandings of real service, actuated by more mature judgment and thought. It means that while we have barely touched the fringes of the vast and enlarging field of knowledge, we have at least established a point of contact and an avenue of approach from which we can intelligently proceed. It furthermore means that from this hour we shall be considered as college men and college women in our own communities. And in consequence of this fact no doubt our word will oftentimes be final and authorative. With this two-fold meaning of the hour,—namely the reviving of the past and the opening of the future, we stand at the very completion of our undergraduate days, thankful for the heritage from our years here and happy in the sane and normal outlook for our future life.

Our commencement hour for this year nineteen hundred eighteen carries with it more significance and certainty of purpose than any year hitherto. It is the first year in the history of Ashland College that commencement festivities have been held under the heavy clouds of war. Just one year ago today a program similar to this war carried out under its threatening clouds. But our two months' entry into the conflict had not revealed its true meaning. Now our service flag speaks for itself,—and Ashland has felt and has answered. We meet for the first time this year in commencement when a number of our men have donned the simple olive-drab uniform, thus placing their all on the altar of their country. Of this number the graduating class of nineteen hundred eighteen is proud to claim nine members. Of these nine three would have completed their work with us, while the others were classified with us for two or more years in special courses. But they with other of Ashland's sons have counted their lives not dear unto themselves and today they are in the service of the "Stars and Stripes," in England, on the Western Front or in our own cantonments. Brave, strong, and splendid examples of manhood they left us in the choicest days of their college life to give what they deemed their best. And no one here this morning dare question their sacrifice as young men to whom life is as precious as it is to any of us. I doubt not but at this very morning's hour amidst the many duties of the soldier, to some of them there comes the thought of this exercise. And dare we imagine further,—that it must carry with it a sting of disappointment,—disapponitment at ideals unrealized and plans not materialized, But this is momentary and is forgotten in the joy of service, immediate and vast in its scope. The memories of our association with them are pleasant and we are proud to own them as former classmates. We praise them for the men they are; we respect them for their magnanimous spirit of devotion; we do honor to them for their valor and courage. But our praise must not stop with them alone. Millions of others are making a sacrifice like this. Now the number of men under arms is estimated at forty millions. They too have been called away from their productive pursuits and actively engaged in a fierce work of destruction. Eight million three hundred thousand have laid down their lives, not including those who have lost their lives through disease. Nearly seven million are in prisoner-of-war camps. An equal number are in hospitals and practically three million are handicapped for life. After all figures speak but little; pain, anxiety, bereavement and suffering speak more. Habitations of men have become smoking ruins and vast areas that were once gardens are deserts today. And yet, we do them honor for all this.

But our thoughts of praise do not come unaccompanied. Under the shadow of the dark tragedy other questions crowd themselves into our minds,—Why should all this be? Why should ideals, ambitions and dreams be shattered in a moment? Is it worth while? Will humanity realize sufficient good from all this to justify this loss of life and property? To what purpose is this waste? Only one answer,—that a new world order may issue and pravail—an order in which true principles of Christian Democracy will prevail, in which right will be set above might, duty above privilege, co-operation above rivalry, the things of the spirit above the material goods, service above selfishness, ministering above being ministered unto, an order in which nations will recognize the Golden Rule in their dealings with each other. This is no Utopia. It will and must come. The old world is dying—something new must take its place. The world will be new again—must be new, for death and destruction have claimed the old order. And we are moving into the new world order through blood and fire. Universal disintegration is in our midst.

In conclusion may I merely introduce the theme of the hour —"Old Worlds for New" and suggest what may follow? All evil will not be immediately annihilated in the present world order; even good may not be recognized as such. But autocracy, in which one is lord of all, must absolutely give place to democracy in which the lowliest man is entitled to the highest good of life. The individual must no longer be recognized as a means to an end. He must be the end in himself. Solemn treaties must be safeguarded and looked upon as something more than mere scraps of paper. Ideals of militarism and its form of government must forever and forever be crushed. No vestige of unlimited sovereignty dare remain. National right dare no longer exist on national might. Instead of these there must come the "society of nations" in which faith will be kept, aid will be rendered and international friendships will be respectful and ethical. Right, justice, and good will must stand above and restrain selfish might. Each national and racial group must have the right to self-directing development. And lastly the brotherhood of mankind must no longer be a fair and empty phrase; it must be given a structure of force and reality. Nations must realize their common life and effect a workable partnership.

World peace can come only as the fruit and product of international righteousness. Peace is the outcome of justice; justice of law; law of political organization. In the peace of the new world order the first step therefore is political organization. And likewise the principles of democracy must obtain in financial and industrial relations as well. And finally there must be embodied through the ministry of the church, the one positive factor most needed,—the upbuilding, redemptive, vitalizing force of the life and principles of Jesus Christ. On the reconstruction of these three forces of our industrial life,—political, industrial and moral or religious does the new world order rest. Their disintegration has come,—their reorganization shall determine the character of the new world.

It is at the dawn of such an era that our graduating class stands this morning, each of us happy in the service one life can render. And once again we welcome you to this exercise which witnesses the completion of our college work and marks the hour which sends us out into a world which urgently calls for real men and women.

The New Industrial Order

LUCILE TEETER, A. B.

The close of every war sees a change in the economic life of the nation, or nations involved. At this time when every phase of life presents such varied and complex problems, we may await also a New Industrial order. Whether or not, as asserted by some, the causes of the war were largely economic and due to the necessity or the desire of Germany for commercial supremacy, yet it is not to be doubted that the end of the war will bring about economic changes in harmony with the principles for which the Allies contend.

As stated by Walter Weyl, "the industrial goal of Democracy is the socialization of industry." The trend of economic life in the last half century had produced the monopoly and a sentiment against any interference of society or the government, that is the theory of "laissez faire" or free competition, had been the ruling force. The few profit-sharing schemes and government investigations of recent years have given the impetus to the further socialization of industry. With the entrance of the United States into the war, it was recognized from the experience of England and France, that only under government supervision of the essentials of life could the war be carried on successfully. Thus we have already become accustomed in the last year to social control of the necessities of life. The last important step toward this stage has been the assumption of the management of the railroads by the United States Government.

However in this new order it is not government ownership and regulation for itself, that is desired, but it is only a means of viewing industry from the standpoint of society rather than from the standpoint of some individual. Socialization is a point of view raher than a definite programme for the industrial world.

Thus it may mean a great many different things, government operation or even monopoly, as in the case of the postal system, profit-sharing, regulative legislation and taxation, each providing in the best way for the group rather than for the individual. The controversy between government regulation or operation will be decided when it is found which method proves to be the more efficient.

The old phrase "business must be independent of politics" has completely broken down. This would mean the subordination of society to business which regulation of Railroad rates and bank inspection are examples of the effort to oppose. Indeed, public sentiment and the social welfare have demanded and in some cases succeeded in the destruction of certain harmful industries as the liquor business and gambling.

Thus in the future we shall see the social good advanced by these various means. To the state, the Association of consumers, the Trade Union and to widespread publicity will fall the task of accomplishing the socialization of industry .

The second great change to be noticed will be an increasing tendency toward moral standards of trade and business reaching the level maintained in other relationships. Moreover the principle of "laissez faire" must be replaced by some principle involving less bitter conflict between various nations or the individuals of a state.

In international relationships the same nation which sends missionaries and social workers for the uplift of an undeveloped race accomplishes it's economic advancement by exploiting the ignorance and credulity of these backward peoples. Before the war it was often staetd that the world was approaching a brotherhood except in matters of business, which had failed to strive toward this moral standard.

This attitude is the logical outcome of the "laissez faire" theory, sometimes known as non-intervention, but better described as non-responsibility. Benjamin Kidd states that this international process in trade and industry tending to the lowest conditions in human labor as the result of the irresponsible scramble for gains, forms one of the greatest problems of the Western Democracy. With the entrance of India and Japan in to industry the principles of the higher developed peoples are through this policy of free competition obliged to be reduced to the common denominator of these less civilized competitors. Thus in the new world this tendency must be overcome by elevating the principles of business to the moral standard of other activities of society.

Perhaps the most important change which the New Industrial order presents is a new conception of goods and of personality. Property and wealth must be subordinated to the individual who is to be recognized as the end and not the means. The glaring example of the old order with the individual recognized as a means is found in Germany and in her method of fighting as contrasted with the Allies' greater regard for human life. A society which places goods or wealth above the individual is putting means before end and is therefore immoral. The new conception foretells numerous changes in our industrial life. It demands a high collective morality; there must be a more general benefit of dividends, enforcement of laws for the safety, justice and uplift of the worker, and wealth devoted to education and social benefit rather than to private luxury.

Thus, in three ways at least, we may expect an altering of the present industrial order; in the socialization of industry, a new economic standard embodying a higher morality and a new conception of goods and the value of the individual. It may come only by slow degrees, for the established order of the business of the world cannot be changed with one effort. Yet in the light of the new and widespread democracy and principles for which the Allies are giving their all, there must come inevitably, in closo relation with these ideals of government, also, the New Industrial Order .

Valedictory

E. MARIE LICHTY, A. B.

Four years ago we were matriculates of Ashland College. Today we become her graduates. But our graduation means also our matriculation into the actual School of Experience. Whether we are fully prepared to graduate today depends altogether upon our willingness and readiness to matriculate in the world which is waiting to receive us and set our basis for us.

Today the test really begins. For, in truth, we are only students who have come to the threshold of commencement. Our opportunities for academic preparation have passed. We cannot expect maturity or the content of Solomon's wisdom to fall miraculously into our possession. If we have awaited such we have done so despite the constant sign posts of warning. Truly, the test begins now and our first answer must be written.

The preponderous task of a challenging world has been set before us with a new emphasis. It sounds inviting. It seems just. It appears sane in its demands. It offers new edvantages. It insures a broader old world, one more demanding, politically, industrially and religiously.

It is well to listen. It is blessed to understand such claims. But dare we as students of a Christian institution be content with attention or mere comprehension? If our four years here have meant anything they now mean action. Passiveness should be the brand of the slacker. Our answer to this challenge must be positive.

Can a view of world conditions leave us thoughtless or unsympathetic? With a changing world order not only before us but upon us it is significant that we be concerned. "The United States of the World"—it sounds to some as only the empty deliverance of some philosopher's dream. But what else can we expect when four-fifths of the world is at war against the enemy of peace and right and freedom. J. Lovell Murray contents, "To gain America's independence, to defeat oppression and tyranny was indeed a great cause. But to defend the very foundation of liberty and humanity, to spend the lives and fortunes of this generation that our descendants may be freed from the calamity of war and the fear of war so that the energies and billions of treasure now devoted to the instruments and plans of destruction may henceforth be given to fruitful works of peace and progress, to the betterment of the conditions of all people,—that is the highest cause for which any people ever unsheathed its sword." Devotion to this ideal preceded the act but now that we are in action we must begin to gather the threads of the entire loom of democracy and make fast the binding with unity and purpose lest our sacrificial conquest be in vain.

With the destined movement toward democracy and the development of a new internationalism we behold some of the first manifestations of the new order. A general restlessness pervades the nations and we are fast linking our national life into a larger life of all nations. Brotherhood has taken on a new meaning. Beyond the realms of secret cabals and labor unions there reaches a larger association into a more real brotherhood.

The industrial goal of democracy is the socialization of industry. The advent of government ownership forcasts the realization of similar tendencies. Morality brought into the order will dispel the laissez faire theory and the principles of uncontrolled competition and will establish a business morality equal to other moral standards. And too, in this realm we think of the new conception of goods that is bound to come. Individual workmen are to be ends and not means. Manhood and its value shall be increasingly recognized. Property and wealth we include in this program not as domineering factors but rather as parts that shall be subordinated to personality. It reminds us of a Christian brotherhood. And surely if our conception of the new relationship is to mean anything it dare not omit this essential.

But we would not be content with a brotherhood founded upon a material basis or with a mercenary Golden Rule. Both must be established upon a foundation with living authority. And for this we can find no solution other than the church and the gospel. A renovation, we grant, must take place within. But when we think of this present world collapse we cannot but place its responsibility upon the failure of the church to function through the state. We do not propose the church as an asset to some particular function with final authority but rather hold that she should be the recipient of divine authority and convey the interpretation through service. The church must speak from above. Her task is a spiritual one and her resources are unlimited. As some one has said, "The church has failed to possess her possessions." We have been content with too small a program. We have forgotten the words of our Lord, "Behold, I will do a new thing for you." If the Christian church of today would lay claim to those dynamic forces and by obedience open her life to their coming, nothing could resist the triumphant sweep of her campaign of love among the needy nations of the world .

And this is the generation for which we are responsible. It is well to think and speak in world terms but these must be translated into action.

The need is great. The wound of the world is deep. But our part appears in the remedy. We need never despair of a share in a world task though the work looms so much larger than our petty opinions can ever consummate . The call is urgent and distinctly individual. Here appears the stage upon which these forces which we control can play in their proper roles,—not for the spectacular but rather for the human betterment of this world which we would help mould in the cast of a better kingdom. The challenge is direct. It sounds forth today as a splendid conclusion to our college days. It demands that we as student citizens begin payment upon our four-year accumulating debt.

We are charged with youth and enthusiasm. Our lives are really before us. Surely, a world task calls for the enlistment of one of the world's best virtues,—constructive enthusiasm. Not for one moment would we dwell in the futile dream of going forth to right every wrong or to subordinate every form of tyranny. Moreover we do not speak with a miraculous change in mind. Rather we think of the long painful years of readjustment and slow changes toward a better reign after a laborious period of reconstruction. We realize that we are among those who step out at the very beginning of this work,—among those to whom comes the opportunity of laying the foundation. The work must be saturated with wisdom and charged with virtue lest the end be a reproach and result in a cataclysm similar to this of our time. No, we may not even be permitted to share in many parts of this noble reconstruction but what we are privileged to do, must be done as heroically as they went forth, who today are not here in person but in spirit and in the emblem of the blue star on the field of white. It will be ours to follow prudent leadership and to respect experienced dictation. But to whatever charges we are called we must answer with the whole of our enthusiasm, which we trust is a bit more constructive through our four years' residence here.

We are not unmindful of exceptional advantages. We have received a college course at the hands of this college. Our academic affiliations have oftimes engaged our attention and drawn it from the activities of the outside world. But it must not have been so held in vain. We have learned theories, we have worked with theories but not for the sake of theories. Nevertheless it is timely that we use them seriously. Here we have gleaned broader associations, deeper appreciations of the past, worthier ideals out of our more confused ideas, and a direction toward the good and the beautiful,—toward the righteous. We have so often accepted all these almost forgetting that there is an especial cause for thanks. We are members of no ordinary college. We are members of a Christian college. Oh, what a heritage that fact brings with it. It creates new responsibilities in lieu of past benefits, it enshrouds our Ashland with a significant ,and makes us think with a new meaning of those words we have so often sung:

The college I love best is Ashland
She stands for the truth that makes free,
And life is made better at Ashland;
Oh, Ashland's the college for me.

And for that truth for which she lives we choose to live. Our purposes dare not be mitigated. Our lives must be living epistles of our appreciation of the last few years.

And yet we feel our weakness to serve with power without divine guidance. A new meaning has come in Christian principles, —principles of him whom we must serve and accept as our source of power. Our relationship with him must be combined with a growing friendship. Submission must be ours as was that of our poet friend who wrote:

O living will that shall endure
When all that seems must suffer shock,
Rise in the spiritual rock,
Flow through our deeds and make them pure

That we may lift from out the dust
A voice as unto him who hears

A cry above the unconquered years,
To one that with us works and trust

With faith that comes of self-control,
The truths that never can be proved,
Until we close with all we loved
And all we flow from, soul in soul.

To us then who must quit these halls today as students and return tomorrow as alumni, there comes the necessity for a farewell. Emotion may be strong but we would rise above mere feeling and translate our expression into service. Would it not be far more fitting to go from here and by our lives further the good name of our school and bring credit to those who have so unselfishly labored with us and for us, rather than to release all our sentiment in an immediate leave-taking? So many influences are conspicuous benefactors which obligate us to be successful and to meet the world with a determined will for right. To these we address ourselves in a few farewell words.

Our minds today are under the spell of two forces, memory and hope. Our memories are already cherished so let us go forth with a new courage that future memories may be as pleasantly written. The future days stretch out to us for a solution with our parts and abilities. With the sacred background of the responsibilities and conveniences of the last four years, of the leadership of our president, of the solicitude of our faculty, of the cherished plans of our parents, and finally of the ideals of old Ashland, we dare not progress into the foreground with anything less than honest efforts to win. Remembering that "Not failure but low aim is crime" let us accept our charge to go forth in all the earnestness with which it is given. What a valiant charge it is this year and how we shall reverence it as we think again of the old refrain:

Old college home, old college home,
The years may stray and fade away,
But faithful, true, to Ashland U,
Thy sons and daughters will remain.

The Sunday School

Something for Pastors, Sunday School Superintendents and Teachers

I very much regret that the urgency of other duties and the pressure of business in all the departments of our work have made next to impossible the issuing of a special circular letter announcing the unique features of the next quarter's Sunday school lessones. I am gratified, however, that through the courtesy of the Editor of the Brethren Evangelist this page is at my disposal.

I cheerfully accept this courtesy because of the conviction that I have something to present here that can not but be of special interets to all our pastors, Sunday school superintendents, teachers, other officers, and all Sunday school workers.

Never before did the Sunday school have the opportunity for the study of TOPICAL Uniform Lessons; and never before did our schools have prepared for them a series of topical studies of more vital interest to all Christian and non-Christian people. I make this statement advisedly, fully persuaded that after a careful examination of the facts you will endorse the statement.

Can you think of a more vital, a mort important subject than the general title of the lessons for the next quarter—twelve studies IN THE CHRISTIAN LIFE? These subjects have been most carefully selected and are supported by equally carefully selected passages of scripture, together with numerous additional material for reading during the week. They touch almost every phase of the Christian Life, emphasizing those means of grace which make for the growth and development of the highest type of Christian living. It is indeed a series of most timely studies,— from the BEGINNING OF THE CHRISTIAN LIFE to its final crowning victory through Jesus Christ whose we are and whom we serve.

To give the reader an idea of what this course of studies includes I herewith attach the General Title of each of the twelve lessons:

I BEGINNING THE CHRISTIAN LIFE. John 1 : 35-51; Acts 16: 13-34.

II READING GOD'S WORD. Acts 8: 26-39; Psalm 19: 7-11.

III PRAYING TO GOD. Luke 11: 1-13; Psalm 145; 18, 19.

IV CHRISTIAN OBEDIENCE. Matthew 4: 18-22; John 14: 22-24; James 1: 22-27.

V CHRISTIAN GROWTH. Luke 2: 42-52; 2 Pet. 1: 5-8.

VI CHRISTIAN HELPFULNESS. Luke 10: 25-37; Gal. 6: 1-10.

VII WORKING IN THE CHURCH. Acts 2: 41-47; 4: 32-35; 6: 2-4.

VIII CHRISTIAN TESTIMONY. Luke 12: 8-12; James 1: 26, 27.

IX CHRISTIAN GIVING. Luke 6: 30-38; 21: 1-4.

X CONQUERING EVIL. (Temperance) 1 Kings 21: 1-29; Eph. 5: 6-21; 1 Cor. 16: 13.

XI WINNING THE WORLD FOR CHRIST. Matt. 5: 13-16; 28: 18-20; Acts 1 : 6-10.

XII FRUITS OF THE CHRISTIAN LIFE. Matt. 25: 14-30; 5: 1-12.

But, you will ask, How can these lessons be adapted to Primary and Junior Minds? Can these young minds be made to understand what it means to lead a Christian life? Most assuredly so. Is it unreasonable to believe that even a child may know what it means to live as Jesus lived and as he would have us to live? In all my experience in the preparation of Sunday school lesson helps and their adaptation to the different grades from the Primary up, I have never worked with a series of lessons so easily adapted to the grades as this series in the CHRISTIAN LIFE.

But the arrangement of the lessons, the additional material and lesson passages, their adaptation to the various grades, can be made clearer by explaining and giving in outline a concrete example. For this purpose I have selected Lesson 1, which is a fair sample of all the others. Given in outline, with the various special topics through the grades, it is as follows:

LESSON I—July 7

BEGINNING THE CHRISTIAN LIFE. John 1. 35-51; Acts 16. 13-34. (Prints Acts 16. 13-15, 25-34.)

Golden Text: He that will, let him take the water of life freely. Rev. 22. 17.

Additional Material for Teachers: Acts 2. 37-47; 8. 26-40; Rom. 5. 1-11.

PRIMARY TOPIC: Finding a Friend. John 1. 35-51. (Emphasis on the approachableness of Jesus.)

Memory Verse: We love him, because he first loved us. 1 John 4. 19.

Memory Verses: John 1. 40, 41.

INTERMEDIATE-SENIOR TOPIC: The Christian Life and How to Begin it. Acts 16. 13-15, 25-34; John 35-41.

....Additional Material: Matt. 25. 31-46; John 15. 4-16.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S AND ADULT TOPIC: Conditions of Discipleship. Acts 16. 13-15, 25-34; 2 Tim. 3. 14, 15.

1. Considering everything else secondary—friends, wealth, comfort. Luke 14. 33; Matt. 10. 38.
2. Faith and acceptance—believing God is. Heb. 11. 6; John 14. 6.
3. Obedience—willing to know the will of the Father. Mark 3. 34, 35; Rom. 6. 16.

The reader will be pleased to learn that the entire twelve lessons for the quarter are thus arranged and printed in a beautiful eight-page pamphlet, together with special instructions as to methods of procedure in the study and preparation of the lessons. These pamphlets will prove invaluable to pastors, superintendents, teachers, and adult Bible classes. Every adult member of your school will want a copy for quick reference. It is the most convenient thing we have ever issued.

Your order for literature for the coming quarter will be incomplete unless this pamphlet is included. If you have already ordered your literature, a post card will bring you the number desired. The price is so low that it is scarcely to be considered, namely, ONE DOLLAR per hundred copies, in less quantities 15 cents per dozen.

Will the reader please take sufficient time to consider what such a series of lesson studies, if faithfully followed, must mean to the church, the Sunday school, and the community? Having personally prepared the special helps through all the grades, including The Brethren Teacher, I am justified in handing down an opinion, at least, as to the results that must necessarily follow such a course of study.

For one thing it will make plain to us,—to children, to boys and girls, and to adults, that there is no life like the Christian life. We shall learn, if we have not already done so, that "all those qualities which we admire in a man are developed in their finest and most attractive forms in the true followers of the great Leader, Jesus Christ." Make sure that the lessons of this quarter sink into your heart and affect your own life.

We shall learn that while it is a fine thing and no small advantage to a young man or woman to have a noble ancestry, or as we say, be "well born," it is infinitely more worth while to be BORN AGAIN. That, while education is a most valuable asset to any one, to know Jesus Christ, whom to know is life eternal, is by far the most important part of any one's education. That, while "friends constitute one of the greatest joys of life, the Friend that sticketh closer than a brother is the best Friend of all."

These are some of the results that must inevitably follow the faithful study of this series of lessons in the CHRISTIAN LIFE. Is it worth while?

We are just now closing a six months' course of study in the most beautiful and most wonderful life that ever lived on earth,—the Life which is greater and better than all lives and is therefore the model for all worthy living. We have followed Jesus from the beginning of his public ministry through all his matchless teaching and wonderful works of love and service to humanity, until, after his resurrection, he appeared to his disciples in the body. Whatever may have been our thoughts before we entered upon this study of his Life, we are now forced to the conclusion that he was the Son of God.

For the next three months, beginning the first Sunday in July, we are going to think about how we may imitate that wonderful Life and learn how we may best live the Christian life,—what enters into it, what it really means to live such a life, and what its results are. In other words, how shall be become Christ's true disciples and receive eternal life through his name? Along this way of life we need both instruction and guidance. The lessons which we study this quarter aim to supply this need. Just as our former studies were meant to bring us to the Bible and to the Christ of the Bible, the lessons for this quarter are intended to bring the Bible and the Savior to YOU. Don't you really think it is eminently worth while?

OUR LESSON HELPS

There is no need that I should say anything as to the merits of our lesson helps. They have been prepared with special care and with the subject and its adaptation to the various grades constantly in mind. I have tried to make this a study in THE CHRISTIAN LIFE.

PRIMARY BIBLE STORIES.—This is a four page paper for primary pupils. It is beautifully illustrated and, besides, contains outline pictures for coloring. Some of our large schools are using as many as ninety and ninety-five copies per week. If your school has never tried this little child's paper, order sample copies at once and convince yourself of its special merits.

Please note also that special articles on the Christian Life series will appear weekly on page five of The Angelus. Do not fail to include a liberal supply of this paper in your order for literature. It is an illustrated weekly paper for young and old, containing the cream of the best we can secure.

Neither will your equipment be complete without THE BRETHREN TEACHER, one of the very best helps for the busy teacher.

In the hope that this may be the best and most fruitful of all our Bible study, I remain,

Yours in loving service,

A. D. GNAGEY.

REVIEW OF
The Thought and Work of the Church

It is with more than ordinary pleasure that we add another church to the Honor Roll for the Evangelist this week. This is not one of the large churches, but the achievement is none the less noteworthy because of that, in fact we are of the opinion it is really a greater achievement than it would have been from one of our old and well established churches. Though there are but twenty-nine names on this list, yet the list represents the painstaking and tireless efforts of a consecrated woman who has succeeded in getting the Evangelist in the home of every family of active Brethren in the congregation, and moreover it was accomplished by one of the two lady pastors we have in the Brethren church, Mrs. L. C. Webb, Fort Scott, Kansas. The Fort Scott mission is away below the average Brethren church in membership and wealth, but it is now away beyond the average Brethren church in the number of Evangelist subscribers. If I were a pastor I would endeavor to at least bring my church up to the average in this matter.

Some weeks ago we announced that the Loree, Indiana church had adopted the budget plan for the Evangelist and a few days ago we received a list of eighty-five subscriptions from this country church which with the list from Ft. Scott adds more than one hundred and twenty-five new subscribers to our permanent list. The good work should continue and we believe it will, the only question is what church will be the next to win this honor?

Willis E. Ronk reports the work at St. James, Maryland briefly. While nothing startling has been accomplished the work is going steadily forward and is doing the real work for which the church was instituted, that is saving souls. Nine members have been added to the church since the last report from that congregation, and Brother Ronk sees much of the strength of the future church in the lives of these young people .

The attention of our readers is called to the statement on another page as made by H. F. O'Neill, Secretary of the Board of Benevolences of the Brethren church in regard to his address. We do not know how many of the churches observed last Sunday as Superannuated Ministers' day, but those that did so should make a remittance to Brother O'Neill promptly.

In our ten years' experience as a member of the Board of Trustees of Ashland College we have not attended a more enthusiastic and better represented meeting of the Board than that which was held last week. The members in attendance were Dr. Furry, J. L. Clark, P. A. Myers, E. J. Worst, E. L. Kilheffner, A. D. Gnagey, W. H. Beachler, R. R. Teeter, F. L. Garber, M. D. Kerr, E. G. Mason, F. O. Switzer, G. C. Carpenter, Dr. J. L. Gillin, Wm. Kolb, Jr., S. P. Hoover and John Lichty. The Board was well pleased with the progress of the campaign for permanent endowment, and Messrs. Clark and Myers, members of the Board from the city of Ashland expressed themselves as well pleased also with what has been accomplished and stated that when Ohio is canvassed in the campaign they hoped the City of Ashland will not be overlooked. The College is slowly gaining a place in the esteem of the local people of Ashland and they are coming to realize the benefit a Christian college is to any town or city.

Brother W J. H. Bauman has been giving acceptable service for a time to the Morrill, Kansas Brethren church during a visit to that place and while the church is without a pastor. This was a familiar field to Brother Bauman, and yet different as the work has been transplanted from the country to the town since he labored here years ago. Brother Bauman is now visiting in Indiana and we may expect to hear of him doing more preaching while on this visit in spite of his four score years.

After serving the Warsaw, Indiana church for nearly four years Brother C. E. Kolb gave up the work at that place and has located at least for the summer in North Manchester where he is ministering to the spiritual needs of the Brethren. Brother A. T. Ronk has been called by the Warsaw church and is buckling on the armor ready for any service he can render to the Brethren of this place. We trust these brethren will find their work agreeable and pleasant as well as profitable to the Lord in their new fields.

Dr. Miller was kind enough to prepare a report of commencement week at Ashland College for our readers and we are quite sure it will be appreciated by many of them, especially by those who have at any time paid a visit to Ashland or who have been in attendance at the College. Weather conditions were favorable and the entire week was a pronounced success.

We are glad to be able to publish a synopsis of the Commencement address as given by Dr. J. Campbell White for the College last week. The address was given in the Presbyterian church to a large audience. Some of our readers will remember Dr. White as one of the prominent speakers at Winona Lake some ten years ago, and as one of the prime movers in the great Laymen's Missionary movement of that period.

Dr. White is now president of Wooster College and is a strong man in a great church. His address was one of more than usual force and power and was heard with wrapt attention by the audience.

Brother Beachler was compelled to stop his campaign for College endowment in Pennsylvania for a short time to enable him to visit the Maryland-Virginia conference and to be present at the meeting of the Board of Trustees at Ashland. But the good work, with ready response, still goes on in Pennsylvania and after a few days' rest at home Brother Beachler will again be on the job in the old Keystone state and we shall expect one round of reports of a successful canvass until the churches of the whole state have been visited. It will not be an easy task to cover Pennsylvania, but the field is a fertile one and deserves careful cultivating as well as reaping.

We had hoped to be able to publish the orations of the class orators of the graduating class this week, but some of the graduates slipped away before we succeeded in getting in touch with them. However we were able to secure the manuscript of three of them for this paper and we may be able to secure the others a little later. These orations were well worked out and well delivered.

Last week we gave a partial list of visitors to Ashland over the previous Sunday, but perhaps a few of them were missed and many others arrived a few days later. We can not hope to give a complete list of them all even now for we had too many other things to do to give this matter any special attention but we did notice the following visitors in additions to those mentioned last week: A. H. Lichty and wife, Columbus, Ohio; Mr. and Mrs. P. M. Snyder, Canton, Ohio; Mr. and Mrs. G. L. Maus, Bryan, Ohio; Mrs. W. A. Price and daughter, Frieda, and Miss Lois Frazier, Nappanee, Indiana, and Miss Velma Wineland, Butler, Ohio; Carrie Wolford, Williamstown, Ohio; Clara Miller, Bellefontaine, Ohio; Ora Bowman, Canton, Ohio. We know there were still other visitors present but we are not able to name them at this time. One of the features of the class day programs was the presence of the mothers of six of the young women who graduated on that day. After receiving their degrees these six girls doffed their caps and gowns and placed them upon their mothers and had a picture taken of the group, a fitting token of respect to their mothers.

The matter in the Evangelist has been greatly disarranged this week to make room for special features, but we think it has been worth while to make these alterations because of the good we hope to do. It will be noted that A. D. Gnagey has been given page eight which has from time immemorial belonged to the Editor alone, but the announcement and explanation made by him on this page in reference to the Sunday school lessons is vital and greatly needed by our schools. We would call special attention to the announcement in reference to the small pamphlet he has under preparation and which should be ordered by all the schools.

The Jews in The Present Crisis

BY REV. SABETI B. ROHOLD, F. R. G. S., TORONTO, CANADA.

President of the American Hebrew Christian Alliance and Superintendent of the Christian Synagogue, Toronto, Canada

No people have been so grievously affected by this world-war as have the Jews. The sufferings of Belgium and Servia, and even the massacres of the Armenians, have not exceeded, if they have equalled, the misery of the Jews in the Eastern and Southern war zones. Among all the pressing calls which crowd upon the Christian, none deserves more sympathy than that which comes from Israel. Scattered throughout the world, and again massed in the very crater of the world-war, they are passing in truth though the " Valley of the Shadow." At the same time the world-struggle is searching the very vitals of the race, stirring its energies, revolutionizing its life and transforming its outlook. Seven hundred and fifty thousand Jewish soldiers are engaged in the contest, Jew beoften engaged in mortal combat with Jew. Four millions of them, men, women and children; strong and weak, are haunted by the thundering cannon and driven into the wasted roads, marshy fields and wild forests. They have been terrorized into abandoning land, stock and treasure in order to save their lives. Starvation faces them everywhere and until the recent capture of Jerusalem there was no "Promised Land" in sight. Even now it may be a long way off. Is Israel's tragedy "nothing to you, all ye that pass by?"

The American Hebrew of September 29, 1916, published an article by that brilliant Jewish savant, Dr. Max Nordau, in which he warns his people not to be deceived by false hopes. He says:

"Anti-Semites of every country are constantly casting in the teeth of the Jews that they have no home country. Of these 'homeless' people about 700,000 are afield in the different belligerent countries. According to a rough estimate, some 60,000 of them have died in battle.

"In France and in England they are officers by the hundreds, attaining in many cases high positions. Even exclusive Germany has widely opened to them the ranks of her body of officers. They have earned more than 2,000 crosses of the Legion of Honor, war crosses and military medals in France, three Victoria Crosses (V. C.), besides numerous Distinguished Conduct Medals (D. C. M.), in England; more than 8,000 Iron Crosses in Germany, where the civil authorities forbid papers the publication of the names of the heroes to whose breast the military commanders attach the sign of valor * * *

"Each of the belligerent peoples promises itself, as the outcome of victory, territorial gains, enrichment, power, domination, fame. The Jewish people alone has nothing to expect for itself from the heroism of its sons, not even the acknowledgement of the fact that everywhere it has proved itself loyal and faithful unto death to its native country, even there where it had always been cruelly and abjectly persecuted."

This was, however, before the declaration of the British Government concerning the return of the Jews to Palestine. Another Jew, the Hon. L. D. Brandeis, tells us that no less than 500,000 Jews have lost their lives since the war started, either on the battlefield or by the invading armies, or through exposure and starvation By the devastation of the Jewish colonies hundreds of thousands have lost their business and properties.

The Jewish people, however, look upon the year 1917 as "the year of the liberation." Writers and thinkers of international repute have declared that the sudden fall of the Romanoffs, the unexpected avalanche that leveled the walls of the greatest of Ghettos—"is a freedom from bondage, greater than that of Egypt." They believe that it is the beginning of the real emancipation of the Jewish people, which will result in their attainment of national aspirations, and some even believe in their "national independence."

Dr. S. M. Melamed, editor of the American Jewish Chronicle, in a review of the "Past Years in Jewish History," says:

"When the sun rose on the first of Tishri, 5677, it saw a vast valley of tears in the east; it saw a people hemmed in between two long rows of fire-spitting guns; it saw a people struggling in its own blood and fighting desperately for a last breath of life. Nothing indicated that the future had relief in store for that agonized people. The arch-enemy of seven million Jews—Czardom—was as strong as ever; its criminal agents continued to oppress our brethren mercilessly and heartlessly, persecuting them with the passion of the angry beast, and making their miserable lives one long agony. When the sun rose on the twenty-eighth of Ellul to bring light and warmth on the last day of the year 5677, it saw an entirely different panorama. The great valley of tears, horrible and terrible to see, was turned into a valley of hope and expectation; Czardom was broken and crushed; its criminal agents wiped out and pushed aside; the light of freedom kindled; and millions of our brethren, living corpses only a year ago, full of activity, full of life, full of hope and action."

The same view is taken by practically the whole of the Jewish press. Of course no one can attempt to prophesy the future of Russia. Occupying more than half of Europe, and nearly two-fifths of Asia, its sweep includes the cradle of the Aryan race and the home lands of Oriental civilization—Slav, Pole, Lithuanian, Latin, Iranion, Kuranian, Armenian, Finn, Samoyed, Turko-Tartan, Tingutz, Manolo. Georgians, Yukaghirs and Chukchio are all living on native heath. These all have the mark of a thousand years of Czardom.

Under the old regime in Russia, Zionists were treated as enemies. They could not hold meetings and its propagandists were severely dealt with. What a wonderful change took place in the first revolution, when not only leading ministers, including Kerensky, sent messages expressing their good-will, but an order was issued permitting Jewish soldiers to send delegates to the Zionist Congress and offering them free transportation and monetary aid.

A year ago Jews were not only barred from all public offices, but were even refused the right of citizenship. Now note the change: "Homel elected 37 Jewish Councillors; Slutzk, 19; Zhitomir, 12; Kremenchuk, 14; Tchernicoff, 11; Poltava, 8; Veliz, 8; Mosir, 5; Alexandrovsk, 10; Kertch, 4; Tambave, 3; Unman, 5; Tiflis, 4; Tula, 3; Starikin, Tashkent, Revel and Walki all elected Jewish Councillors. Even Kiep, where Jews were excluded under the old regime, has so completely repented that she, too, elected eleven Jews as Councillors. A number of Jews were appointed Judges. The universities, from which Jews were excluded, unless men apostatized and women secured the yellow ticket, not only opened their doors, but many Jews were appointed as professors. The revolutionists recognized that there are Jews in Russia of high calibre and education who are aable to fill the most important offices of State.

Nevertheless, all is not well with the Jew in Russia. Since the counter revolution took place there have been reports of more pogroms in which life and property were lost. The Black Hundred are still busy with their nefarious work of maligning, slandering and maliciously inciting the ignorant peasants against the Jews. The Jew is still the "scapegoat" and has to suffer untold agonies. The severe Russian winter has now claimed a large toll from a people whose nerves have been shattered by these three and one-half years of frightfulness. The condition of the Russian Jewry is too horrible to describe.

The Jews and Palestine

The catastrophe that befell Palestine as a result of the war is hard to realize. A century's aspirations, labors and fortunes of Jewish colonists were annihilated in a brief time. This was enough to break the spirit of any people, and yet the possibilities of the Jewish hope in Palestine have never been brighter. A great change is coming, but the Jewish attiutde is pitiable, for they have no "Morning Star" to guide them.

A very conservative estimate is that during the past century not less than $500,000,000 has been spent on Palestine. Besides the millions spent by the merchant princes in Israel, the Rothschilds, the Montefiores, the Montagues, the Moccattes and by the Jewish Colonization and other Zionistic societies, practically all Jews in the world have a little box with "Great Alms for Palestine" written on it. It is looked upon as a meritorious act to put money in the Jewry in Palestine.

The emigration into Palestine was on an average of 2,000 Jews a year during the past fifty years. The cruel destruction of the Jewish colonies is revealed by eye-witnesses. And Dr. Glazebrook, the American Consul at Jerusalem, who had charge of the Relief Fund, said:

"The Jews of Palestine knew not where to look for help, except to America. The need today is greater than it ever has been before, necessarily so because of the economic condition of Turkey and the civil condition of Turkey must become necessarily more and more desperate. The acreage of Turkey under cultivation last year was about sixty per cent of its usual acreage. That sixty per cent was diverted to the support of the Turkish army, so that help must come to the population from some other place than Turkey. There are about forty thousand Jews in Jerusalem (before the war there was double that number.) One-fourth of the population of Jerusalem died from starvation, and from disease."

But the suffering of the Jews in Palestine has not shattered their hope to establish a national home in the Holy Land. The outlook for this has never been brighter and its possibility was never nearer actually being attained than it is today. The encouragements received from leading statesmen have made them bold to put their demand in a concrete form. Almost from the moment when Turkey entered the war the conviction came to the Jews the world over that the end of their exile was drawing nigh. The Jewish Chronicle .of October 12, 1917, tells us:

"Jewish Nationalism—is no secret—has been the subject of discussion in Allied Governments and has, in particular it is known, engaged the attention of the Government of this counrty, with what result—even if any has been reached—is, however, not known. But it is obvious that every success of the Allies over Turkish arms must be of supreme interest to Jews. For Palestine, the disposition of which as part of the Turkish Empire the war is deciding, is bound up with Jewish destiny and Jewish destiny with Palestine. * * *"

Two great events have since then made Jewish hearts beat very fast. The British army has actually captured Jerusalem as well as the historic and almost impregnable city of Gaza, and the sacred shrines of Beersheba and Hebron. And last November, two Jewish rabbis who had never spoken to me before because I was a Jewish missionary, stopped me with these words: "Kumt-Aherr! (come here). You are from Jerusalem and we have heard you know all about Palestine. Will you tell us where Gaza and Beersheba are, and how far is the British army from our Holy City? And will the British drive dem Turkish Amalak out?" I brought Armstrong's large map of Palestine and for nearly an hour I explained the map to them. A crowd gathered around and listened, forgetting that I was a missionary. This incident shows where the Jewish heart lies.

The momentous letter written by the Right Hon. Arthur J. Balfour, the British Minister of Foreign Affairs, to the Right Hon. Lord Rothschild, has already been quoted in these columns:

"The Government views with favor the establishment of Palestine as a national home for the Jewish people, and will use their best endeavors to facilitate the achievement of this object, it being clearly understood that nothing will be done that may prejudice the civil or religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine."

Mr. Balfour adds that this declaration of sympathy with the Jewish Zionist aspirations has been submitted to and approved by the Cabinet.

The Jewish Chronicle commenting on Mr. Balfour's letter says "With one step the Jewish cause has made a great bound forward—it is the perceptible lifting of the cloud of centuries; a palpable sign that the Jew—condemned for two thousand years by unparalleled wrong—is at last coming to his right. He is to be given the opportunity and means by which in place of being a hyphenation he can become a nation, in place of being a wanderer in every clime there is to be a home for him in his ancient land. The day of his exile is to be ended."

Yes, poor Israel, thy leaders say "The day of exile is ended!" But there is none to guide thee. The internal difficulties are by far greater than the external. While leading statesmen in different countries have shown sympathy to the national tendencies of the Zionist, such Jewish leaders as Claude G. Montefiore, D. L. Alexander, Dr. Israel Abraham and Sir Philip Magnus have printed pamphlets denouncing these nationalists as dangerous to Jewry

The two factions are so distinct and determined that it will prove a very delicate problem to settle. One faction holds that Judaism is a religion, a system of life and thought, and nothing else; that it no more interferes with full absorption into the nationality of any country than the profession of Catholicism, Methodism, or Presbyterianism interferes with a man being an Englishman, a Frenchman or an American. Another powerful body, large in numbers and intellectually strong, insists that Jewry is not a religion, but a nation which has lost its father land and is a wanderer on the face of the earth. These look for the return to Zion, and hope that the issue of the war will restore them in mose measure to the patrimony of which they were disinherited nearly two thousand years ago. There is still another powerful faction, the assimilators, who do not want either Zionism or Judaism.

A comment of the Daily News is illuminating:

"Down the centuries the stream of Jewry flows through all nations, preserving a separation, an identity of physical and mental characteristics and an individuality of outlook that has no parity in the story of any other religion. We understand that those who are opposed to setting up anything like a Jewish State in Palestine are afraid that it will tend to denationalise them in other lands. They want to preserve their religion, they do not want to preserve their racial exclusiveness. They wish to disappear racially and to be simply Englishmen or Frenchmen or Germans or Americans, professing a particular faith anl preserving an ancient scheme of life.

"But the Zionists in all lands are pressing upon the Allies their claim to be a nation and their desire to see the land of their fathers, albeit their remote forefathers, restored to them, if not absolutely, then under such guarantees of good government and just control as will secure to them freedom of life and liberty of worship. They believe that a nation without a fatherland is an anomaly that is good neither for the nation nor for the world, and that much of the antagonism which exists towards the Jews would disappear if the race had "a local habitation and a name." This is probably true, and it is not unlikely that the rehabilitation of the nation would tend to hasten the disappearance of the merely religious cult of Judaism in other lands. Jews would have to make their choice between remaining Jews and being fully and completely absorbed in other national communites. In a word, we are not sure that Zonism would not prove the solution of that obstinate problem of this wandering race that has perplexed the world for so many centuries. Whatever the decision of the Allies in regard to Palestine, it can hardly fail to improve the conditions and enlarge the liberty of life in Palestine, and if the Jews in large numbers choose to take advantage of the fact, the object of Zionism will in due time be accomplished and the Jewish nation will live again under its own vine and fig tree. When that happens, the Jewish problem that afflicts the rest of the world will tend to disappear."

For nearly three years the American Jewry was in a turmoil over the seemingly burning question of a Jewish Congress. Literally, tons of literature was printed with most wonderful hair-splitting arguments, for and against, denouncing, abusing and threatening. At last a peaceless peace was patched up, with the great result (we are told by a Jewish editor) that "the Congress was buried alive." The editor, Herman Bernstein, of the American Hebrew, was in despair:

"The Jews of America, talking of their duties and responsibilities to their brethren abroad, are split into many groups, groping in the dark, denouncing one another, belittling one another, shouting for unity and working against it. In the conflict between Zionism, Nationalism, the Congress movement, the National Workmens' Committee and the American Jewish Committee, the Jewish people remain the victim. The Jewish people will be the sufferers because of their internal quarrels, disputes and attacks."

The voices which we hear from within Israel are strange, but they are of utmost importance. Chief Rabbi Dr. M. Gaster made this remarkable statement:

"The problem in future for the Jew is involved in this enormous revolution which the war is going to effect. Where will the Jew, alien in nationality everywhere, find his niche? There must be a difficult situation created for the Jew, and the alternative of assimilation or annihilation. The difficulty of assimilation, on the one hand, and the unthinkableness of annihilation on the other create a terrible dilemma for the Jew after the war. You see how enormous and far-reaching is the Jew's problem. * * * *"

"If there have been forces attracting Jews from devoting their minds, their spirits, their energies to Jewry, so there have been forces within Jewry repelling those men and inducing them to devote themselves to the services of peoples outside Jewry. If you start killing your prophets in the Temple, it ought not to be astonishing that those who are able to prophesy to do so elsewhere than in the Temple. It seems to me, however, that one of the essential things for Jews to understand and appreciate, to recognize and face, is the impossibility of absolute unity in Jewry. We constantly urge unthinkingly that the voice of Jewry should be one. The thing is impossible. Let us realize facts. There are two separate camps in Jewry, two separate cultures, two diverse aspirations, one of the East and one meanderng along the shallows in the West."

We need not comment on the above. What a sad state of affairs!

One of the greatest changes that should come in the Jewish world is in their attitude toward Hebrew Christians. They too need to learn the meaning of toleration and of religious liberty.—Missionary Review.

The Little Birds. By Olivette Morris

Little baby birds are you
In your nest on high;
Downy bits from eggs of blue,
Calling to the sky;

Waiting, while the May days go,
Without songs or wings;
Swaying as the winds may blow,
Helpless little things.

Yet as sure as June times are Followers of May,
So your wings will bear you far
O'er the hills away.

May they bear you where you will,
Far away, and then
Back o'er field and wood until You're at home again.

And the songs that you will sing
In the months to be!
Will you, will you sometimes bring
Morning songs to me?

May your singing all be near
Those who ever find
In your songs a note of cheer,
And whose hearts are kind!

The New Kind of Fourth

By Daisy D. Stephenson

"If you can leave those stupid dolls long enough to practice marching," Tom told his small sister that third of July, "we'll be much obliged."

At that moment Fred came out of the cabin importantly bearing a trumpet, a drum, and a big comb. He looked very martial in his Scout suit. Then Jeannette left her dolls, and with some dignity joined her brothers at the foot of the new flagpole.

"Now for once, Jeanette, try to get acquainted with your feet!" urged General Fred, impatiently. "You never know your left from your right. This is your right!" He poked Jeannette's small brown sandal with his trumpet.

"Don't!" flashed Jeanette. "It's no worse to get my feet mixed up than for Tom to beat his drum so slow we go to sleep, or so fast we run races!"

Tom's face looked as red as his hair, and a sharp retort sprang to his lips when his mother appeared on the porch and called smilingly,

"'With big tin trumpet and little red drum, Marching like soldiers the children come.'"

Back went the boys' shoulders instantly, while red and brown heads went up proudly, and Fred played the bugle call with a flourish. Jeanette put the paper-wrapped comb to her mouth, and began playing "Flag of the Free." But she had to pause to rub her rosy lips. "It tickles so!" she objected. 'Why can't I beat on the dishpan or something, Fred?"

"Naw, you got to carry the tune," set forth Fred, who admitted frankly that his singing sounded lots like a magpie. "All ready, men? Forward march!" he commanded, and round and round the flagpole marched the gallant soldiers.

"Pretty good!" Fred commented, as the army paused for breath. "John Carlton is coming over to celebrate with us tomorrow, and he'll bring a sure-'nough cornet, so we'll make lots of noise, anyway."

"If we only had the flag here today, so we could practise running her to the top of the pole," sighed Tom.

"Well, it's our fault that it isn't, for mother told us to pack it, and we every one forgot," remarked Fred, resignedly. "But daddy'll bring it sure when he comes up tonight. With three of us writing him cards this week on purpose, he can't forget."

But at five came a message from Mr. Gordon, saying that important business would keep him in the city over night. He would be up late the next afternoon in a friend's car.

"Late tomororw afternoon!" echoed Fred, fairly paling underneath the tan. "How on earth can we have anyl Fourth from daylight till he gets here?"

"I'd like to know!" agreed Tom, his disappointment welling up and brimming over.

Jeannette sat calmly on a pine stump, coaxing a striped chipmunk to her shoulder via the peanut route. She secretly rejoiced that the firecrackers wouldn't arrive, but of course there would be no fun without the morning flag ceremony they had planned.

"Maybe John will lend us a flag since he's coming over," she suggested finally, as gloom camped on her brothers' brows.

"Here he comes up the hill now!" shouted Fred. "Hi, John! We're in a fix. No flag, no firecrackers—nothing. How can we have any Fourth?"

Their new friend whistled when he heard, then frowned thoughtfully. "That is bad luck," he said. "Wish I could lend a hand—or a flag, but the pup chewed my only Star-Spangled Banner into a wet wad, so it looks like nothing at all, and—he hesitated a bit, then met the boys' gaze frankly, "I promised my mohter I wouldn't have a thing to do with firecrackers, big or little. They're not worth the risk. You see, she had a little sister burn to death; white dress caught fire fom a big cracker some boy meant to scare her with."

Jeannette's eyes were full of tears, and at her exclamation of pity her brothers' faces grew very serious.

"Well, mother might as well stop worrying," shrugged Fred. "We'll just go and roll rocks down the hill, I guess, or play mumble-peg to celebrate."

But John took a more cheerful view of the situation. "Tell you what," he suggested, "come and picnic with our folks up in Spring Gulch. Mother's cooking her head off today,—lots of good eats,—and we can take along some wieners and things, and have a campfire. My uncle's here for a week, and he's a Scout-Master—and the best ever!"

Again the glorious Fourth began to look more rosy and less blue to the Gordons, and soon the plans grew like Jack's beanstalk of old. Never was there a merrier, saner celebration. The camp-fire lunch was a feast fit for princes, thanks to jolly "Uncle Joe." In the afternoon the boys hiked to the top of the highest foothill thereabouts, and schemed all sorts of splendid things to do during the stay of John's uncle. The two mothers and Jeannette wandered down the stream into a wild mountain meadow, and picked armfuls of blue columbines and dainty wild roses.

Directly after their wonderful lunch the picnickers had felt sure that they never could eat again, but when Mr. Gordon arrived with a big freezer of ice-cream at dusk, they quickly sprouted appetites, and enjoyed every bite of the "picnic supper" Mrs. Gordon served on the big porch.

"And here's our fine old flag at last!" cried Fred, joyfully. "All line up for the flag raising! Better late than never." And everybody joined in the grand march, from fat Daddy Gordon to John's one-legged old soldier grandfather, who had come over for supper.

Old Glory, fluttering on high that evening looked down on a peaceful happy party. Around a bonfire sat the children, toasting marshmallows, and listening wide-eyed to Grandfather Carlton's war stories. He even blew the bugle call and beat the drum a little to please the boys.

"It was the finest Fourth I ever had," voted Fred, after the guests were gone and the bonfire carefully extinguished.

"It certainly was," yawned Tom, "even if Daddy didn't bring us any firecrackers." —S. S. Times.

More Expert Endeavorers

Having discovered the practical value of the study, Miss Nora Bracken conducted a class in Expert Endeavor at Vandergrift, Pennsylvania, and succeeded in graduating the following persons: Amanda Pool, Hazel Mechling, Clarence J. Davis, Grace Davis, Mary Cline, Geneva Davis and Bertha Kridler. These young people did commendable work. They with Miss Bracken are to be congratulated. Vandergrift is one of our smaller societies, but has contributed its quota of Experts asked for in our Four-Year Challenge. If other societies will do as well we will easily reach the 500 mark by 1920. To our knowledge Altoona is the only other Pennsylvania society that has graduated a class. Let us hear from the others at an early date.

During the two preceding years Ashland graduated a class in connection with the Bible Institute. Most of the older students had completed the work. However there were a few present this year that found time for the course in the absence of any special opportunity and the persons named below completed the studies in a very satisfactory manner. Those graduating were: Ruby H. Brewbaker, Marie E. Stoner, Alberta Anders, W. R. Deeter and A. L. Lynn. Several were unable to complete the course on account of other work, but plan to do so later. We are glad to welcome these Endeavorers into the growing family of C. E. Es.

Newark Invites Ohio

Newark has extended appealing invitations to all Ohio societies, urging them to send large delegations to the State Christian Endeavor Convention which convenes over June 25-28. A high-grade program of unusual interest and help has been provided. Mr. Chas. Alexander and his associate will have charge of the music. There will be numerous addresses by men of national reputation, like Drs. Cadman, Crafts and Poling. The denominational rallies will be held on Thursday evening at 5:30. We want at least 25 Brethren Endeavorers present at that time. If you are planning to attend please notify the writer that reservations may be made for you.

Hungry for a Friend

BY REV. HOWARD W. POPE

Soon after entering the Moody Bible Institute as superintendent of the men I entered my office one morning at the usual hour. There were students awaiting me, and in one corner of the room sat a stranger about forty-five years of age. I stepped up to him and inquired whether he wished to see me, and explained that I would be at liberty in a few moments. Then the students began to make known their wants, and I attended to them as rapidly as I could. Others came in, however, so that I was delayed longer than I had expected.

Meanwhile the stranger had arisen and began to pace the floor, walking back and forth in an excited manner. Finally he stopped and said, "If I can't see you pretty soon, Mr. Pope, something will happen." I told him that these students had to enter a class at nine o'clock and I would soon be through with them, but I must attend to them first.

When the last one was gone, he asked whether he could see me alone. I took him upstairs to my private office adjoining my sleeping apartment. As we entered the room, he inquired whether the door could be locked. I quietly turned the key in the door, and then he wanted to know whether we were entirely alone. I said "Yes," but the next moment I heard a sound in the adjoining room, and, looking in, I saw that the maid was making my bed. I dismissed her, and then sat down to hear his story.

He began by saying: "I am not a drinking man, Mr. Pope. I have only had three drinks this morning; but I haven't slept any for two or three nights, and I am almost wild with excitement and grief."

It was a case of domestic trouble. In order that I might know all the facts, he went back to the beginning of his courtship. He described his wife as a girl, and told how happy they were in the early married days. It seemed, however, that she was naturally a discontented woman, and nothing he could do seemed to satisfy her. If they lived in the city, she wanted to go to the country. If they moved to the country, she wanted to go back to the city. If they went East, she preferred to live in the West; and now, when they had come West she was discontented here. He was an intelligent man and an efficient workman, and was foreman of a room in a large shoe factory, where he was drawing thirty-five dollars a week. This money he turned over to his wife every Saturday, and it was ample to provide for the family.

He was not a drinking man as I judged, although at that time he was under the influence of liquor. He had been faithful to her all his life, and had done his best to make her happy; but he had failed most signally. As the children grew to be young men and women, they had sided with their mother, and that had made matters worse. I tried to get him to abbreviate his story a little and reach the climax, but it was of no use. He was determined that I should have all the facts, and he proceeded in a leisurely way.

There were two telephones on my desk, and from time to time they kept ringing; and of course I had to stop to attend to the calls. There were also frequent knocks upon the door from students and others who wished to see me on urgent matters. He saw the situation, and offered to pay me for my time; but I told him that it was not a question of money but rather a question of many people who needed to see the same man, and, if he could hurry up, I should be glad.

Finally he told me that the family had so exasperated him by their constant nagging that he decided that there was only one way to end his troubles, and that was to kill his whole family. He had decided to go out and purchase a pistol and kill his wife, his sons, and daughters, and that is what he wanted to tell me about. He said, "I could go to a lawyer; but he would simply take my money, and his advice would be of no value. I could go to a priest, but I have no use for them; but I thought if I came to the Moody Bible Institute, I could find a friend, and that is why I came to you. I wanted to tell you the story from beginning to end so that, when you read an account of it in the papers tomorrow, you will know that I was justified in what I did."

When he had finished his story, I said to him, "Do you think that your wife is prepared to die?"

He answered: "By no means. She is not even prepared to live, to say nothing about dying."

I said: "Do you realize that, if you carry out your intention, you will send your wife to hell and yourself to the electric chair?

I am sorry for you and sorry for your wife too. Let us pray for her."

I dropped upon my knees, and taking hold of him, I pulled him down also. I prayed for her that God would give her a more contented spirit and a more reasonable disposition, and make her easier to get along with. I prayed for him that God would forgive him not only for the sin which he was about to commit, but for all the sins of his life. I asked God to show him that he was a lost man, having no hope and without God in the world. I asked God to show him that Jesus C hrist suffered and died in his behalf on the cross, and that He had been trying to get into his heart during all these unhappy years in order that He might comfort him in his sorrow, strengthen him in his weakness, and guide him in all his days.

When I finished praying, I asked him to pray; and he began in a humble way, but soon broke down and cried like a child. He seemed to realize the sin of his life, and the awful crime he was about to commit; he cried earnestly to God to forgive him, and to take the murderous spirit out of his heart, and to help him to love his wife and cherish her. As he proceeded, he seemed to realize that God had already answered his prayer, and he went on praying for his wife and himself all the blessings which I besought God for a few moments previous.

When we arose, his tears were dried and his face was shining. He said: "Say, I don't feel like shooting anybody. Things look differently to me." Then he told me his name and more about himself, and went off smiling.

What impressed me most about the interview was that he was so convinced that if he came to the Moody Bible Institute he would find a friend. I said to myself, "If that is the impression which the Institute has made upon Chicago, I am glad to have a part in it and to help deepen that impression."

This poor harassed man was hungry for a friend to whom he could unburden his heart. He found one, and a better one than he expected, the One whom all hungry hearts need, whether they know it or not. It is not an unusual thing for people to come to the Institute burdened with discouragement and sin and go away in a little while rejoicing in a peace and pardon that they had never known before. This was Mr. Moody's idea for this place, and blessedly is it fulfilling his expectations.

Mr. Moody was everybody's friend; and, as the years have gone by and experiences have multiplied, I am more and more convinced that, if an individual or an institution has a friendly feeling in the heart for others, it should give expression to it and as often as possible. Human nature craves friendship, and "there is a friend that sticketh closer than a brother." If we will go through life with an open hand and a warm heart and a smiling face for all we shall have abundant opportunities to witness for the Friend of sinners, and often to introduce people to him.—Chicago, Ill.

News From the Field

Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania

Just this suggestion regarding the offering for the Superannuated Minister's Fund which was taken last Sunday, June 9th.

My attention has been called to the fact that I did not give my address in my article recently when I was making my appeal to the Brotherhood for help for this fund, this was an oversight on my part, and I will give it at the close of this note.

I recently received a contribution from one of our noble young ladies who is attending Ashland College. She said her offering was from her "Sacred Tithe." This is the right spirit, and I sincerely hope more of our Young People will get the Spirit, and help go "Over the Top."

Think of it a girl in school giving a tithe of her allowance to this fund. Is not that a noble act? How much more ought those who are earning their own money and in a good many cases spending it entirely upon themselves, arise to the height of this occasion and give something to help this fund that is endeavoring to care for our old brethren who have given their lives on the altar of the Brethren church.

There are many individuals in the brotherhood who could, and I believe would if the matter was rightly presented to them by the pastor or some one inetrested, give personal contributions in addition to what their churches give, and then some of them who are isolated from church have an opportunity to give, and now since you have my address, I will be glad to receive any such gifts whether large or small.

Then there are those who are making their will, whom we will be glad to have remember this cause when making theirs, either in gifts for permanent endowments or for current expenses.

Thanking you one and all in advance for your favors, and hoping to receive them soon and often, I am expectantly,

Your servant,
H. F. E. O'NEILL,

Commencement at Ashland

The Thirty-third Annual Commencement of Ashland College proved a splendid occasion to the College and friends. It is in no wise discrediting the former occasions of a similar sort to say that the Commencement of 1918 was one of the very best. In some respects this Commencement was different from all others. There was a break with old and worn customs. There were unique and valuable features which had hitherto not been attempted here. From beginning to end the exercises throughout the week were of a high order and all were largely attended, in fact larger crowds were present than at any former time. A very brief account of the week's exercises will be given in the hope that the readers will be interested.

Baccalaureate Sermon

The Annual Baccalaureate sermon was preached by President Furry on Sunday afternoon, June 2. The services were held in the College Chapel. The day was a delightful June day and an audience that filled the chapel was in attendance. The chapel was beautifully decorated and at the appointed hour the procession started, marched from Allen Hall and occupied the seats reserved. In the procession were members of the Board of Trustees, the Graduating Class and the Faculty. Dr. Furry preached a strong and effective sermon. His theme was: The World in the Making. Dr. Furry began by calling attention to the great and varied needs of the world among which needs there is none more imperative than that for an intelligent Christian leadership. The graduates of this year enter an auspicious world in the making. The great defects of our day were indicated and the fact was ponited out that whatever else we may have acquired we have failed morally and religiously and herein lies a probable cause of the present great conflict. The speaker next indicated some of the problems that press for solution. In conclusion it was shown that no solution whaeeper for this old world's woes and problems can succeed that does not place the proper estimate upon the individual, upon personality. The world must be spiritually interpreted. Motive must be found in moral ideals. The ideals of Jesus must prevail. Life must be religious.

Graduate Recital

On Monday Miss Pauline Teeter, graduate of the Department of Expression, gave a recital at the Lutheran church. Miss Portia Clark a popular and pleasing singer assisted Miss Teeter. A large audience filled the church. Miss Teeter proved herself a reader of splendid attainments and the program of the evening delighted the audience.

The Pageant

Tuesday evening was given to the presentation of the pageant. This called into attendance on the College grounds the largest audience ever present at a College function. It was given under the trees and the people were seated in a great semi-circle around the natural stage. I quote from the Ashland Press the following account: About five hundred people last night witnessed the patriotic pageant which was presented on the College campus, and which was one of the most picturesque and finished pageants ever seen in this city. It was without doubt the most popular event of commencement week. Entitled as it was, "Columbia's Decision," it played true to its name in the entire three acts. The pageant was written by the members of the Advanced English Class under the direction of Miss Maud Billman. About 150 persons participated in the presentation and the effort was highly commended by all.

Commencement Address

The Commencement address was delivered by Dr. J. Campbell White, President of the College of Wooster. To say the least it was a rare opportunity to have a speaker like Dr. White and it was to many a privilege of a lifetime to hear this world-famed man on the great theme: "Leaving your Mark on the World." This address was given at the Presbyterian church and a large audience was present. The readers are asked to note an extended account of Dr. White's address elsewhere in this issue of the Evangelist.

Junior Luncheon

Instead of the Junior banquet usually given some evening during Commencement week the Junior Class this year served a luncheon on Wednesday at 1 P. M. This proved one of the most delightful occasions of the College year. The large dining room of Allen Hall was beautifully decorated. A delectable dinner was served by the Juniors with perfect appointments and a very happy social hour was afforded the friends of the College who had come for the occasion. W. H. Beachler of the Class of 1905 was the toastmaster and the after-dinner speakers were President Furry for the College, Wm. Kolb, President of the Board of Trustees, for the Trustees, and A. H. Lichty for Alumni.

Class Day Exercises

The Class Day exercises were held on Thursday morning at the College chapel. Again a large audience filled the chapel and the exercises proved of unusual interest and merited the praise of all. One of the first things to attract the attention of the observer were the five vacant chairs on the front part of the platform. The service flag that hung over each one was the explanation. Five men who would have graduated with this class were in the service of their country. The following is the program as rendered:

Invocation ..... Pres. Dr. Furry
Salutatory ..... Miss M. Mae Smith
Cello Solo, Voice of Love," Schumann
..... Pauline Teeter
"New Internationalism" ..... Ruth Teeter
"New Industrial Order" .... Lucille Teeter
Vocal Solo, "My Heart at Thy Sweet Voice"
Portia Clark
"The Church in the New World"
Josie Wogaman
Vocal Solo, "Cradle Song .... Lydia King
Valedictory ..... E. Marie Lichty Presentation of diplomas and conferring of degrees ..... Pres. Furry
Presentation of class gifts
N. Victor Leatherman

This program was successfully carried out and the class won for itself credit. The following is the class roster:

Mr. N. Victor Leatherman, New Lebanon, Ohio, Class President. Classical Divinity. A. B. will be a pastor.

Miss E. Marie Lichty, Falls City, Nebraska, Valedictorian. Classical. A. B. Field Secretary for the National S. S. C. E.

Miss M. Mae Smith, Milford, Indiana, Salutatorian. Classical Divinity. A. B. Field Secretary for the National S. S. C. E.

Miss Ruth Teeter, Dayton, Ohio, Class Orator. Classical. A. B. Will teach in High school.

Miss Lucille Teeter, Ashland, Ohio, Classical. A. B. Class Orator. Will teach in Cuyahoga Falls High School.

Miss Josie Wogaman, Clayton, Ohio. Classical. A. B. Class Orator. Will teach in High School.

Marie L. Snyder, Canton, Ohio. Class Secretary. Classical. A. B. Will teach.

Miss Mary Elizabeth Bricker, Rossville, Indiana. Classical Divinity. A. B. Will enter Hospital for Nurses' Training.

Miss Pauline Teeter, Ashland, Ohio. Expression. B. O. Chautauqua.

Benj. F. Owen, Ashland, Ohio. English Divinity. Pastor.

Miss Mary O. Price, Nappanee, Indiana. Home Economics Course. Teaching.

Miss Beatrice Gentzhorn, Nappanee, Indiana Home Economics. Will teach.

Miss Hazel Zimmerman, Portis, Kansas. Home Economics.

Mr. Walter Nischwitz, Dayton, Ohio. Normal. Y. M. C. A. Physical Director.

Mr. Merrill Barr, Ashlanl, Ohio. Normal. In the Service of his Country.

In addition to the above Mr. Vern Flora and Mr. Frank Lambert completed the Academy course.

The class gifts this year were of more than passing value, and far more than of purely sentimental worth to the College. First let it be said that the class of 1918 is the first of Ashland's graduate classes to make a substantial contribution to the permanent endowment fund. We will leave the report of this item to Brother Beahler. Let it suffice to say here that other classes ought, indeed, must take notice of this bold but worthy challenge. Then there was the usual gift of something substantial to the College. This year the gift took the form of fine new front doors for the main entrances to the College building. A most appropriate and valuable gift. Thanks to the members of the class.

Here ends the account of the commencement of 1918 of Ashland College. May success crown the efforts of the Class of '18.

J. ALLEN MILLER.

North Manchester, Indiana

We closed our work at Warsaw on April 28th, having been the pastor of that congregation for three years and seven months. A few evenings before leaving and while our house was "torn up" in the moving, a goodly number of the members of the church came to our house as a surprise and said "good bye" and wished us success in all future undertakings. They brought well-filled baskets the contents of which constituted the refreshments. The Christian Endeavor society also expressed it's appreciation of our work by way of a beautiful cut glass berry bowl and cream pitcher and sugar bowl to match. We wish to assure the Christian Endeavor society of the Warsaw church that very pleasant has been our work among you and that your gift will always be remembered as a token of your love and friendship.

Brother A. T. Ronk has been called to serve the church as their pastor for the summer months and we bespeak for him the hearty co-operation and support between pastor and people so greatly needed today in the Lord's work. The Warsaw work has been very pleasant all through, in many instances yielding the fruit of years of labor. Many helpful and encouraging things have been experienced and brotherly fellowship manifested so many times and the ready response to the calls in the Lord's service have been gratifying. The church in "East" Warsaw has been a mighty factor in building the community in righteousness, and while all the churches of the town have left their mark the impression made by the Brethren church is second to none. We change our address from Warsaw to North Manchester with kindest regards to all members of the Warsaw church and sincerely trust and pray that a great work shall be continued and enlarged all to the glory of the Christ.

The call came from North Manchester to serve them as pastor during the summer months and the call having been accepted the church received us with open arms and hearts. Most cordial welcomes and hearty expressions of good will were our portion here. Part of the program was a splendid "get acquainted" meeting held in the basement of the church to which came a large number of the membership. The evening included addresses by Brother D. A. C. Teeter and Brother Clarence Stewart, both of whom are living in North Manchester while serving churches in the vicinity. Brother I. B. Wright represented the church in its welcome and expressions of fellowship. Refreshments were served and both pastor and people departed appreciating the opportunity of knowing each other better. We have visited a great many of the homes of the members and find them all interested in the work of the church. The church itself is in excellent condition. The faithfulness of the former pastor and the excellent quality of his work is greatly appreciated by all. The people attend the regular services faithfully and seem to have a mind to work for the best interest of the church. All the organizations will reach their respective standards and will likely do better. The church is well established in the community and will no doubt in years to come prove more and more a valuable asset in the Kingdom.

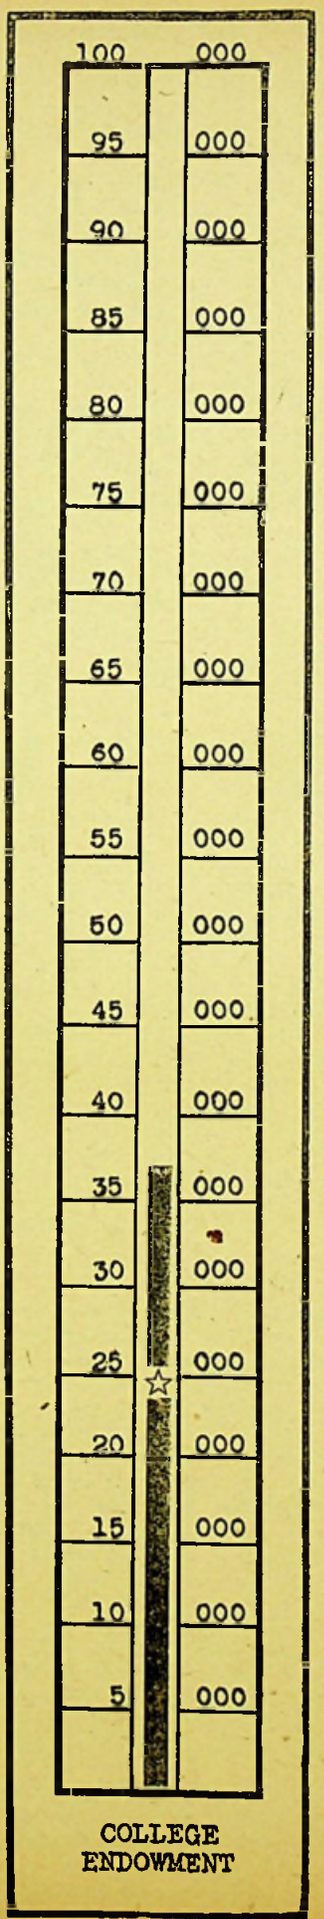
Morrill, Kansas

A short while after Brother Kemper left us to take up his work in the army Y. M. C. A., at Camp Logan, Colorado Brother W. J. H. Bauman dropped in on us for a visit and while he was visiting we asked him to preach to us in the morning services each Sunday. Despite the fact that Brother Bauman is possibly the oldest minister in the Brethren church he preached us some splendid sermons full of the pure gospel stories and truths, in fact Brother Bauman's slogan seems to be "The Bible, the whole Bible and nothing but the Bible." He is leaving us now for a visit through Indiana and as he goes from us, the Morrill people feel grateful to him for his help and interest. He has a number of splendid sermons and some lectures that will interest Christian people wherever he goes.

D. E. WAGNER.

St. James, Maryland

As nothing has been heard from St. James of late, it is time to inform the brotherhood of our doings. St. James is still at the old stand and although we have no large report to make, we can report progress. Nine have been added to the membership since last report. These are nearly all young people but will make for the church's future strength.



Our spring Communion service was held May 12 and was well attended, but not as well as it should have been. There were one-hundred and eighty-nine at the tables, but we had worked for two hundred. Nevertheless we had a blessed service together. There was no confusion and the Spirit of Christ seemed to be in and through all. To him we give the praise.

Campaign Notes

Our report for this time is from Morrellville and Rosedale. Brother George Jones is serving in the Morrellville church; and he and his good wife made us more than welcome in their home, and Brother Jones gave us untiring assistance in the canvass of his congregation. But notwithstanding we put forth an earnest effort, the result of our work in this congregation was not up to where it should have been. Several things may account for this. First, these people are trying hard to pay out on the lots on which they hope to erect a new church in the future. Again, the Red Cross drive was on at the same time I was in the Morrellville church; and this certainly did not do my work any good. But besides this, there are some folks at Morrellville who have not yet come to see the vital importance of Ashland College in its relation to the future of the Brethren church. In this field we raised just a little more than $400: And I should have been glad to see it go to $800 or $1,000. But maybe at some future time Morrellville will see her way clear to finish what she merely began at this time.

Brother W. S. Baker is preaching at Rosedale. Rosedale is the place which the Cambria Steel Company purchased in its entirety—houses, church and everything but the people. However, there are several families of loyal folks still living out in the vicinity of Rosedale; and Brother Baker goes out at appointed times and ministers to their spiritual needs. I might say that Cambria still allows our people the use of the church. And I preached out there one Sunday night. It was a service that really paid for the cause of endowment, because as a result of my going out the church voted to give me $500 for Ashland College as part of the selling price of their church property. This, with other gifts which I received from individuals put Rosedale up to almost $650. This was very fine for Rosedale. And I want to commend those folks for investing part of the money they received for their church property in Ashland College. There are other churches over the brotherhood where the work has gone down and the doors have closed, and it seems to me it would be wise to sell those buildings before they are ruined by decay and disuse and at least some of the money be invested in the cause of permanent endowment of our College. I trust this may set some of our folks to thinking.

After finishing Morrellville and Roesdale I went down to the Maryland-Virginia conference. It was my good fortune to have Brother Watson accompany me. He went to represent the National Sunday School Association and I tried to represent the College. The conference was in the Mt. Olive church in Virginia. Neither Brother Watson nor myself had ever been in the Shenandoah Valley. We both decided that the Valley was all we had ever heard it represented to be. We had a most enjoyable trip and the conference was a splendid conference. It was a pleasure to meet the ministers, both the older ones and the younger ones, who are serving in this district. We were accorded the most cordial, Christian treatment, and we were made to feel that truly it was good to be there. I am glad to say that Maryland and Virginia churches are ready for me to come to them in the interest of endowment. And I look forward with real pleasure to the time when I shall cover this field.

The Senior Class at Ashland decided that the Sophomore Class should not outdo them a single whit in their devotion and loyalty to the College. Accordingly yesterday forenoon the closing feature of an exceptionally strong Class Day program was the presentation to me by the president of the class of $350 for Permanent endowment from the 1918 Class. This was a noble gift, and all the more so because we know the givers were actuated only by their sense of true love for their Alma Mater. Gifts like these from our student body ought to inspire every true Brethren in the brotherhood with a resolve to do his or her best for the cause of permanent endowment. This money will be raised. Only how will the church feel and how will the individual feel when it is all done if either church or individual proved slacker? This is no time for either a congregation or an individual member to fail. This is the time to make good.

Campaign Secretary.

Must the Church Pay the Bill?

About the most difficult task before the church at present is to prevent its being run on a siding while other things less important are given the right-of-way. This is a danger with which she is being threatened, not by the unchurched and non-church-going masses, but by the church members themselves. And this danger will become all the more pronounced as the necessity for popular sacrifice becomes more generally realized. The time is at hand for raising our voices against switching the church to a place of secondary importance before the harm done becomes irretrievable.

These are days for the exercising of a high quality of patriotism that willingly makes sacrifices. Every Christain who has a worthy grasp of the values of civilization and Christianity recognizes and acknowledges this. There are hosts of citizens who will not be called upon to make the supreme sacrifice. But he who will not make what sacrifices he is called upon to make and finds it possible to make, while others are facing German bullets and bayonets in his behalf can scarcely feel himself worthy of the benefits and blessings which Christian America guarantees to him. And so, manifestly, when our church people are called upon to buy Liberty Bonds and War Savings Stamps we offer no word of discouragement, but rather encouragement. If that is the way you can help, we would say, "Do your best, not your bit. Loan the government all the money you can. The most you can do is the least you ought to do. But when you have done the very most you can, even to the point of sacrifice, and you look about to see where you can cut down your normal expenses to make such help possible will it be the allowance you set aside for the church of Christ to which you will give first attention? Will you give more meagerly to the Lord's work, that you may buy Liberty Bonds? Of all your varied interests and calls for expenditure is the church the least important? Will you leave other items in your budget unshaven and cancel or cut down this one to pay the cost of your patriotism? Must the church foot the bill?

Again we are living in days when voices of distress are calling as never before for relief from the strong, stalwart church of Christ. And by its inspiration though not by its ordination there is going forth the Red Cross to minister to the sick, the wounded, and the dying in humanity's name and in Christ's. For is not this cross with its red a memorial of the sacrifice of the cross of Calvary? Here is the Christian's supreme opportunity to obey Christ's admonition to feed the hungry, clothe the naked, visit the sick and minister in every manner to the physical needs of those in distress. By so doing, he declared, we may minister unto him. To support the Red Cross in every possible way is a duty lying before the door of every Christian, a duty which cannot be ignored. But when a man makes a worthy contribution to this noble work shall he with the other hand withdraw a like amount from his gifts to the church and the movements to extend Christ's kingdom in the world? Is church fellowship a luxury that one may easily deny himself of in stringent times like these? Are all the other benefits and conveniences of life so indispensible that the church can be sacrificed in preference to them? Must the church stand the cost of his sympathy for mankind? Must the church pay the bill?

Then the war department of the Y. M. C. A. is calling for the assistance of every patriot and Christian. And it deserves our best. There is no more important agency connected with the present war than the Y. M. C. A. It is translating religion into practical service and causing human sympathy to flow out into benevolent deeds. It is adapting itself to the needs of every situation. Especially is it a great boon to the boys in the camps. I am in correspondence with a number of boys on this side of the Atlantic and "over there," and they all praise it in the highest terms. One of the boys writes, "I don't htink it is possible to tell just how much the Y. M. C. A. means to a fellow in camp. It means more to me than anything else and I only hope that wherever I go I will find a 'Y' there" In another letter I read this compliment to the splendid men in charge of this work: "Whenever we see a Y. M. secretary we know we have a friend and can go to him for counsel and help." The Y. M. C. A. is a great institution conducting a great work in a great way and Christian people can scarcely give their money to a nobler cause. But even to give to such a worthy institution as this shall we withdraw our support, in whole or in part, from the church to make such gifts possible? Of all the other interests that call for a portion of our income is this the first we should desire to sacrifice? It is evident that our budget of expenditure must be revised, the least important items must be cut out in order to make these war loans and gifts possible, but will the church be counted among the least important? Is her work to be sacrificed? Must she bear the cost of our movings of human sympathy and patriotism?

These are only a few instances of the many calls of these times of travail; calls so urgent that a man cannot resist them and possess his soul. Harry Emmerson Fosdick says in his book, "The Challence of the Present Crisis," "He must have a callous soul who can pass through times like these and not hear a voice whose call a man must answer or lose his soul." A man can scarcely be fully human and turn a deaf ear to his fellow humans in distress. To be unresponsive is to be both inhuman and unchristian.

"But how can we answer all of these calls? It takes all that we can make to live." That is the widespread reply. And it is a statement of fact, a fact as much to our discredit as it is true. We are spending all we make because we are living so extravagantly. That is recognized American folly. But we must answer the calls, and answer them we will, if for no other reason than to keep up a pretense of patriotism; though we must cut down our expenditures to do so. However, it is not our extravagances, but our contributions to the church of the living God that we generally cut. As I hold my ears to the civilian masses I hear selfish souls say "We must have our eats, our drinks and our pleasures; our luxuries must go on." Patriotism admonishes that food will win the war, therefore we should conserve food in every possible way and help the boys in the trenches. But selfishness replies "That doesn't touch me. I'll have all I want as long as I can get it." And since we must buy Liberty Bonds, but cannot maintain our extravagance and keep up our customary church support, the church support must suffer loss. Many a man in the church today will have his luxuries though he must cut down his offerings to the Kingdom to do so. Not only ought the church's income not be reduced; it ought to be increased. These are days of unparalleled opportunity, when the church ought to drive forward. But she is being held back for lack of funds. Multitudes of her members live in luxury or extravagance while the church is compelled to pay the cost of their display of patriotism. A church member who had an automobile smash-up said he would be unable to contribute anything toward an advance move in the Kingdom because it would take all he could scrape up to buy another machine. Luxury he must have though the church must pay the bill.

Right here is the item we must strike out in order to meet the demands of the times. Luxury and extravagance must go or the church must mortgage her soul. These are serious days for the church as well as for the state. A man can be neither a Christian nor a patriot who is extravagant in such a crisis. It is generally acknowledged that democracy and autocracy are in the balance.

Forget It

No, this is not a slang expression. Perhaps it once was, but so were a great many other common expressions that have been taken from the slang class and lifted to a place in the list of words accepted and approved as good English. None of us would accuse the Apostle Paul of using slang in his writings and yet he used a modified form of this expression when he wrote, "Forgetting the things that are behind and reaching forth, etc."

Some things we are expressly taught should be remembered and it is not at all difficult to understand why they should be remembered, their helpfulness is recognized and there is no objection to remembering them, but on the other hand there are things that should be as surely forgotten, but it seems the things we should forget are so often remembered and cherished while the things we should remember are neglected and forgotten.

Great changes have taken place almost within the last few months, so rapidly is modern life moving forward, or should we say backward? In some respects it does look as though the modern world has reverted in a measure to the days of savagery, but we like to think of this lapse as only a going backward in order to get a good running start for a mighty leap upward and onward. The great war has upset all our calculations and we are left almost without a leg to stand on so far as some of our former theories of life are concerned. The conditions of the world and of life have made so great changes we sometimes wonder how we are going to get back to the life we were living before the war came. While we would not for worlds have the present situation continue, are we sure we want to get back to the life we lived before this great stress came upon us? Recently David Lloyd George said, "Don't always be thinking of getting back to where you were before the war." Just the other day we heard one of the proprietors of one of the largest concerns of its kind in all the world tell of a conversation he had had with his older brother, the senior partner of the great company, in regard to some changes they must adopt in their immense factory to meet the conditions of the present, when the senior member of the firm said, "But how are we going to get back to where we were before the war?" And the younger member who has charge of the production department of the plant replied, "Forget it," and in his relating the incidents of the conversation he added, "Sufficient unto the day are the evils thereof."

How true this is we all know, and we also know that it will be impossible to make the world and life just what it was before this great world-calamity came upon us, so perhaps after all the best thing we can do is to "forget it" and immediately get busy with plans to improve upon all the past and to make the most of present opportunities in getting ready for still greater opportunities that are sure to come when peace is once again established between the nations of the earth. The world is being tried as Paul said the works of man should be tried, "so as by fire," and most certainly the wood, hay and stubble are being consumed, but in the end it will be found that the real gold of humanity has been made all the brighter because of the fire.

Patriotic Sophistry

There are many peculiar "kinks" in the minds of some of us as we try to square our religious convictions with our patriotic expressions. To my mind there is no conflict at all between personal religion and patriotic duty, if one has made no mistake in developing his religion or in acquiring a sense of his patriotic duty. It is true a patriot is sometimes called upon to do things that are contrary to his religious convictions and yet to live up to his religious convictions may brand him a traitor to his country which he really loves. It is not at all difficult to be placed in a "strait betwixt two" in this matter, and there are surely honest souls that are both seeking spiritual light and a knowledge of a right relation to earthly affairs, even the governments of the world.

That there is a conflict or a contradiction between "love and duty" at the present time in the soul of many an honest man can not be denied and it is no mark of superiority to condem outright those who do not see eye to eye with us for they may be just as honest and just as sincere and just as nearly right in their attitude as we are; and as Christians we are under obligation to respect their beliefs. But it is a strange sight to watch some of the mental spiritual and theological gymnastics some of our present day teachers would perform in order to square their practices with what they have formerly claimed as religious beliefs and with the direct and plain teaching of the Word of God. It is amusing too to see how readily a large portion of our people swallow the sayings of men whose minds have been turned to religion and theology only since the great world calamity has come upon us and who would speak to us with the same degree of certainty and authority as those who have given a lifetime to study and meditation of the things of God and of his way of dealing with mankind. Perhaps none of us would question the sincerity of purpose of the great singer Harry Lauder in the work he is doing among the soldiers, but that will not remove the sophistry from his statement: "God tells us to we must love our enemies. He can't expect us to love HIS enemies."

Toward Sodom

It is no new thing that men should look with longing eyes in the direction where greatest worldly prosperity seems to be and that they should follow their look with action. A long time ago there came a time when the herdsmen of two of the old Hebrew patriarchs could not agree upon the division of the pastures and watering places where they kept their herds and their flocks; whereupon the old man of faith who really believed God called his nephew to him and said, "There should be no strife between your herdsmen and my herdsmen, there is room in the world for us all, now you take your choice of the land and drive your flocks in that direction and I will go the opposite way." This was a magnanimous proposition and eagerly seized upon by the younger man, and we are told "he pitched his tents toward Sodom." And the world that has put material advantage before spiritual blessing has been pitching its tents toward Sodom ever since. Just what may constitute Sodom for one people or for one country may not be the Sodom for others, but in every land the tents are constantly being pitched in that direction. People fail to realize that there are many things in life that are of greater importance than material gain.

Whether one accepts the scientific theory of the evolution of man or not there is no getting away from the principles upon which evolution in a general sense is based, for the evidences of these principles are too plentiful about us on every hand. We speak of the marked changes that are taking place in the world of humanity as "social evolution" and they are rightly named, and such progress is needed for the good of mankind, but it needs to be brought about with a great deal of care and mingled with no small amount of common sense.

There are some things that are taking place in the development of modern life and in the evolution of the social systems of the world that will need the most careful watching and directing if they are to prove of real benefit to future generations. As no generation is free from the influences of the generation that preceded it, so also no generation is free from the influence it must have upon the generation that is to follow. And no generation of men has any right to think only of present good when there is so much of the future that depends upon the present. To plan for present good at the expense of future generations is not the mark of a philanthropic people and in all that men do proper consideration MUST be given to the effect it will have upon the people who come after.

A prominent writer recently said, "It is one of the most alarming symptoms of recent social evolution that the people are ceasing to inhabit the country." In what way is this great social change alarming do you say? Why, in many ways. Perhaps the greatest question that any people must face is the food question. It was the food question that drove Jacob and the Hebrew children into Egypt and that put them into bondage for four hundred years, and it is the food question that is driving many people to revolutionary measures today. Primarily people are leaving the country because they think they can better their condition in the cities,, but no food is produced in the cities, and the more the people flock to the cities and "pitch their tents toward Sodom" the greater will the food problem become.

NOW THEN DO IT.—II Samuel 3:18

Conducted by Charles A. Bame

Which Goals Are Hardest to Reach?

The reports on the Four-Year Program that were submitted March 1st, recently came into my hands. It occurred to me that it would be interesting to figure out which goals are proving easiest, and which hardest, for the congregation to reach.

I have based this study upon all the full reports that were submitted at this time. Only 96 congregations, about one-half of the congregations listed in the Annual, made complete reports in this canvass. Consequently, these 96 congregations were used as a basis of the study. Among these 96 there are congregations from every district in the Brotherhood. Therefore, these 96 congregations represent the entire Brotherhood quite accurately.

The study takes account of 12 of the 16 goals included in the program. Because Brother Beachler has not yet visited most of the districts, goal 8 was left out of the study. Because the offerings for Foreign Missions and for the Board of Benevolences had not been taken when the report was made, these were left out of account. For similar reasons the goal that deals with conference attendance was ignored. All of the other 12 goals were considered.

Which Ones Have Proved Easiest?

The goal which the largest number of congregations reached is goal 3—the use of Four-Year Program subjects as the subjects of sermons. Seventy of the 96 congregations reached this goal. This shows that the preachers are interested in the program. Eighteen other congregations are making progress towards this goal. These are, mainly, churches that do not have services every Sunday, so they are taking more time, as is perfectly justifiable.

The next easiest goal is the payment in full of the district missionary apportionment. Sixty-seven had reached this goal, with 22 making progress toward it. Only 7 regard the goal as lost for this year. This is a pretty fine record. It shows, too, the advantage of churches getting into a good habit.

The third easiest goal is the use of the budget system of finance. Fifty-six congregations had reached it by March 1st, and 22 others were making progress toward it. Again the benefits of a good habit are shown.

Fourth in the roll of honor is the home, or national, missionary goal. Fifty congregations had attained it, with 32 reporting progress.

The Harder Goals

The front-line Sunday school goal is fifth in the list. Thirty-seven congregations had qualified upon this point, 29 were hopeful, and 30 considered it impossible of attainment this year.

As a fine testimony to the spiritual life of the congregations, attendance at the communion service takes sixth place. Thirty-six congregations had 75 per cent of the membership present at communion service before March 1st, and 41 others hoped to reach this proportion before the year is completed.

The S. S. C. E. goal finds seventh place. The congregations are grouped almost into thirds in their standing on this point; 31 reached it, 33 were hopeful, and 32 had failed.

Showing magnificent progress, the Brethren Evangelist takes position 8. Yet, the standing on this goal is not what it ought to be, nor will be. With 30 congregations having the paper in 75 per cent of the homes, and 30 moving in that direction, 36 have seemingly ceased aspiring unto this achievement during this year.

The Hardest Goals

It would seem that the increase in church membership would be the hardest of all the goals, and final report may show it up so. Nevertheless, the reports now in hand place it in position 9. Twenty-six congregations are growing at the rate of 30 per cent increase in four years, and 37 report progress.

Strange to say, goal 1, or increase in the attendance at prayer-meetings, is so far down the line as in tenth place. Twenty-six congregations have made this goal and 34 are progressing toward it. This is a goal that looked easy, but isn't.

Getting new recruits for the ministry and missionary service is next to the hardest goal, according to this report. Yet, inasmuch as the congregations have the entire four years to enlist the one, two, or three recruits that will be required of each congregation, this low standing for goal 6 is not in accord with the facts. The discouraging feature of the report upon this goal is that 51 congregations report failure. Evidently they have no candidate developing. Twenty-six have made the goal, and 19 are progressing.

The C. E. goal is the hardest of all. Only 21 congregations have a society or societies reaching the standard of the C. E. Union. Twenty-eight report progress, but 47 have given it up as hopeless for this year

Conclusions

It is not for the writer to draw conclusions from this survey. It is the task of pastors, district and national goal directors, and all workers upon the program to do so.

The great, outstanding fact which this report reveals is that the goals can be reached. The average congregation that really tries can reach most, if not all, of the congregational goals. In some cases the congregations may need to be convinced that the goals are really worth while. The task before the district and national goal directors is to convince the congregations that the goals are worth the effort of reaching them.

That the goals really are worth the effort of reaching them, the Four-Year Program Committee and the two past General Conferences profoundly believe. There can be no defense except that of indifference or laziness, for whole sections of congregations reporting, "failure," "failure," "failure," throughout almost the entire list. Even a Brethren congregation ought to have the energy and consecration to be an aggressive congregation, or have the grace to quit and yield its field to some denomination that will push the interests of the Kingdom of God and his Christ.

DONT'S TO PASTORS

Don't preach a gospel of woe to spiritually hungry souls. Give them the Bread of Life.

Don't waste your energy on unconvertible "fools" or self-righteous pharisees; but on saveable folks.

Don't preach damnation to men like Nicodemus, Zacheus or Lazarus; they do not need it.

Don't size up your wisdom by the size of your feet; quality and quantity vary.—Selected.

The New Internationalism

BY RUTH TEETER, A.B.

Modern history has been characterized by the growth of two great movements,—democracy and nationalism. As the world emerged from the Middle Ages, men gradually began to demand equal rights with their fellows. As the spirit of democracy grew, it became the seed-ground for nationalism; national boundaries became more distinct; the nations became self-conscious. This is especially true of the last century. And as consciousness of national existence increased it became more necessary that the relations between the nations be clearly defined. This necessity called forth the system of international law. The world has met in conferences to more accurately determine this law and to make for such peace and harmony that war would become impossible. But we have discovered that it is yet possible and that therefore there is need for a new internationalism.

The past century has witnessed an unprecedented knitting together of the nations. The peace conferences have not been the cause but the result of the growing sensitiveness of the nations toward each other and their growing dependence upon one another for the welfare of the whole. Science, industry, art and literature have become international; they no longer remain behind closed doors but are ready to be used of all. "What is done in one country is not for that country alone but for the sake of mankind." However, the world has not sufficiently safeguarded the rights of nations, particularly the smaller oness. There has been no political internationalism. Our much-loved and prized liberty has not become universal. Silently but surely, there have been employed secret and sordid means to further national ambition for power and dominion and this has led to a breaking of the fraternity of nations. All other ties have become insignificant to these destroyers of world peace. "Might makes right they have said and are trying to realize. But the Allies are determined that it shall never be realized, that Autocracy shall be crushed. For otherwise the flower of her youth has been cut down in vain.

After the war, what? What will be the new spirit of internationalism existing between the nations? Let us first look upon the spirit of national self-consciousness as it has grown up within the past century all over the world. Nations asleep, have awakened. Nations down-trodden and oppressed for centuries have discovered their dormant strength and have demanded freedom and equality for the individual. Nations held by another to which they did not really belong, have fought for national autonomy. What really constitutes a nation is not boundaries, or a common language, but "is a sentiment and an instinct, a sentiment of similarity and an instinct of belonging to the same group." So the Croatians of Austria-Hungary believed themselves to be a separate nation with the right to rule themselves. In 1848 they fought for this, in 1918 they having not received, are yet demanding and we believe must finally be given it.

The year 1848 will be remembered long because all over Europe the struggle for democracy ran high. The people did not always gain their end; many times failed, but the tendency was there and yet remains. Russia, great and mysterious Russia, with all her eastern civilization felt the pulse of this new spirit, and though she is yet in the throes of the birth struggle of democracy, the world is confident it will come. Italy stands at last a united people, free from foreign control and with a freedom undreamed of at the beginning of the century. The same spirit pervaded Germany, but was successfully crushed and today the Prussian with his belief of his own superiority, holds the fate of the German people in his hands.

The East has awakened to her possibilities and is restless, resourceful and keen. She sees the promised fruit of democracy and has sought to reach it. But with her it is yet a tender plant but is being vitally fostered by western civilization and the principles of Christianity. What will her attitude be among the brotherhood of nations? Will she be a brother or a tyrant when she comes to a realization of her full strength?

With all the growth of democratic spirit and national self-consciousness and with all the glories of the new nationalism, there are certain faults which have to be guarded against. Dr. Washington Gladden recently said that he was afraid of an "outburst of the disease of nationalism." Pride, ambition, greed and self-interest are not confined to Germany alone. America herself is not free from it. An American paper says "World Empire is the only logical and natural aim of a nation. It is the absolute right of a nation to live to its fullest intensity, to expand, to found colonies, to get richer and richer by any proper means, such as an armed conquest, commerce and diplomacy." While such utterances do not represent the ideals of the nation as a whole, yet a rumbling below the surface may show the existence of an undesirable presence in our midst.

But nationalism must surrender to internationalism of a high type. For what will deliver the nations from all these faults unless it be the international mind? The day of national isolation has passed. It has become impossible. The individual to be a true member of world brotherhood must today think in broader terms than his own nation. The nation to become a member in good standing of world brotherhood must think and act in international terms and for international good. This will not destroy patriotism; it will only make it of a deeper and more abiding character. But at the same time, instead of acting for selfish interests, a nation will act in the interests of all. "Nationality is sacred to me, because I see in it the instrument of labor for the progress of all men." In these words, Mazinni is the voice of the international mind. A German will not fight for the ideals of Germany when he sees that her armies will bring misery and destruction upon humanity at large. An American will fight for the cause of democracy though he has no material ends to gain.

The international mind will bring about the abandonment of selfish nationalism with all for which it stands. It will demand that treaties made shall be more than "a scrap of paper;" that the demoralizing spy system, secret diplomacy and intrigue, so characteristic of European politics shall not be harbored among any people, that in the words of President Wilson, "No nation should seek to extend its policy over any other nation or people, but that every people should be left free to determine its own policy, its own way of development, unhindered, unthreatened, unafraid, the little along with the great and powerful."

By forward-looking men and women the world over, a new internationalism is hailed as the only solution of a world without war. Just what form in the political world it will take, it is at present difficult to predict. But we hear many times of the League of Nations, which would unite all the nations of the world into a confederation having a common government with legislative, executive and judicial power. It should possess an army and navy, which should be the only ones in existence. "There can be no secure peace in the world or any decisions of international questions according to international law until states are willing to part with their sovereignty as regards their external relations and to leave the decision in such matters to some international instrument of government." And it is believed the world would soon come to see the wisdom of such a procedure and no more would armies fight on land and sea to decide disputed questions. No more could one nation for dominion and power be permitted to wage a ruthless warfare on humanity. No more would the people of one nation be made to be subservient to another as the Polish people are today. All questions of boundaries would come under international law. Nations would be given the right of ruling themselves or of being under the government they chose. "The civilized nations of the world are faced with the alternative of co-operation or mutual destruction. . . and it is difficult to believe that they would deliberately choose to destroy civilization rather than acquiesce in the abolition of war."

The new internationalistic spirit will take the form which has been expressed by American and Allied ideals. While there may be selfish motives in the present war, yet the big thing for which we are fighting, is that "the world may be made safe for democracy;" that each people may be governed by the consent of the governed. America seeks no material gain in this war. She only asks that the Monroe doctrine should be extended to European affairs, that the strong will protect the weak from aggression.

While the new internationalism must be perpetuated through a permanent political world court or something of like nature, yet its spirit must grow in the hearts of men that it may be truly successful. The principles of Christ, which in essence confirm the principle of democracy, must extend to the government of nations as well as to individuals. That this spirit is slowly finding a way into national politics, America showed to the world when she startled it by returning China's indemnity after the Boxer uprising. Only when justice, truth, honor and mercy characterize the relations of one people to another, will the world become a safe place in which to live. And these virtues are the direct outgrowth of Christianity which some one has said is "the exalted type of international good will." "We shall yet learn," says Dr. Fosdick, "that the best armament of any people is the friendship of the world won by constructive good-will."

Slowly we perceive this spirit of good will growing. Siam's reason for entering the war is to "uphold the sanctity of international rights against nations showing a contempt of humanity." The Allied Nations are all fighting that the spirit of peace may find a resting-place on the earth, that the spirit of hatred will find an abiding-place impossible, and that humanity will rule, that the word of Lincoln may apply to the war-torn world: "With malice toward none; with charity for all; with firmness for the right, as God gives us to see the right, let us strive on to finish the work we are in; to bind up the nation's wounds; to care for him who shall have borne the battle, and for his widow and his orphan—to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and lasting peace among ourselves and with all nations."

Travelogue Sermonettes

HOBBYHORSES

My train stopped at a dinky little station to take water, and my coach window was just opposite a very plain little home like those crowded along the railroad track. Through the door I saw a little three-year-old boy on a red hobby horse, riding as fast as he could go. He was very much in earnest. He did not even stop to look at the train.

The little boy who is so unfortunate in this world as not to be able to own a hobbyhorse is compelled to be content with riding astride a broomstick, fork handle, or any other convenient substitute that he may find for a horse. But every boy has to have a horse. He cannot imitate papa in driving and riding without a horse.

The more favored class of boys hugely enjoy their hobby horses, and what is more pleasing than to see the wild, eager look in the boy's eyes when he steps up and takes hold of the bridle of his first new hobby horse, and with the triumphant swing of his foot, mounts and sits astride and gallops away into illimited fields of ecstacy?

These things are all right in their place, but they only have one place in the world. The only grudge that we can possibly hold against the hobbyhorse is on account of one of its chief characteristics. A great many horses have the peculiar faculty of throwing the rider when he wants to ride, but the hobbyhorse is different. Many a man would get off his hobby and ride a decent horse, were it not that the hobby succeeds in holding him where he was when a boy. In other words, there are a few men in this world that never leave their childhood far enough to get away from their hobbyhorses, but they go through life riding a hobbyhorse that is worse than a wooden one. We find them in the political arena, intelligent men, too, who will select a certain hobby, and every single conversation, argument and speech will concentrate itself, and finally wind up right on the back of that hobbyhorse. People in business matters, sometimes narrow themselves down to such a channel that they cannot converse upon and other subject, except their hobby, be it whatever it may.

In church affairs it is no uncommon thing to find an individual who, in writing, speaking or in private conversation, turns everything possible towards his hobby. Ministers sometimes preach from Genesis to Revelation and see nothing in a single chapter between, but their special hobby, whether it be a doctrinal point, historical fact or a religious tenet..

Nothing is more harmful to Christianity today than the different sects and denominations which go to make up the great church of Christianity; than for the layman to select a certain pet hobby and persist in riding it to the satisfaction of himself and to the disgust of everybody else.

There is not a man in five hundred who would literally take a little hobbyhorse out into the street and get astride it and ride there for ten or fifteen minutes, for any reasonable amount of money, and yet thousands of men are doing that very thing in the different ways mentioned above.

Now ask yourself this question, "Have I a hobby, and do I ride him?"

Los Angeles, California.

Orthodoxy Did Not Kill Christ

It has become very popular to ridicule orthodoxy and revile the historic position of the church upon certain fundamental positions.

Such a course gets one's name into the newspapers, for one thing, and for a time secures a certain kind of popularity. It smacks of learning and gives the impression of scholarship—in certain quarters.

On a recent Sunday evening in a popular church of this city the pastor, (in extenuation it may be said he is still young,) delivered himself of the following:

"Orthodoxy is falling into disrepute and the word heretic, which was once a term of scorn and disgrace, is now one of admiration and praise."

"When orthodoxy took at the beginning of its career the divine young man of Nazareth and nailed him to the cross, it gained for itself the ultimate displeasure and scorn of all good men."

That sounds smart ond conclusive until one begins a bit of inquiry and reflection.

We are all well aware that the term "orthodoxy" may be variously defined, according to the views of those who define it, and that the name "heretic" has often been hurled at the man who has dared to combat error which has crept into credal statements.

But there is likewise this great fact to be considered when one rails out in broad diatribes against orthodoxy that specifically the term stands for Trinitarianism, and the "orthodox" are such as have stood unflinchingly for the doctrine of the deity of Jesus Christ.

The tendency of modern day liberalism, and we suppose it has always been so, is to deny the eternal sonship of the Nazarene and reduce him to the level of merely human.

Now that was exactly the attitude of those who procured the crucifixion of the Master. Christ came to the cross because the leaders of the Jewish church rejected his claims of deity, charging him with blasphemy because he claimed to be the "Son of God. Those who cried out, and incited others to take up the cry "Crucify him, Crucify him" held the same views concerning the person of Jesus as those in our day with a supercilious air discount his eternal existence with the Father and scoff at miracluous conception.

It was heterodoxy, and not orthodoxy, that killed Christ, represented by men holding identical opinions upon the person of Christ as advanced by the so-called "liberals" and "advanced thinkars" of our time.

One need not be afraid of that term "orthodoxy." It stands today for the highest and best in Christian thinking and theology. Its message has power. The Christ it preaches is mighty and satisfying. Its adherents are proclaiming a worth while gospel to the sin cursed nations of the world, breaking the grip of evil upon thousands of lives and bringing hope to multitudes out of whose sky the light had gone and from whose heart hope had fled.—Evangelical Messenger.

Is Your Automobile a Church Member?

Has your automobile joined the church? Have you a special decree of absolution from on high as to the conduct of your automobile on the Sabbath?

The real fact is that the average automobile is so unregenerate that it often leads its owner away from the path of Christian duty. You know all about that "Brother Barnabas." You know one of your own parishioners only last week—or was it last year? —suffered a back-sliding disaster of sad results just through the influence of his unconverted automobile. He has been a faithful church-goes since his earliest childhood, having formed the habit by accompanying his sainted mother to the old meeting house among the maple trees in the long ago. And when he purchased the automobile, he really intended to have it join the church at once; and as he lived at some distance from his usual place of worship, he concluded with easy logic that he would now be sure to get to church in good time. But some one in the family suggested a visit to Uncle Hezekiah who lived on Indian Creek, forty miles away. It was not a long battle that took place within the breast of Brother Faithful that Sunday morning, but it was a hard-fought struggle, just as decisive and in its own eternal way, just as eventful, as the battle of Waterloo. They went to Uncle Hezekiah, passing the doors of the church on the way, just as the bell was calling to morning worship, the bell which never before had called in vain to the household of Brother Faithful. "But Aunt Mary lives forty miles in the opposite direction, and might feel slighted if not visited the next Sunday;" and so it is to Aunt Mary's; to cousin John's the next Sunday; and then to the Springs; then to the mountains; then to the seaside; always going and coming on Sunday for the short journey; always starting on Sunday for the long tour. There is only one safe way, Brother Barnabas. Get your people to answer in the affirmative this vital question, "has your automobile jonied the church?" The automobile that fails to join the church will almost invariably lead its owner astray from the church. The automobile that joins the church can do three things:

First—It will always convey its Christian owner to the place of worship and will prove itself the best vehicle of the ages for getting the entire household there, thus helping to realize the truth that the family is the unit of the Church of Christ.

Second—It will become the long-prayed-for opportunity by which the aged, the halt, the lame, the blind, and all the shut-ins of the community, can enjoy, occasionally at least, the privileges of the sanctuary.

Third—It can be made a symbol and a vehicle of the church's spiritual hospitality by conveying to the sanctuary those who are strangers in the community.—Methodist Recorder.

Did You

Did you ever stumble around in the dark to look for a match, and find that—

The table reaches entirely across the room?

The wall advances to the center of the room to meet you?

The electric light switch has disappeared?

The chairs each have twenty-seven legs?

And the bureau, upon which you left the matches has disappeared entirely?—Burr.

The Sunday School

Important to Sunday Schools

In last week's issue of the EVANGELIST special attention was called to the EIGHT-PAGE PAMPHLET which is now being printed to accompany the Sunday school literature for the third quarter.

Every school should have as many copies of this pamphlet as there are teachers and officers in the school, including a copy for the pastor and superintendent. Members of Adult Bible classes also can make very good use of them.

The pamphlet contains, (1) the general titles of the twelve lessons with the scripture passages indicated for study; (2) the special title for each grade throughout the twelve lessons.; (3) the Golden Text for each lesson; (4) the Memory Verses for Junior and Primaries; (5) the additional scriptural passages for teachers and pupils through all the grades for the twelve lessons; (6) the special passages indicated for teachers; (7) suggestions for study and preparation.

The price of this pamphlet is so low that it barely covers the cost of making, namely, ONE CENT each by the fifty and hundred copies. In less quantities, fifteen cents per dozen. If your order for literature has already been sent in, a post card will bring you the required number of copies. Order at once.

International Sunday School Convention

Buffalo, N. Y., June 19—25, 1918

"WAR TIME CONVENTION"

Of the Sunday School Forces of the Continent is what the leaders are designating the 15th Convention of the International Sunday School Association—which opens in Buffalo, N. Y., June 19 and continues for a week.

Never before in the history of the Association has there been a livelier interest in a convention, and General Secretary Marion Lawrence says: "Delegates are enrolling in a most encouraging way." He adds that "Perhaps half the States that have reported, desire more than their quota of delegates."

Sixty-one States and Provincial Associations will send representatives, and when President E. K. Warren calls the Convention to order in Elmwood Hall, Wednesday morning, June 19, he will probably face 3,000 Sunday school workers from every section of the Western Hemisphere.

General Secretary Lawrance, who, with Business Superintendent Robert Cashman of Chicago, spent last week in Buffalo, says the convention promises to be the most important as well as the largest in the long history of the Association. "The program will surpass any Sunday school Program ever presented." More than 150 men and women will contribute to the success of the "message expression" of the great gathering, and the Committee makes the announcement that "Worth-while service," rather than oratorical accomplishments, has been sought in the make-up of the program.

The list of men and women who will take part in the half a hundred public meetings of the convention, indicates that the efforts of the committee have not been in vain.

The regular convention will be preceded by an important meeting of the International Lesson Committee now in the 46th year of its far-reaching influence. This committee selects and presents the lesson topics, the texts, and the golden texts used by more than 20,000,000 Sunday school members throughout the world. The committee represents alike the International Association, and the Denominations. The Chairman is Principal E. I. Rexford of the Diocesan College, Montreal, Quebec; and the Secretary is Professor Ira M. Price of Chicago University.

The Convention prayer, which will open the Buffalo meeting, was prepared by Rev. Dr. J. H. Jowett, just before he left America for England. It has been printed, and will be repeated by the 3,000 delegates, under the leadership of President Warren.

The plan of the convention, as announced by the Committee, indicates a little change from former gatherings. The morning sessions will be devoted to reports and business, the afternoon to departmental conferences, and the evenings to inspirational addresses. Saturday will be "Recreation Day,"—with excursions about the city; to Niagara Falls, and to other places of interest. In the evening the "Pilgrims" who have attended one or more of the World Conventions will have a reunion; the Canadian delegates will have a banquet or social, and the elementary workers will have "A Patriotic Birthday Social."

There will be no session on Sunday, but a "Morning Watch" service will be held at 7:30 A. M., in the Asbury-Delaware Methodist Episcopal church. At the morning services in the churches and Sunday schools of Buffalo and vicinity, there will be addresses and sermons by visiting delegates.

In the afternoon there will be held the great Temperance Mass Meeting, and in the evening the World's Sunday School Association work will be presented, with speakers representing several of the great Missionary fields.

Officers will be selected Thursday or Friday to serve until the next quadriennial Convention in 1922. A nominating committee, consisting of one representative appointed by each state or provincial Association, will meet Wednesday, and will report as soon as a list of officers is agreed upon.

Maintaining Christian Democracy

"We can't maintain a Christian Democracy unless we maintain a system of efficient Christian School," says Professor Walter S. Athearn, of Boston University, who is also educational superintendent of the International Sunday School Association.

Prof. Athearn has prepared for the International Sunday School Convention at Buffalo, June 19-25, a constructive program that has challenged the attention of educators in all parts of the Continent, and educational conferences announced for Monday, June 24, will consider the general topics of "Week-day Religious Schools," "The Curriculum," "Community Training Schools," "The Religious Education of the Rural Community," "Community Organization and Teacher Training," "Religious Education in Special Fields."

Under these general heads, there will be a sub-division of topics covering the most important phases of the general subject, be devoted to discussion, followed by a summary by a prominent educator.

Professor Athearn says :"The price of our religious liberty is the sum required for the building of a system of church schools, which will parallel our system of public schools and be equally efficient. We do not have in this country a system of public education; we have only a system of public schools, but this system of of schools does not work with the whole child. It is but half an educational arch. We must complete the arch by building a system of church schools, closely co-ordinated with the public schools. These two systems of schools,—one supported by the state, with secular leadership,—the other supported by the church, with religious leadership, will form the only system of education that a country can have, in which the church and a State are apart. The building of this system of church schools is the task now pressing for completion."

"Make Democracy Safe for the World," is the central theme to be considered at a great educational mass meeting on the opening night of the Buffalo Convention. Hon. P. P. Claxton, of Washington, D. C., United States Commissioner of Education, will speak on "Public Education and the Democratic State;" Professor Athearn will consider "The American System of Religious Education;" and Professor M. A. Honline of Bonebrake Seminary, Dayton, Ohio, will present "The Urgent Need of a National Program of Religious Education." At this season Mr. Leroy S. Churchill, a prominent Christian business man of Buffalo, and chairman of the local Committee of 100, will welcome the delegates to the Convention City.

Among the well-known educators who are expected to attend the Buffalo Convention are: Hon. P. P. Claxton, Washington, D. C., United States Commissioner of Education; Prof. Walter S. Athearn, Boston University; Dr. Lyman Abbott, New York; Prof. Luther A. Weigle, Yale University; President W. O. Thompson, Ohio State University; former president D. B. Purinton, University of West Virginia; Prof. F. C. Eiselen, Northwestern University, Evanston, Ill.; Prof. H. S. Jacoby, Cornell University, Ithaca, N. Y.; Prof. Ira M. Price, Chicago University; Principal Elson, I. Rexford, Diocesan College, Montreal, Quebec; Dr. George A. Coe, Union Seminary, New York; Prof. M. A. Honline, Bonebrake Seminary, Dayton, Ohio; Prof. E. P. St. John, Hartford Seminary, Hartford, Conn.; Prof. F. S. Goodrich, Albion College, Albion, Mich.; Prof. Howard G. Colwell, St. Louis; Dr. Henry F Cope, General Secretary the Religious Education Association, Chicago, and others.

The Bible Instead of the Ancestral Tablet

It is surely an item of real information to know that special plans are being followed in China to develop the Family Altar in the homes of native Chinese Christians. Rev. E. G. Tewksbury, Field Secretary for China, representing the World's Sunday School Association, has been made Chairman of the Committee on Sunday school and Bible Study of the China Continuation Committee. A special survey was made and it was discovered that not more than half of the Christian homes observed family worship. This is far in excess of the proportion in the homeland. All church members in China are now being urged to establish the habit of daily study of the Word, at which time all the members of the family are to be present. Where this is done and when a pledge to continue has been given a Family Altar Certificate is provided. This pictures the father explaining the selected passage from the Bible, while the mother and children are seated about the room. To make the picture very realistic even the family dog is present. Instead of engaging daily in worship of the ancestors represented by the ancestral tablet the Bible is studied and the living God is worshiped. The new church day in America has also been adopted in China. In place of calling it "Mothers' Day" it is called "Home Sunday," while the added suggestion is given that the week preceding be observed as "Home Welfare Week."

The World in Buffalo

Pilgrims from the various conventions of the World's Sunday School Association who are in attendance at the International Sunday School Convention which will be held in Buffalo June 19-25 will hold a reunion at the Statler hotel on Saturday evening, the 22nd. Then and at the Sunday evening session of the International Convention speakers will be present who have a world-wide first hand knowledge of Sunday school developments abroad. Among the list of participants will be such men as Bishop J. C. Hartzell, for many years missionary Bishop of Africa for the Methodist Episcopal church; Chang Po-ling, the popular principal of Tientsin Chinese High School, and one of the outstanding leaders of new China; Rev. J. L. McLaughlin, Field Secretary for the Philippines, and who has just returned from the Philippine Islands; Rev. J. G. Holdcroft and Mr. M. L. Swinehart, effective Sunday school workers from Korea. Thes Sunday evening service will be held in the Elmwood Convention Hall.

During all the days of the convention there will be a special Exhibit in the World's room on the second floor of the Convention Hall. Sunday school material is being brought from many lands for this occasion. Stereopticon talks will be given at convenient times showing Sunday school activities across the seas. It will be interestingfl just to see the Sunday school lesson helps which are published in many languages.

REVIEW OF

The Thought and Work of the Church

Again we rejoice to add a church to our Evangelist Honor Roll, even though it is another one of the churches that are receiving assistance from the mission board, and it shows that both the church and the pastor are awake to the importance of taking advtaced steps in church work to meet the requirements of the present. This time it is Clay City, Indiana that has won this distinction which comes from placing the Evangelist in every active home of the Brethren belonging to the congregation, and to the energetic pastor, Gorge W. Kinzie must be given a large share of the credit.

Last week the columns of the Evangelist were too full to admit the running of the Honor Roll of churches, so this week you will notice the addition of both the Ft. Scott, Kansas and the Clay City, Indiana churches. We welcome both congregations to this place of honor. Brethren you are in mighty good company when you are included in this list, and to the many churches that are not yet on the list we would say, "Come on in, the water's fine." If the good work continues two months more we will have a glorious report to make at Winona Conference.

We have no apology to offer for the quality of the paper used in printing the Evangelist last week. It was that or nothing. We had used up our last sheet of paper in finishing the run of the Brethren Quarterly the day before, and the car load of paper we bought last February hadn't arrived, and it isn't here yet, though it is somewhere between Wisconsin and Ohio, but where we don't know. So we had to use what we could get for the emergency. We have had shipped to us from Detroit about two tons by express and by electric freight which we hope will supply us until our car load arrives, but in the meantime be prepared to accept any substitute that may be given you, for no one can guarantee anything that is shipped by freight these days.

This week we give to our readers another of the class addresses as delivered at the commencement exercises of Ashland College. We hope to give the remaining one next week. This week we also furnish our readers with the pictures of all the A. B. students of the class. These should have been run last week with the report of the commencement, but the cuts were not available at that time.

The new church at Krypton, Kentucky will be dedicated next Sunday morning, and Dr. J. Allen Miller of Ashland will go to Kentucky to perform this service. Brother Cook, pastor in charge and a former student at Ashland will certainly be glad to welcome Dr. Miller to his mission parish, and we know Dr. Miller will make the mountaineers of Kentucky glad that he is able to do this service for them. Brother Cook has accomplished a good work in this field.

This week we publish a rather full report of the proceedings of the Maryland-Virginia conference. The number of delegates in attendance was greater than the average attendance at an Ohio conference which speaks well for the zeal of our southern churches. The report indicates that the churches of this district are beginning to feel the sense of their responsibility in relation to the Four-Year Program of the church, and they are making earnest efforts to do their part in realizing the goals of the Program. Brethren Beachler and Watson were present from outside the district to represent special interests of the church.

W. R. Deeter, state superintendent of Sunday school promotion for Ohio, makes an important announcement this week. If the Sunday schools of the state expect to reach the standards set for them they must co-operate with the state workers and do what they can to comply with the conditions and requirements as established by the National Association.

The Brethren church at Williamstown, Ohio recently passed through a season of revival with Brethren Coleman and Kemp as the special workers who had come from Iowa to assist the pastor, W. R. Deeter. As a result of these meetings nine souls made the great confession that means salvation. From Williamstown the evangelists went to Gretna, Ohio, where in spite of the busy season of the year they succeeded in stirring up no small interest. Members from each of these congregations assisted each other in the meetings by sending delegations from one to the other at times during the progress of the meetings. At Gretna there were six members added to the church.

N. W. Jennings comes to us again with his travel notes. At this time he is on the Pacific coast where he has been for some months engaged in evangelistic meetings at Sunnyside and Spokane, Washington and at Whittier and at the Compton Avenue church in Los Angeles, California. The Lord has blessed the work of Brother Jennings in all these meetings. eH expects to return to the East afetr he has concluded his meeting in Los Angeles.

A new correspondent furnishes the report from North Manchester this week. Since Brother Bame closed his work with the church the last of April the members have endeavored to keep the work moving forward and have called to assist them at least during the summer C. E. Kolb who is working earnestly with them and all the departments of the church are active, though some are showing indications of greater activity than others. North Manchester is an excellent field for the Brethren and they can not afford to neglect any opportunity for advancing the work of the kingdom.

R. Paul Miller, pastor in Spokane, Washington, writes of many things that occurred in their recent revival meeting that Brother Jennings does not mention. He tells of the preparation the church made for harvesting before Brother Jennings came on to the field. The pastor holds evangelistic services every Sunday evening In order to reach the many people who are a part of the great shifting movements of any large city and the field was pretty well gleaned, but through the united labors and prayers of pastor and evangelist and local people forty one souls made the good confession. It was another victory in the name of the Lord in Spokane. The Sunday school attendance is still on the increase and from this source they expect to build up the church in a large measure.

We have recently received an announcement of the commencement exercise of Chicago University and find the name of Brother H. H. Wolford among the graduates who received their M. A. degree.

Brother G. W. Kinzie comes to our readers with good news besides the achievement of getting the Evangelist into every Brethren home which we mentioned elsewhere. Only recently he had the pleasure of adding five members to the church by baptism. The work at Clay City has its difficulties as other fields have, and being a new work it may have some more, but the members of this congregation are men and women of large faith and they are not easily frightened at ordinary difficulties. They know there is always a way out of the wilderness for the people of God and they earnestly seek that way. One of the secrets of their financial success is revealed by the pastor as he states there are a number of tithers in the congregation, and a group of this type of members will bring success to most any congregation.

On another page appears the announcement of the dedication of the new Brethren church at College Corner, Indiana on Sunday, July seventh. Brother Charles A. Bame, now of Onekama, Michigan will have charge of the dedication.

After an absence of five months while completing a seminary course, F. J. Reagan has gladdened the hearts of the First Brethren church of Los Angeles by returning to his pastorate. During his absence Sylvester Lowman acted as supply pastor, but Brother Lowman is now working under the direction of the Southern California mission board in extension work in California. The First church of Los Angeles seems to be blessed with young people of ability who are able to occasionally conduct the church services when the pastor is absent from the pulpit.

Southern California has a unique way of doing home missionary work. A reading of the report of Brother Sylvester Lowman shows that one of the plans is to place a pastor in charge of a new field even before an effort has been made to organize a Brethren church. The plan worked splendidly at Fillmore where only recently L. S. Bauman conducted a missionary meeting that resulted in the organization of a new Brethren church with thirty members. Two lots were purchased and PAID for upon which they expect to erect a church soon.

After a silence covering a period of several months our readers are again favored with a short contribution or sermonette from the pen of Brother E. M. Cobb of California. These sermonettes by Brother Cobb are always appreciated and we trust we may receive frequent installments of them.

Around the Editor's Table

When Kings Pray

One of the great differences between the kings of Israel that were blessed as rulers and that brought blessings to their people was the difference in their religious lives and in their faithfulness to God.

The kings that walked in the ways of their father, David brought blessings to their people while those who walked in the ways of the kings of the heathen countries around them brought nothing but distress and calamity.

A praying king is supposed to be an honor to the country over which he rules, but too often kings, like common folks, only pray when they realize they have reached their extremity and know there is nothing more they can do.

The German Kaiser has always been known as a religious man, but it should be remembered there is a religion that is of the devil as well as of God. One of the magazines that comes to our desk has the following to say about the Kaiser at Prayer :

The Kaiser's gratitude to God may be understood forcefully if after one of his periodical allusions to the divine countenance one studies the particular activities of the German arms. A recent dispatch pictures him at prayer in the Cologne Cathedral on March 15, before the great drive on the Western front. It was not a moving picture that informed the outside world, but what was probably the next best thing available—a sycophantic newspaper reporter who sent his dispatch to the Amsterdam Tyd. As the New York Tribune reproduces the episode, it occurred in this wise:

"There were only a few persons in the building. Under high arches and in spacious solitude the Kaiser sat, as if in deep thought before the priests' choir. Behind him his military staff stood respectfully at a distance. | Still musing as he rose, the monarch, resting with both hands on his walking stick, remained standing immovable for some minutes. Then he turned and without exchanging a word with his suite, left the cathedral at their head. I shall never forget this picture of the musing monarch praying in Cologne Cathedral on the eve of the great battle."

Challenging God

As the Kaiser has familiarly bantered the Almighty in many of his previous addresses, Lord Dunsany in commenting in the Tribune on this episode, finds it natural, though not otherwise impressive, that the Kaiser did not kneel when he prayed. But more pertinent, as showing the Kaiser's works that accompany his prayers, are some of the comments given out by Mr. Henry P. Davison, chairman of the War Council of the Red Cross, on his recent return from Europe:

"The outstanding feature of German method at the present time is the effort to terrorize the women, children, and old men at home. While the German troops are making their drive on the front, airplanes are bombing nearly every night towns behind the lines, with the deliberate and declared purpose of terrorizing civilians.

"The purpose of the fight behind the line is to break down the morale of the civilian population to such a point that they will importune their governments for peace. It is the most dastardly, unrighteous, cruel, and devilish plan which could be conceived. It is based upon the theory that the killing of four children out of five will induce the mother to implore her Government to have the war stopped that her fifth child may live.

"It is carried on from the English Channel to the Swiss border and from the Swiss border to the Adriatic and has resulted in the murder and maiming of thousands of women and children and the driving of hundreds of thousands of terror-stricken from their homes to wherever they might seek refuge.

"I was in Paris many of the days on which the long-range gun was bombarding the city. That gun does comparatively little direct damage, and is wholly intended to get on the nerves of the people at home.

"All of this is accompanied by the most active possible propaganda, especially in Italy, designed to deceive the people and to strike down their morale. As a prominent Italian officer said to me, 'The diapason of the home is the diapason of the Army at the front.' The civilians at home must stand firmly behind the Army.

"One of the great missions of the Red Cross, therefore, has been to attempt to uphold the morale of the people at home. We have workers all over Italy and France carrying a message of comfort and cheer, helping especially to care for the refugees driven away from their homes, to care for the children and to provide for the sick and needy, particularly among the families of soldiers.

"In France we are carrying on direct work in 121 cities and towns, fifty-eight out of the total eighty-two departments, or counties, of the Republic being covered by American Red Cross activities. In Italy we conduct direct activities in forty-five cities and towns and we extend relief in 218 other places. Among Belgian refugees in France our work is on a similar scale. . .

"The gratitude the people feel for what the American people are doing through the Red Cross is beyond description. When we were in Bologna, Italy, the schools of the city were dismissed, and, as we walked out of the railway station, the scholars threw flowers on the ground that we might walk on them. Everywhere we went the American flag and the fact that we were Americans brought forth cheers that were far from perfunctory.

"The way these people of our Allies hold out their hands and look to America as the land of hope and promise, and as the great fact that makes certain that German might shall not prevail, is most stirring. 'America' is today a rainbow toward which Western Europe, from the north of Scotland to the south of Italy, looks as the sign of comfort, hope and victory."

The Graven Image

The God which the Kaiser does not kneel to has a vivid representation in the "Token" worn by every German soldier which Rev. Dr. Newell Dwight Hillis calls in the New York Evening Sun, "the most damnable thing that was ever suggested by the devil in two thousand years." Never, he asserts, "did an object so small send forth cruelties so large and manifold." We read:

"The little disk is stamped out on thick paper for German privates and upon aluminum for the officers. At the top of this cardboard is the portrait of that awful being called by the Kaiser 'our good old German God.'

"Look at his white hair, the long beard, and the great sword in the right hand, with the suggestion that since God uses the sword the German soldier must cut men to pieces also.

"Beneath you see flames gushing up, suggesting to the German soldier that he is quite right in burning the houses of France and Belgium after he has looted them, and for flinging the dead bodies into the blazing rafters. Now read the words written beneath the face of the being the Germans call God.

"'Strike them all dead. The day of judgment shall ask you no questions.'

"Strike dead old men and women! Dash the children's brains out against the stone wall! Violate young girls! Mutilate their fair bodies so that they will be unseemly when they are found by the husband or father. Burn, steal, kill—but remember that your Kaiser and the War Staff have promised to stand between you and God Almighty and the day of judgment! Even if Jesus did say, 'Woe unto them that offend against my little ones,' you must remember that your Kaiser and officers have promised you immunity on the day of judgment.

"That is what is meant by the sentence on page 31 in the German handbook of 'War on Land:' 'That which is permissible to the German soldier is anything whatsoever that will help him gain his goal quickly.'

"Nothing better illustrates the total collapse of manhood in the Germans than this soldier's token.

"A coward by nature, the German is afraid to kill and steal, and so he invented a screen behind which he could hide and named it 'the soldier's token.'

The World Kingdom

"That at the name of Jesus every knee should bow." —PHIL. 2:10.

Judaism and Liberty

The old notions about the exclusiveness of the Jew and his power to withstand all the forces of assimilative influences, do not now hold good. Mr| Israel Zangwill made a remarkable statement:

"If the Jews were left to themselves—if the Christians granted to them freedom—they (the Jews) would, in the course of a few generations, merge into Christianity. But for this, Christianity is not Christian enough."

But here is something more remarkable. The well-known Jewish philanthropist, Mr. Jacob H. Schiff, was one of those "Americans of the Jewish persuasion" who opposed Zionism because of its national aspirations. Not long ago, while delivering an address before the League of Jewish Youth, at New York, he claimed to be converted to Zionism. Dr. David Philipson, of Cincinnati, one of the great Reformed Jewish leaders, after reading reports of that address, wrote to Mr. Schiff in great alarm, expressing dissension from the idea that Judaism would disintegrate in a free country. He says:

"If England should conquer Palestine, it is a wild dream to imagine the Christian nations of the world will permit the establishment of an independent Jewish State in Palestine and give to the Jews the most sacred Christian places associated with the life of Jesus of Nazareth. Palestine at most will be free and open to Jews and all others who desire to settle there under a joint protectorate of Allied Powers, but an autonomous Jewish Government is most unlikely. The modern spirit will transform life in Palestine also, and the Jews and Judaism there will be subject to influences similar to those at work in other free lands. If Judaism cannot survive in a free Russia, it will not be able to survive in a free Palestine."

Mr. Schiff replied that the history of Judaism in the midst of political and religious freedom showed a steady decline in Jewish customs and religion. He continued:

"Feeling in this respect as I do, and having come to the conclusion that a remedy for existing conditions may possibly be found in the repopulation of Palestine by the Jewish people, I continue at the same time of the opinion that no effort should be made to re-establish a Jewish nation, because I believe were this done, the very purpose which is in my mind would become destroyed. I believe that from 50 per cent to 75 per cent of the so-called Jewish Nationalists are either atheists or agnostics, and that the great majority of Jewish Nationalist leaders have absolutely no interest in the Jewish religion. Conditions in this respect are already—before a Jewish nation has actually been established, as is the desire of the Jewish Nationalists—the same as those which existed when the Jewish State was an actuality and when priest and prophet were ever in disagreement and feud with kingdom and State, and which led in the end to the State's destruction. This would surely happen again were a Jewish State again established."

Israel's Spiritual Condition

Here are proofs of the confusion, the sad and hopelessly chaotic outlook, even of the Jewish leaders. The conviction grows that the war has brought before the Christian church a very great missionary problem and a supreme opportunity for Jewish missionary work. Even before the war Jewish literature contained many frank and startling admissions about the inroads being made by Christianity into Judaism. We are told that the synagogue has lost its power, that the fate of Jewish orthodoxy is sealed, that the de-Judaizing tendency has gone too far to be stopped.

The war is intensifying all that, and the Jewish press of the day gives evidence of a growing conviction that Jewish destiny is in the balance; it shows that official Judaism and Jewish leaders are conscious of what is at stake and alive to the disintegrating forces let loose by the war on the Jewish world. To quote a Jewish writer: "Jewish education, culture, mental energy and spiritual expanding, and all that goes to comprise Judaism—these have been battered well nigh to death by the war, and in that has the war hit us Jews above all peoples terribly."

Sir Francis Montefiore, who has been president of the English Zionists since the inception of the movement, remarks that Julaism is a mere question of sect and the present political crisis is more important than Judaism. He confesses that while he was president of the Zionist Association he did not know what it really was.

The Outlook

The world has not yet learned any great lesson out of this groaning agony and flood of blood; and suffering and bleeding Israel has not changed. The "Rock of Ages" is still to them a stone of stumbling and a rock of offence. The stubborn, persistent cry still is: "We will not have this Man to reign over us."

But there are unmistakable signs of momentous importance and imminent changes. There is a growing tenderness, sympathetic interest and kindly feeling towards the Jewish people throughout Christendom. The Spirit of God has touched the hearts of his children. In many cases prayer circles have been established and at least three new missions have been organized: one in Londo, England; one at Seattle and one in Brooklyn. The British societies are making great efforts toward preparing themselves for extensive work amongst the Jews as soon as the war closes. A volume of prayer is now ascending to God on behalf of Israel, the result of which can hardly be overestimated.

The Jewish people as a whole seem to have given up their usual lightheartedness—the so-called Ghetto humor—and have become a little more serious when speaking of the things of God. The wild cry that filled the Jewish press at the beginning of the war, proving "the failure of Christianity," because Christians nations are warring, has entirely ceased; and instead, the failure of man is now being admitted by them. The open reviling and slandering of the name of Jesus is disappearig, and is entirely gone among the more enlightened. The spirit of honest inquiry and seeking after the truth has not only increased a hundredfold, but it is nothing short of a phenomenon. There has never been a greater demand for the Bible than at the present time. The awakening of the Hebrew Christians to the momentousness of the times and to Israel's great needs, their longings and efforts to be united in a definite testimony, are indeed epoch-making.—Missionary Review.

News From the Field

To the Sunday Schools of Ohio

I bring you a message of vital importance. Our Four-Year Program calls for 75 per cent of Sunday schools reaching the Standard of Excellence by 1920. According to last year's reports received at headquarters there are only 7 front line schools in Ohio. This means that about 65 per cent have not yet attained front line standard. About eight schools did not report at all. Pastors and Superintendents, we must awake to our responsibilities and duties. We must stand shoulder to shoulder to the task set before us. This fair state which is called "mother of our Presidents," should also be "mother" of our Sunday schools, as front liners. Our motto should be "Always ahead, and never overtaken." There are only two states ahead of us now. Let's show our colors and "go over the top." Let's reach the goal set by the National Organization, and hold our position firm. May we seek to become more like unto the ideal Sunday school.

I have mailed to each school in the state a "Standard of Excellence" adopted by the last National Conference which you may use as a guide, and if you have not yet attained any, or all of the points (13 in all) will you not take it up with your school immediately, so that you may be listed as one of the front line, or standard schools. Ohio cannot afford to be any less than the Best. We dare not fail to reach the goal set. We MUST have 15 more schools reaching the standard by 1920. Who'll be the first to step into the ranks of "Front Liners?" Here they come! That's fine. Now who will be the next please? Yes! all right you will be listed next. Great! We're going to reach the goal, and then some. Keep coming. May we hear from more of you?

Travel Notes

From Sunnyside we went to Spokane, where the next great battle was fought in his name. Spokane, Washington, is a great city now, with one hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants and still growing. Around the great valley the mountains rearing their snow crowned heads through the clouds which can be seen for many miles. The rolling hills piled here and there filled with wealth. The verdant valley many miles long. The highty winding river rolling, dancing and tossing through the heart of the city is a most grand sight. The valley and hills are noted for fruit of the very best kind. The atmosphere is fine when it is not raining, the rains are usualy cold but useful indeed.

We have a band of praying men and women in Spokane, men and women of faith in God, they have entered the school of prayer and find it blessed to be shut in with him. Cottage prayer meetings were held before the campaign and the same praying ones entered a little room in the church each evening before preaching and prayers were sent up to the throne of God in the behalf of lost souls and that he might bless his own word to call the backslider home into the fold, and to build up those in the faith and make them stronger which he did. He has promised to hear and answer prayer. He is more willing to hear and answer prayer than his children are to take the time to pray.

We have a people and a work at Spokane with the Brotherhood can be proud of, as good, clean, substantial class of people as you will find anywhere, among them a bunch of young people hard to excel; they are true to the church and are not ashamed to tell the world that they have found Jesus as a Savior from sin. The pastor, evangelist and people all fired on the enemy God's big gun of faith, hope and love which broke his ranks and many of his soldiers became soldiers of the cross of our blessed Lord, all glory be to him. In one place with one accord means power with God and man.

Brother Paul Miller, the pastor, is but a young man and preacher, but he has learned many of the enemy's cunning tricks and God is using him in a very marked way in preaching his everlasting word. He has the full confidence of his people and I am certain that God will continue to bless him, his good wife and faithful workers.

The Church Building

We preached in the basement, but God was with us as well as he was in the upper room. He poured down his good Spirit upon us and we praised his name together. The basement of the church is paid for and brick enough piled all around it to put the walls up, the brick are also paid for, but wisdom seems to say to the Brethren complete the building as the money comes in so that no heavy debt will be hanging over the church, and too it is hard to borrow money in Spokane at this time. What a great pity to have to hold up the work of the Lord; the building is so much needed to take care of the splendid Sunday school and to make the place more inviting to the public.

Let me say to those of you who have put money in the Spokane work, you have made no mistake. You have made a very wise investment. I know of no mission point in the Brotherhood that has in the same length of time made such progress and it will be permanent. The class of people in the church warrant it. During our meeting some fine people, heads of homes, came into the church, people who will be a help in every way.

Were it not for our College campaign and I were in a proper position I would be tempted to canvass some of our good people who are blessed with money and ask them to help make it possible to finish the church edifice at Spokane. People in the Brotherhood don't be afraid to support the work at Spokane. It is a field for our church. To be sure, I believe our other mission points are worthy and those at the head are working hard and God is blessing them (but Spokane is a field for the Brethren church.) We already have some Eastern Brethren in Spokane and others will be moving that way.

Sister Viana Detwiler deserves much credit for the sacrifice which she made in responding to a Macedonian call coming from a half dozen home-sick Brethren for a whole gospel. She was true to the call and vision and the Spokane work is a monument of beauty to obedience. Sister you will get your reward in the glory world.

We had our home with Brother and Sister B. C. Gochmour. It was a real home and we had the joy of many blessings together, however we visited among the Brethren and shared of their kind hospitality; for these things we are very grateful indeed. Brother Gochnour moved to Spokane from Warsaw, Indiana about sixteen years ago. They say the West is the place for them. Sister Melinger and others from the East say the same thing.

May God's blessings continue to fall on people and pastor in the work of God at Spokane.

We are now in a fight at Whittier, California with Brother Kimmel and people. Pray for us. From here we go to Compton church in Los Angeles to be with Brother Beal in another fight. I am sure we will have a good time together. We are looking for Victory at both of these places in his name. You will not likely see any more travel notes until we finish our work on the coast. May God bless his children everywhere.

N. W. JENNINGS.

P. S.—Just before leaving Spokane the writer received a letter from Brother Darling, pastor of the Turlock church, inviting him to come by and assist in the Communion service. This we found possible. It was a feast in two ways, to be with those with whom we worked in a campaign, two years ago, and to be in the presence of the Lord at the tables and with his children.

I like to think of that day when we shall come from the East and the West, the North and the South and sit down in the Father's Kingdom at his table. We enjoyed the short stay immensely with Brother Darling and his people. N. W. J.

Dedication Services at College Corner

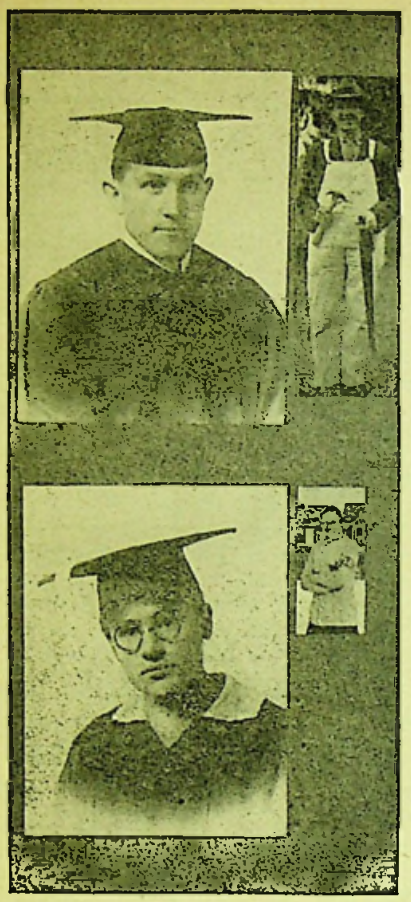
The Brethren at College Corner church, near Wabash, Indiana, will dedicate their new church on Sunday, July 7, 1918. The dedicatory services will be conducted by Dr. Chas. A. Bame of Onekama, Michigan. There will be a special program for the entire day at 10:30, 2:30, 7:30.

A cordial invitation to be present at these services is extended to all Brethren who can come.

D. A. C. TEETER, Pastor.

Report from Spokane

Well, we have had another season of blessing from the Lord. After about five weeks of preparation and prayer, we opened our revival with Brother Jennings as our leader. And an able leader he is. The meeting began with good interest and good interest continued until the last night when the church was filled to capacity. The battle was hard and Satan was on the job as usual, but the battle was God's, not ours, that's why we have a victory to tell you of.



The crowds during the week were good, and on Sundays we were crowded to the doors. But still, with good interest, good attendance and all, results were slow in coming. They came in ones, twos and threes.

But finally on the closing Sunday night, the Lord fell upon the people in great power, and we had a great blessing. Husbands and wives and others, kept going forward till they stretched across the entire room. Altogether, there were forty-one who went forward during the meeting. It was a great victory, for we keep the field pretty well gleaned, by holding an evangelistic service every Sunday night. If we did not do this in the city here, many would drift away from us, whom we could not reach when the revival did come.

Of this number, there were six reconsecrations of some who had grown careless in their Christian life, etc. Most of the rest have been baptized and we expect to baptize the remaining ones next Sunday.

During the meeting, Brother Jennings and myself spent most of our days in calling from house to house. Satan had set his claws into the hearts of one man and wife, till the word of God seemed to have no power to draw them. We called on them several times with apparently no results. But on the last night, our hearts leaped with joy to see them both take their stand for Jesus. We baptize them next Sunday. Working together with Brother Jennings, both in the pulpit and in the homes was a great joy to me. He has been a blessing to all and has done a lasting good.

Our Sunday school is still growing and went up to 142 last Sunday, which is the largest attendance we have had yet. Our little mission Sunday school has been the means of bringing in three souls already, from that part of town, and I am sure the future will show greater results from it. We are holding preaching services there every Sunday afternoon after the Sunday school hour and good interest is manifested. Pray for this isolated band of workers that God may manifest himself to us in a greater way.

2404 Wall St.

North Manchester, Indiana

It has been some time since the work at this place has been reported. Our correspondent, Mrs. John Goehler has sickness in her family, and being unable to report the work, has asked me to do so.

Rev. Charles A. Bame closed his pastorate here, the last Sunday in April and left for Michigan to spend the summer on his berry farm. Rev. Bame is an excellent pastor, and the church was built up and strengthened while they were with us. We pray that God will richly bless Brother Bame and his family.

We were fortunate in securing the services of C. E. Kolb of Warsaw. He and his family have moved in our midst, and the work is progressing nicely under his leadership. May God bless both pastor and people as we work together for the advancement of his Kingdom.

Friday evening, May 10 a reception was held at the church for the new pastor and family. Over 100 were present, and the evening was enjoyably spent in music and short talks. Light refreshments were served. The church was prettily decorated with flowers and flags.

The auxiliaries of the church are all in working order, but the warm days remind us that we must keep going or we may be the victims of the notable summer slump.

Sunday, May 9 we celebrated Missionary and Children's day with a special program in the morning. We had a good attendance and the missionary offerings through the Sunday school classes was almost $145.00 which will more than pay our state apportionment.

The meetings of the S. S. C. E. are well attended. At their last meeting they decided to present the church with a service flag. We have quite a few boys in the service and others will be called soon. Our S. M. M. are also active. In addition to our regular meetings we meet twice a month to do Red Cross work. Our meetings generally follow a picnic supper at the church or at the home of one of the girls. Mrs. C. E. Kolb our patroness is giving us the story of the African Trail .

Our C. E. services are not as well attended as they should be. We hope to build up our society in the near future. Just now we are planning a parcel post bazaar for the benefit of the society.

Our earnest prayer is that God's people everywhere will be faithful and steadfast throughout these trying times and that God will abundantly bless us.

GRACE M. EBBINGHAUS.

First Brethren Church
Los Angeles, California

The members of this congregation have all been made glad by the return to us of the pastor, Elder Francis J. Reagan, who has been absent for five months finishing a seminary course at the Xenia Theological school at Xenia, Ohio.

Brother Sylvester Lowman, our supply pastor, had to leave us to begin his work at Fillmore, California, under the auspices of the District Mission Board, at the end of April. During the month of May the work was carried on largely by volunteers of our own congregation. Two of the services on Sunday evenings were taken care of by the young people of the church. We had a Parents' Day program on the second Sunday at the morning preaching hour, a splendid program which all present enjoyed. Our young brother, Harry Toler, brought the message on two Sunday mornings, and he spoke with such warmth and evident sincerity that we all were edified and encouraged.

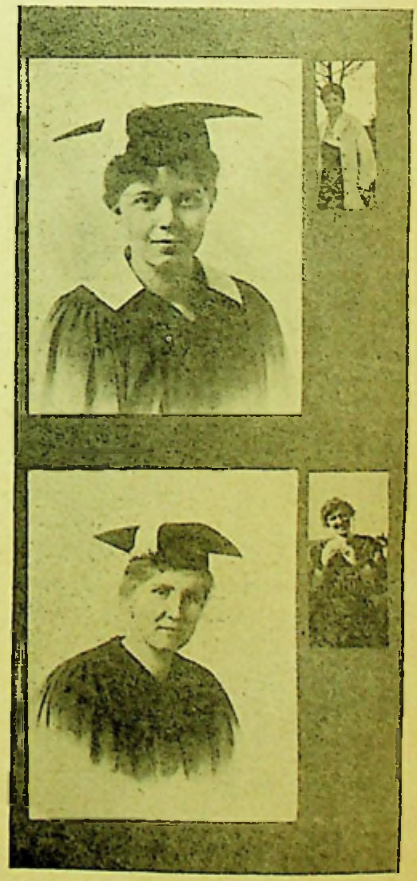
Last Sunday morning, June 2nd, Brother Reagan broke the Bread of Life to us both morning and evening. He spoke with earnestness and gave us the things he had thought out and fully considered in his own heart, things that he had reasoned out to a definite conclusion so that he was able to speak with definiteness. His sermon Sunday evening was a patriotic address using the familiar words from the prophet Isaiah, "Watchman, what of the night!" as a text.

A reception was held for the pastor and his family on Tuesday evening, June 4th, at the church. A good program of music and addresses was given to an appreciative audience of Brethren and friends, and after that refreshments were served in the basment.

There is much work to do and the difficulties are great.

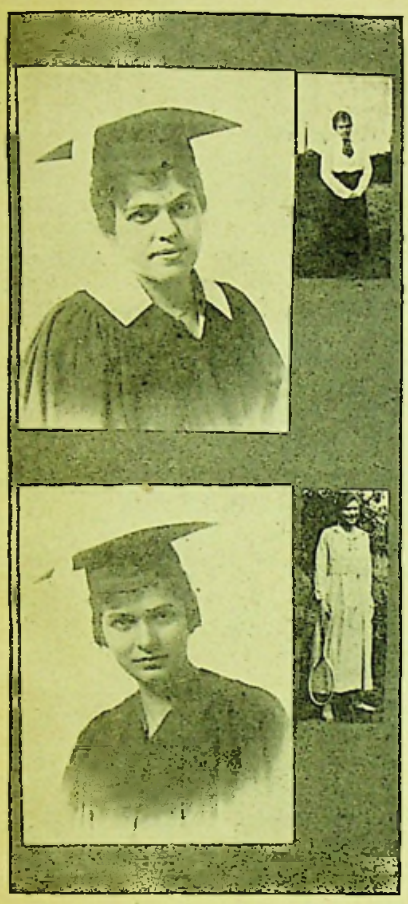
Yours in the Master's name,

A. P. REED.



4910 Wadsworth St.

Clay City



We are slowly but surely moving forward at Clay City, in spite of very obstinate difficulties. Recently we had the pleasure of baptizing five persons who had confessed Christ in a union meeting which was conducted some time ago, besides one young married woman who had confessed Christ some time previously. Those coming from the union meeting were boys and girls between eight and twelve years of age representing three entirely new homes for the Brethren faith.

Our Easter offering put us well "over the top," for which we were very grateful.

It has been reported before that a parsonage has been secured by this congregation, but I feel that the brotherhood is entitled to know some of the details in this connection. A parsonage here was not a luxury but an absolute necessity. Because of the "coal boom" every house and shack in the community have been occupied for months. Many renters were compelled to buy property in order to have a place to live. We were no exception. We moved twice within two and a half months because the properties in which we were living were sold. And Ruth Tooter, Dayton, Ohio.

Josie Wogaman, Brookville, Ohio

Marie Snyder, Canton, Ohio
Lucile Teeter, Ashland, Ohio

the latter of these was sold at a time when there was not a house available. So the good brethren, realizing that something had to be done, and, finding the modest little four-room house in which we now live could be bought at a great bargain, simply got together and pledged so much each towards the price and bought it. But, let me say right here that these pledges were not paid out of the ready cash on hand. Most of these folks borrowed the money to meet their pledge. And it meant sacrifice and self-denial, but what else was to be done? So please, my brethren do not get the idea that we are living from our abundance while receiving the splendid aid of the Mission Boards. The folks here are not rich, quite the opposite. But a very large proportion of them are TITHERS, and some of them are giving a great deal more than the tithe, and THAT IS THE SECRET of how they do these things.

One of our great problems is the transcient. So many people are so constantly changing about, moving from one place to another. We have gained many new scholars to the Sunday school, and attendants at church, but about the time they become interested, they move elsewhere. Another problem here is a dead Christianity. There are not many people in Clay City, but pretend to be members of the church, but are as dead as can be, spiritually.

The church and all the auxiliaries are stressing the Four-Year Program and doing our best to reach the goals set. We very earnestly covet the prayers of all God's people.

GEO W. KINZIE.

Warsaw, Indiana

News has such a wonderful way of filtering through the church from one congregation to another, that I suppose before now it is generally known who is located at this place. The church board through communication with the writer while living in Sidney engaged him to fill the pulpit and act as pastor during the summer or until the beginning of the pastoral year. Therefore, such service began May first and we moved to Warsaw to be on the field. It was our intention to continue in Evangelistic work as last year and such is our plan for the future as a rule, but upon the earnest and repeated solicitation of the board and individuals of the church and a unanimous vote of the business meeting we have consented to take the work for a year from October first.

An intelligent survey of the activity of the church is impossible in this note because of our newness to the field, however, all departments are outlining some forward work. Children's exercises are under way for Sunday the 17th, promising well.

A new departure in the summer program at Winona Lake featuring a two weeks' union Evangelistic campaign is of special interest. From June 30 to July 14th, inclusive the churches of Warsaw, Winona and Kosciusko county in general will unite in an effort to revive religious interest. The services will be held in the Park Auditorium, under the leadership of several noted evangelists. Just who, is not fully decided but Mel Trotter will open the campaign with three days and if possible the "immortal" Billy Sunday closing the last three days. E. O. Excell will direct the music with the exception of the last three days when the Sunday party will have full charge if they come.

Brehtren, put Warsaw and its pastor in your prayer list for problems are ahead and "this kind cometh out only by prayer."

A. T. RONK.

Fillmore, California

With heart bubbling over, I want to write you a few lines about our new church, or rather as it soon will be. We just closed a four weeks' meeting here.

On the first of May we moved our tent here. This tent belongs to the Southern California Mission Board, and is used entirely for religious meetings. They will not rent or use it for any other purpose. On the 5th of May by previous arrangements we had, L. S. Bauman with us as the evangelist and the singing evangelist B. P. Stout to lead the song services. The meeting started off very well, but it was not long until the devil got very busy, as he usually does, but this time it seems he brought to bear all his big guns on us, even wheeling his 17 inch gun into position and turned it loose on us, through the other churches of the town,and they used shrapnel on us; called us pro-German, pacifists, proselyters, and all kinds of mean things. We kept sweet and went right on; but it almost took all our crowds, for at the end of three weeks we hardly had a corporal's guard. But thanks to God, and the incessant prayers of all our Southern California churches, in the fourth week our crowds began to improve. Oh, we had a little company that stayed through with us, and from this we began to gather the sheaves. On Sunday night there were 6 came forward, then there were some very night the rest of the week and on the last Sunday night there was a great victory when 10 came forward, making 30 in all, to start our new church with. And the sentiment is good for us in the town. Brother Bauman brought the word in his old characteristic way. It fell with mighty force on sinner and saint. Several of these people came to us from other churches that had no church home in the town. We only had two members in the town when we pitched the tent. On the last we had set apart to raise the money to buy two lots right down in town as we feel we ought to be in the center of things. When the day's work had closed we had $1,746.41 pledged and in cash. We are giving $1,700.00 for the lots. These will be paid for next week and then we intend to proceed with a church building. The Southern California Mission Board is behind this move, and right here I want to praise this board for their splendid help, and for their vision of the Lord's business. It has never been my privilege to work with any board or set of church men that went at things in a more determined and Christian way of doing things. Say, you eastern folks could well afford to imitate a little, for I tell you right now, if all our churches would get under things as this board has been doing we could soon reach our Four-Year Program for new churches. Where is 1920 going to find us in this goal? Well, you cannot point the finger of scorn at California and say we have not done our part. Pray for us in this new field.

Marie Lichty, Falls City, Nebraska
Mary Bricker, Rossville, Indiana

S. LOWMAN.

Williamstown, Ohio

Owing to the rush of work at the College, I have delayed in reporting our recent meeting here. We have long looked forward to, and prayed for this meeting, and on April 14th Brother Coleman, with his singer, W. E. Kemp, began the campaign. Well do I remember being in Brother Coleman's first meeting in Missouri over two years ago, where we had a glorious time together; but on this occasion we were especially blessed because Dr. Miller of the College granted me leave from school work to be at my church during most of these three weeks. Brother Coleman has improved in his speaking ability and power in the last two years; and his singer did his part well. The choir did some of the best singing they ever did during these meetings. The interest increased from the beginning and attendance developed into a crowded house. The good to the church as a whole cannot be told in words. Cold hearts were made warm through the power of the preached Word of God. The speaker would at times seem to cause the audience to be bathed in tears, and then through his wit and humor bring out a smile on the faces of all.

Brother Coleman is not a sensational preacher, but through his earnestness and hard efforts he makes his appeal for right living that cannot be denied. At the close of the meeting we had nine who had come forward to express their faith in God, and Jesus as their personal Savior.

All these we shall keep for the church, except one, who went to the M. E. church.

The co-operation of the Gretna church was had in a few of these meetings when a delegation came over for the services.

These pople gave Brother Coleman the largest offering that they ever gave to any minister; and Brother Coleman says it was the largest for the size of the church membership he had ever received.

The church will long remember the work of these Brethren among them.

Gretna, Ohio

Through previous arrangements this church planned to have the help of Brother Coleman in revival work, along with Williamstown. So on May 6th,—just after the close of the Williamstown meetings, Coleman with his singer began a three weeks' campaign at this beautiful country church. This is one of the Ohio churches that does things.

Here again Brother Coleman and his singer put forth their "best licks" against Satan and his forces. The crowds were good all through, considering the time of year that the farmers were planting corn and other crops.

This is the first time these men ever worked among the people of the east but hearts soon touched hearts, and the union of feeling and devotion soon was manifested among both, and interest developed to a high degree.

Some of Coleman's sermons were indeed a surprise to these folks. They seemed to set them on fire to read the Word of God more; and his first new sermon on "The Second Coming" was well taken by all. Brother Coleman is a good sermonizer in many ways, considering his short time in the ministry.

On the second Sunday of the meetings the Williamstown choir came down in a body, 22 in all, besides 10 others, who were present at the morning service, and left in the afternoon, in their Fords and Saxons over the pikes 42 miles. The singing on this night was especially grand. Brother Kemp said he felt like the young man, who "jist hadn't a thing against anybody in the world." We were not permitted to be with these brethren very much on account of the press of school work, but all in all the meetings were great. Here six made the confession of Christ, and four have been received into the church. Two yet remain to be baptized. One woman who is 64 years old made the confession for the first time.

The offerings here for the Evangelist almost reached the figures of Williamstown. More to report later.

Minutes, in a Condensed Form, of the Md. and Va. District Conference

The Thirty-first annual conference of the Brethren churches of the Maryland and Virginia District opened on Wednesday afternoon, May 29th at Penn Laird, Virginia, Mt. Olive, church by singing "Onward Christian Soldiers," which was led by R. I. Garber.

Vice-Moderator L. G. Wood presided and Brother E. B. Shaver conducted the devotions of the hour, reading from the 15th chapter of the Acts of the Apostles, followed by the congregation singing, "All Hail the Power of Jesus Name."

A committee on Credentials was appointed consisting of,—L. G. Wood, W. E. Ronk, and Dr. D. L. Shaver.

A very sincere and enthusiastic welcome address came from Brother W. S. Crick, pastor of the Mt. Olive congregation, whose hospitality we enjoyed. He said: "They had just closed a successful series of meetings and with the same good spirit we were welcomed. He suggested also that we bring to the new converts some inspiration and strength that they may see the Will of God done in our lives. In closing he called attention to the Conference Motto, "Ask God —Listen—Act," as three great steps to progress in Christian life; also to the Conference slogan: "Inspiration, Information and Consecration."

The response by delegates was first engaged in by Dr. J. M. Tombaugh, who told what a conference means to him and what each delegate should contribute toward it.

Brother L. G. Wood was the second to respond. He suggested that this Conference be made a revival. Others who responded with splendid thought and sentiment were Brethren S. P. Fogle, W. H. Spiggle, J. W. Leedy, P. W. Wiseman, P. J. Jennings, E. B. Shaver, A. B. Cover, R. I. Garber, and Sister P. J. Jennings. The Conference then sang "Wonderful Words of Life."

The first report of the Committee on Credentials was 43 lay delegates and 14 ministerial, a total for first session of 57. The report was accepted and committee continued its work.

Organization of the Conference

By separate ballot the following officers were elected:

Dr. J. M. Tombaugh, re-elected Moderator.
L. G. Wood re-elected Vice-Moderator.
E. M. Riddle, re-elected Secretary.
W. E. Ronk, elected Assistant Secretary.
Luther Good, elected Treasurer
W. E. Ronk, re-elected Statistician.

At intervals during the election the Conference enjoyed many other responses.

By vote of the Conference it was decided that delegates pay twenty-five cents for meals instead of fifteen cents as before. The closing song of the first session was "More About Jesus" and benediction by Brother J. M. Tombaugh.

The Second Session opened by singing "America," after which Brother J. F. Watson of Pennsylvania, conducted the devotions by reading selected portions from Eph. 4th and 5th and invoking God's blessing and power upon the Conference.

At this point the Mt. Olive choir rendered a beautiful selection. The regular program of the evening began by Dr. V. M. Richard addressing the Conference on the subject, "What part should the Christian church play in this war?" He said in part, "The church is responsible for this war. The church if it stands for anything it is equality. The Christian church has forgotten many of the principles of her Founder. In our greed for worldly gain we have forgotten our stewardship. When we denied dollars, sons and daughters to missions, now we give them to this war. The church should be penitent and return to God, then it can face the strife with hope." In closing he made a strong appeal to remember our President Wilson and his counsellors, our boys, fathers and mothers.

The conference was then favored with an anthem by the Mt. Olive choir.

The "Scriptural Doctrine of the Atonement" was the theme of Dr. J. M. Tombaugh. He said, "The Atonement is the very heart and marrow of the Christian religion. The death of Jesus of Nazareth is the supreme fact of the New Testament. A bloodless Gospel does not draw. The apostles believed this doctrine and solemnly announced that it was the Divine Plan for the saving of sinners. No hope, no message, can be apart from the Atonement of Jesus Christ. It is the substitute for us instead of our individual punishment for sin. It is a glorious and precious doctrine.

A personal invitation was given to accept the Master, and after singing "Somebody Must," Brother Wm. H. Beachler closed the session with prayer.

The third session of the conference opened Thursday morning. Brother L. G. Wood requested the conference to sing, "My Faith Looks Up to Thee," after which he read Rom. 12: 1-3 followed by an uplifting season of short prayers.

The district Director of the Four-Year Program, Brother W. E. Ronk spoke of the attitude of the churches toward it. He showed it to be an effective method of doing church work. He reported that some good work had been done, but much more was needed.

The subject of "Spiritual Advancement" was discussed by Brother G. A. Copp who spoke of each church with respect to this Goal. Brother G. W. Chambers emphasized our narrow vision and slowness in doing God's service. Brethren E. B. Shaver and William Lyon spoke briefly on the above subject.

Here Brother Beachler offered a treat in the form of a solo, accompanied by Professor Chas. McClure.

The subject of Church Extension was discussed by G. Harry Haun. He appealed to the laymen to help open new fields. Brother J. W. Leedy insisted that we are not using our means and consecration.

A second report from the Credential Committee showed 58 lay and 19 ministerial delegates, a total of 77.

The subject of "Financial Methods" was presented by the director of this Goal, Glenn Locke. He explained the Budget System of finance. His talk was confirmed by Brother J. F. Watson who gave a few practical suggestions out of his own experience.

The following resolution was presented to the Conference.

To the President of the United States, greeting:

"We the Maryland and Virginia District Conference of the Brethren churches hereby express to you our sincere approval of your call of the nation to fasting, humiliation and prayer as set forth in your recent proclamation. Believing implictly as we do that God rules the universe, and that all the affairs of men and Nations are in his hands we pledge ourselves to him and to you, that we will pray without ceasing, that in all things you and your counsellors will be led of him into the right on every great question of national or international policy; and that he will speedily bless our nation and the world with the Peace of Righteousness which shall be abiding."

In Conference assembled at Mt. Olive church, Harrisonburg, Va..

This 30th day of May, in the year of our Lord, 1918.

Moderator, J. M. Tombaugh.
Secretary, E. M. Riddle.
(Seal.)

The Resolution was adopted. The session closed with a song and Brother J. F. Watson pronounced the benediction.

Brother J. F. Watson, National Sunday School Secretary gave the exact place of the district with respect to other districts. He pointed out some things that showed excellent growth. He also stressed the "Standard of Excellence in Sunday School work."

After singing, "Work, for the Night is Coming," The Women's work of the church was emphasized. Mrs. G. C. Dowell and Mrs. L. U. Messler spoke of the Home Department. Dr. Mary A. Laughlin showed the value of Women's organized work in the church. Miss Mary Pence brought greetings and news from our work in Kentucky. Miss Edna Bovey gave a splendid recitation, "So Much to do at Home."

The fourth session of the conference opened with a song service. Brother A. B. Duncan then read from the second chapter of the Acts of the Apostles and followed with prayer.

Brother L. G. Wood took up the subject of "Bible School work in the district." He showed that the attaining of the goals was a worthy work and that Bible school is the church in its Christian activity. It is the hub of the wheel. From a chart he showed a living method of conducting a Bible school.

By motion the courtesies of the conference were extended to Brother Henry Early, Brother W. H. Beachler, Brother J. F. Watson and others.

Mrs. L. G. Wood showed to the conference what part the women should have in the Four Year Program. Lastly Mrs. A. B. Cover gave a report of the year's work in the district.

At this point invitations for the Conference for the year 1919 came from Linwood and Roanoke. The Conference ruled that the meeting place for 1919 should be at Linwood, Maryland.

The session closed by singing, "Praise God from Whom all Blessings Flow," and S. P. Fogle pronounced the benediction.

Prior to the fifth session of the Conference, an hour for devotional service was conducted by Brother W. M. Lyon, in accordance with the day which had been set as a day of humiliation and prayer by President Wilson.

The regular program was taken up by singing, "Pass Me Not, O Gentle Savior," after which Brother A. B. Cover read from John 15: and Brother Quinter Lyon led the audience in prayer. A part of the evening was given to C. E. work. The statistician's report gave seven societies and 282 members.

Brother J. F. Watson discussed the subject of "Life Work." His splendid message was summed up in four points,—

1 The church ought to be concerned.
2 The home ought to be concerned.
3 The individual ought to be concerned.
4 God is concerned.

Again Brother Beachler rendered a solo in keeping with the thoughts of the hour.

Brother C. R. Koontz spoke of " C. E. Giving, and Lost Creek, Kentucky as the objective." Another good recitation was given by Miss Vellie Begoon, a member of the Mt. Olive church.

At this time W. H. Beachler revealed the plans of his own work. He explained "Permanent Endowment," and said he surely would be in this district, perhaps in about a year. The messages and the presence of both Beachler and Watson added interest and inspiration to the conference. An offering received for traveling expenses amounted to $19.83.

The session closed with the benediction by Brother E. B. Shaver.

The last session of the conference opened Friday at 9 a. m., by singing "Help Somebody Today." Brother L. G. Wood conducted the devotions.

By action of the conference the traveling expenses of the Examining Board to Washington, D. C. were to be paid. The amount of the bill being $8.00. The expense of carrying on the work of the Four-Year Program in this district was also provided for.

The Secretary of the Mission Board read his report, which was adopted. It apepars here in brief form.—

The Missionary Board of Maryland and Virginia district met in session May 30th, 1918. The work was received and plans for the new year considered. The Board recommended to the conference that apportionment for this year be doubled. Appropriations were made to the specific amount of $151.00 Several new fields were proposed as "ripe for the harvest." Some reports were gratifying, others were not so stimulating, but God will bless all missionary effort put forth in this conference year.

G. Harry Haun, Pres. of Board.
A. B. Cover, Secretary of Board.

A committee was appointed to report on apportionments assigned to S. W. Virginia. "How to Reach Missions Goal No. 11" was ably treated by Brother A. B. Cover. He said, "Missions include—1, A Widening Horizon, 2, an unwithheld consecration of life and money. 3 Unending prayer. He also heavily stressed the Great Commission and our past as a church in the missoinary work.

E. M. Riddle laid the subject of Brethren Publications before the conference. Only two churches in the district have placed the Evangelist in every home. The speaker gave an argument for the paper in every home and also urged delegates to get their home folks interested in Goal No. 9.

Brother C. R. Koontz on Conference Promotion urged a continued interest in our District Conference and also insisted that more people from our district go to National Conference.

The last subject of the program was, "Things worth taking home." A great number of good things were singled out by the delegates. This discussion was made very interesting.

Business:

Brother G. Harry Haun was elected Secretary of the Sunday schools of this district.

The officers of the Mission Board were elected,—

G. Harry Haun, re-elected President.

A. B. Cover, elected Secretary.

Theo. W. Fahrney, Treasurer.

J. M. Tombaugh was re-elected as a member of the Examining Board.

Theo. W. Fahrney was re-elected on the Board of Property.

Brethren L. G. Wood and G. Harry Haun were elected as two members of the Executive Committee.

A final report of the Committee on Credentials showed 64 lay and 19 ministerial delegates, a total of 83 delegates.

Treasurer's report showed receipts amounting to $40.00. Expenses $21.14.

Balance of $18.86 to be deposited in the Ministerial Aid Fund.

After singing "Blest Be the Tie," The conference adjourned with prayer by the Secretary.

DR. J. M. TOMBAUGH, Moderator
E. M. RIDDLE, Secretary.

Our Dead

HANSEL—Strother Hansel was born in Virginia, November 19, 1844, and died at his home in Mallory township, Clayton county, Iowa, on May 6, 1918, aged 73 years, 1 months and 17 days. His parents emigrated to Iowa when he was 7 years of age, settling on the farm which ever after that was Mr. Hansel's home and from which he passed to glory. He was married to Miss Sophrona Wolf on July 4, 1866. His wife and 2 sons and 4 daughters remain to mourn and wait the summons to join the loved one. All are members of the church and are working for the coming of the Christ. Rev. Hansel was converted at the age of 30 years. At that time he began a careful reading and study of God's Word. Talking over his belief with a friend and saying that he wished he knew of a church which as closely followed the Bible as he believed in it, he was told of the Brethren church. Fuller information confirmed him in his choice and he drove through to Waterloo with his young family to be admitted into the church. Some of the older children will remember the drive and the incidents that happened. Coming home he began living and preaching a Christian life. He has preached in a multitude of places throughout the southern part of Clayton county. He has been faithful to his God in his home and his community. The monster attendance at his funeral service would show a slight indication of the respect and veneration in which he was held by his friends and neighbors. A conservative estimate would place the number present at the funeral at 600 or 700 people. He was carried to his last home by 6 of his grandsons. One of these was dressed in khaki and came from Detroit to be at his grandfather's burial.

Until age and failing health stopped him, Mr. Hansel had a regular circuit of preaching appointments but as age crept on he was compelled to drop some. Up until the last he continued the services and the maintaining of a Sunday school at his home appointment. Last winter he conducted funeral services at times when his family felt that he should not have exposed himself. When a neigbor's home burned this winter he immediately opened his own home and the family remained with him until the new house was built. The text used for the funeral service was 2 Tim. 4: 7, 8.

(Rev.) FRED RIGGS.
Pastor of Church United Brethren in Christ.

TOMS—Elizabeth Schrack Toms was born in Richland County, Ohio, February 6, 1833, and departed this life May 9, 1918. She was married to William Toms June 26, 1853. To this union were born five sons and three daughters, the husband, two sons and an infant daughter preceding her in death. She was a member of the Pleasant Valley Lutheran church for fifty years.

She is survived by two sisters and a host of friends to mourn their loss. Services by the undersigned. A. L. LYNN.

PRESTON—Mrs. Levi S. Preston died in Stockton, California May 4, 1918. Nine months ago she fell and broke her hip and since then her health declined rapidly. Her husband Levi S. Preston, died in Redwood City, California ten years ago. Sixty years ago they were married in Iowa, but were born in Pennsylvania. Before marriage she was Miss Viola Haswell, daughter of Nathan B. Haswell. In her early girlhood she joined the Baptist church, but in later years united with the Dunkard or Brethren church and was a devoted Christian woman, always taking great pride and interest in reading and studying her Bible. She was born September 26, 1833, therefore being 87 years and eight months of age.

About fifty years ago they moved from the East to California. Six children are left to mourn their loss: Mrs. Philip H. Burgess, Susie E. Daves and L. S. Preston, Jr., of Stockton, Cal., Mrs. Sidney Winsor, of Manteca, William H., of Oakland and Irvin S., of San Francisco, California.

Funeral services were held in Stockton, California, and remains were conveyed by auto to Brentwood cemetery where they were interred.

FOCHT—Cloe Ellen Focht, was born December 24, 1844, and died June 3, 1918, aged 73 years, five months and nine days.

She leaves to mourn their loss two sons, one sister, five grandchildren and a host of relatives and friends.

Aunt Ellen was a member of the Brethren church, for a number of years, and an active attendant until her death. She was a good woman, always living a life that was a credit to her community, to her church, and to her relatives and friends.

C. E. BEEKLY.

VULGAMOTT—Hannah (Heckman) Vulgamott was born near Rossville, Indiana, December 27th, 1857, and departed this life April 13th, 1918. In 1863 she came to Illinois with her parents. On May 7th, 1876 she was married to William A. Vulgamott, who survives her. Early in life she was united with the German Baptist Brethren church and in 1895 cast her lot with the Brethren church at Cerro Gordo; were she held er membership until her decease. "Going into a French village the Germans collect the women and children, order them to march in advance, shoot a few to terrorize the rest, and then, hiding behind this living screen, the Germans march forward. In this way they protect themselves.

"The whole history of the human race contains no chapter of atrocity like the atrocity of the Germans. The history of the world contains no story of cowardice so black and damnable as the cowardice of the Germans. Out of cowardice the soldier's token was born.

"And so the Kaiser and the War Staff invented this round piece of cardboard, with the representation of God as going forth with his sword to kill men and with his flames to burn them and with the motto, 'Strike them all dead, for the day of judgment will ask you no questions.'"

Grace to the Humble

Had the war-lord really knelt, Lord Dunsany goes on to imagine that he might have found pity, humility, or even contrition. We get a picture that has elements of imaginative repentance:

"For what was the war-lord seeking? Did he know that pity for his poor slaughtered people, huddled by him on to the ceaseless machine guns, might be found by seeking there? . . That but for that proud attitude and the respectful staff he might have seen what was lost and have come out bringing pity for his people. Might have said to the crowd that gave him the ovation, as we read, outside the door: 'My pride has driven you to this needless war; my ambition has made a sacrifice of millions, but it is over and shall be no more; I will make no more conquest.'

"They would have killed him. But for that renunciation, perhaps, however late, the curses of the widows of his people might have kept away from his grave."

But it is not so generally realized that hanging in the balance with democracy is the value of the individual soul, a religion of freedom and service, morality for the individual and the nation and ideals of world peace, while with autocracy stands a religion of war and conquest, religious conformance and formalism, the individual a tool for the state, and the theory that might makes right. Extravagance is cast into the scales for autocracy with all that goes with it. Against all this the church is in mortal combat. There can be no compromise. It is a religious as well as a political crisis. And he who does not recognize that luxury and extravagance are enemies of the church as well as the state has little conception of its life and mission.

Saved By a Look

The prophets or preachers of old had messages for the nations as well as for individuals, and they understood that there was as great need for national salvation as there was for salvation for the individual. Isaiah was no mean prophet and his vision was not shortened. With the broad outlook on life that God gave him he was able to see the trend of the times and to point out the shortcomings of both nation and individual with a degree of certainty that must have amazed the kings and rulers of his day.

It is a small preacher that has a message only for the individual and that fails to see how the safety of the individual is wrapped up in the security of the nation or of society as a whole. Isaiah looked out upon life from a true humanitarian standpoint and he well understood that seeming material prosperity could easily be as "whitened sepulchres" fair to look upon from without, but filled with the bones of the dead within. The great nations of the earth might be filled with all the glory of their day but even in Babylon there lurked the shadow of death and in Israel where safety should have been assured there was hidden destruction just around the corner awaiting a favorable opportunity to leap forth and to bear down to the earth. One of the things that must have appeared strange to the people of ancient times, even as it appears strange to men of today, was that no material prosperity or worldly power was able to stay the destruction that at periodic times came upon the nations, so that when the prophet cried out, "Look unto me, and be saved, all the ends of the earth; for I am God, and there is none else," he was offering the nations the surest protection the world has ever known. This message of nearly three thousand years ago is as vital today and as applicable as it was when it fell from the lips of the ancient Hebrew prophet.

The nations of the world have been looking to their idols for all these centuries, but in vain. They have built great navies and have constructed great war machines of the flower of every generation, but none of these things has kept the world free from calamity and destruction. Many of the nations have looked to their boasted philosophies, to their false religions, their political alliances, theories, organizations, men—all in vain. Salvation is in none of these things. They seemingly have not yet learned that there is but one power that can save, that there is but one way to look, and that way is God. If the nations of the earth would be saved they must look to the Lord for their salvation.

Since a nation is but a group or a mass of individuals bound together by common wants or common ties, the need of the nation is but the need of the individual enlarged and multiplied, and the nation may look to God as the individual looks to him.

The word "look" as used by the prophet includes a number of things to both the individual and the nation in reference to God. But first of all it admits his reality by looking to him. It is difficult to fix a saving look upon a myth. One must consider that there IS a God, and enthrone him in his heart and mind as a real being, the true God and his Lord.

It might seem a strange thing to see a modern nation on its knees, but in no other way in these perilous days can a nation expect to find God in a way that is definite enough to assure the help the nations of the world so greatly need. Addressing God in prayer, thought, obedience, reverence, etc., looking to him so as to know him is one of the great needs of the world today.

The nations can look to God by acknowledging that from him only can real salvation come. Anything else is but a makeshift, it is but a temporary arrangement for protection for a period of time. In God alone is safety and real protection. He is the only possible Savior, for "there is none else."

The nations should anticipate that he will be a blessing to them, should look for his interposition and should abide in him alone for salvation. Some may say all this is very good for an individual but that it is impossible for a nation, but we insist that it is just as needful and just as possible for a nation as it is for an individual, and that though it may not be brought about through the enactment of any civil laws it can and must be brought about in the one and only way possible, and that is through the action of the individual human soul. This looking to God must begin in the life of the individual and spread from man to man until the whole world has come to regard God as the rightful Ruler of all men.

It is well to regard this salvation as an individual matter and to begin its consideration as close at home as possible and that is in our own hearts. In the early days of Christianity over-zealous Christian (?) kings undertook to convert the nations of the world with the sword and whole conquered armies were driven down the slopes of central Europe to the rivers and there were baptized "willy-nilly." This may account in a measure for the corrupted form of religion that prevails in "mittel Europe" today; and no one who has given any attention to the developments through this section of the world can question for a moment the great need of these people for the saving look.

The sources of encouragement to the nations to look to the Lord for salvation is threefold: His command, his promise, his character. He bids us look and we may feel sure this is no perfunctory or only formal invitation. It is an invitation that comes from a great heart, a heart that is big enough to grasp in one thought the great need of the world and that is able to express this great thought in one comprehensive and comprehensible word —LOOK.

Then his promise is, "look, and be saved," and he was never known to break a promise to those who kept covenant with him. The nations of the world have seemed to look to him at times, but they have failed to keep their covenant and then have seemed disappointed that he has not thrown his protecting care around them at all times, regardless of their own conduct in the matter. The character of God is that of a "just God and a Savior," so that no one, either individual or nation need fear to trust him or to take him at his word. One of the great weaknesses of us all is found in our reluctance to take him at his word and to trust him to fulfill his promises.

This invitation which God gave to the world through the lips of his prophet is of the broadest character; it extends to "all the ends of the earth," and there is no nation or no people that are excluded. The need of salvation, world salvation, is urgent. Without God the world is already lost, and there is no time for delay. The past is gone, the future has not yet come, only the present is ours and in this present every effort should be made to get the world to take this saving look. "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of Man be lifted up." The Son of Man has been lifted up; it now remains for the world to look to him for the salvation of which it stands so greatly in need. Look! Look!!

Everything

What a tremendous word! All inclusive, beyond comprehension, unfathomable as eternity! And yet some would have everything, as a possession, as a plaything. Ambition is great and it may spur one to achieve many things, but the ambition to accomplish, to have everything would be preempted by the so-called super-man.

But what is everything? The pantheist may say, God is everything and everything is God, while the Christian may be content to say that God is the maker of everything, without attempting to make fine definitions. God is force, power, energy, love and is in a sense everything, but not as some count everything.

Some would find force, power located in a being or in an element that is not Godlike according to the ordinary conception of God. There is an element of force and of power that seems to be vested in the evil one rather than in God and to this force some would turn to secure everything.

The writer makes no claim to being a philosopher, he does not pretend to make all the fine distinctions that are easily recognized by the mind that has dug deep into philosophical lore, but there are just a few things he thinks philosophers, even the brand "made in Germany" are not able to make clear even though they may make positive assertions.

A statement credited to Max Harden is, "Force, the fist—that is everything." That may be everything to a materialistic mind like that of the German-trained people, and so materialistic may such people become that the only force they can comprehend is that represented by the mailed fist. To them physical power or might may represent the only right they know, but thank God for the millions of people whose minds were not "made in Germany." The philosophy of the "cave man" was the philosophy of "he shall take who has the power, and he sall keep who can." While most of the world has grown beyond the stone age, it seems that progressive (?) Germany still sees nothing beyond the principles of that age and attempts to live by them.

The Creed of America

The creed of America may have never been written in articles of faith, her principles may have never found better verbal expression than in the Declaration of Independence, but there is a creed that is strictly American, there are principles that are a part of the great western world. We would not say this is a perfect creed or that her principles could not be improved upon. In some of their weaknesses may be found the very strength of America. Just what America stands for as a whole may be difficult to make plain; it is somewhat like the spiritual longing described by the Apostle as "groanings that can not be uttered," but it is a distinct something, hard to define as it may be.

What may have been spoken in derision by a certain university professor, when he said, "America is a nation built up by refugees of all creeds and types, and sprung from all the races of Europe," is undoubtedly true, and in this fact is to be found much of the glory and strength of America.

A weak people may chafe and remonstrate in spirit, but it requires some strength to protest against principles and conditions in an active manner. The early settlers of America as well as many who have come to our shores in recent years may have come because they chafed under conditions in the old world, but the fact that they had the strength of character to brave the uncertainties and formerly the many dangers of a new world is evidence that they were men and women of unusual strength of character.

Men who have found life intolerable in the old world because of either religious or political bondage have found freedom from such oppression in the western world. Though a few may have sought our shores in the hope of escaping proper and lawful restraint as exercised by European governments, that number has been small in comparison to the large number who have sought what in Europe they could not find, a freedom that gives them liberty without removing restraint necessary to the well-being of all. Long live the unwritten creed of America.

Nebuchadnezzar's Dream

Perhaps the world would have known very little of the ancient prophet, Daniel, had it not been for Nebuchadnezzar and his dream. "Dreams come true" may be a fascinating title for a book of inspiration to young people who need something to spur them on to greater efforts in life, but "Dreams that have failed" could well serve as a warning to those who would plan for personal and selfish advancement without taking into consideration the influence of God in shaping the destinies of men and nations.

Nebuchadnezzar was not the only king upon a throne who was troubled with bad dreams, not that the dreams seemed bad to them but that they turned out bad and were impossible of realization. Alexander the Great had wonderful dreams and they had largely come true in his life as he subdued the larger part of the civilized world, but they came to an abrupt end, in part at least, as a result of his licentious, living and all his political hopes were buried in the grave with him while the dreamer was still a young man.

Julius Caesar had dreams and he was well on his way to having them come true when he discovered that those whom he had counted as friends did not recognize "honor among thieves," but would sacrifice the life of friend or emperor, if the ambitions of that friend considered their sacrifice or enslavement as a part of the realization of his ambitious dreams, and Caesar fell, a victim to unholy dreams, on that fatal "ides of March."

Napoleon Boneparte had dreams and he regarded not the life of any man dear who stood in the way of the realization of his dreams and the tens of thousands of men left strewn upon the snow and ice bound plains of Russia told a pitiful tale of the cruelty of selfish ambitions and unholy dreams, and Wellington and Waterloo and St. Helena told the balance of the tale.

Now we are told that the Kaiser has said, "I have dreamed a dream of German world empire and my mailed fist shall succeed." All history declares that no such blasphemous men or principles can succeed. It may cost the blood of many millions of men, but the Kaiser will find out as other dreamers have that God will not let some dreams come true; and he should take to heart the experiences of kings who lived centuries before he was born, and if there is any place for repentance for such as he that place should be sought with tears lest a worse fate than that which befell Nebuchadnezzar shall be his.

Withstanding the Storm

The power of endurance or of resistance is the power that spells success to many a one in a hard place. It is not difficult to be good when no temptation assails one and it is not difficult to succeed when no obstacles are in the way, but it is when greatest temptations come and when mountain difficulties are encountered that the metal of which one is made is shown.

Misfortune is usually met at sometime in life by practically every one and the real difference in character is shown in the manner in which such experiences are met and overcome or yielded to. And in this as in many other things in life what proves a stumbling block and an occasion of offense in one proves a stepping stone rather than a stumbling, and is a means of rising to greater heights in the case of another. This depends mostly upon the character of the one who has the experience.

Some one has said: "Misfortune is a wind that rising higher, Blows out the match, but fans the steady fire."

So whether we are to be blown out or are to be fanned into greater flames of power or usefulness depends upon whether we are simply a small piece of soft pine or whether we are of the more substantial stuff of which steady fires are made. A match has its uses and is capable of great harm as well as of great good, but it flares up quickly, dies out rapidly and is easily extinguished. Few of us are of the more substantial stuff of which steady fires are made. Few of us are content to be matches only, we would rather be the steady fire. Then we must acquire the power of greater endurance and a firmer resistance. Those qualities are absolutely essential to success, and nothing but failure awaits one who does not possess and will not acquire them.

NOW THEN DO IT.—II Samuel 3:18

The Final Report

It is time for the final checking up for the year. The record has been made for this conference. In a few days, you will get the blanks for the final accounting. Are you ready? If you have any small deficits to make up that will give you another standing than you have at the very present minute, then this is the "click of the clock." I hope that every one that can possibly profit by the "click" of the clock will do so before it is too late for the best possible record for 1918. I am more anxious than you can imagine, that this record shall be worthy of yourselves as well as of the great church of which you are a part.

GREAT CHURCH?

Yes, that was a measured sentence. We have a great church. I do not need to tell you why I think so, nor what it all means now. We have a great church and in the years to come, many of the "boys" now, will be proud for the part they have played in making it some better than it was. That is the part we have in hand right now. Making a small child into a great man. When the records shall have been posted at Conference this fall, you will be glad for the part of the record you have helped to make perfect. It will be there, count on that. By every possible method, we propose to show to all the people assembled, what this program has already meant to the church. Last week I took for reference, the Endowment of the college. Now, let me refer to the Evangelist.

"See What You Made Me Do"

Thus spoke a little boy when some slip had made him to do something he had not intended. Now, it can not be said of the Publication Board that they did not want a wonderful increase in the number of Evangelist Subscribers; not that. I know how many ways and means we used the several years I was on the Board, to increase the number of subscriptions and then, how easily we slipped back into the old place again. But look now! More than ever and just the first year's real effort to do it. That year not all gone and more coming under the line every week, almost. And believe me, they will keep on doing it for two years. Already I am figuring out some happenings with regard to a better church paper when the war is over and we get back to the real swing of "costs," with a subscription list of 8,000 or 10,000.

A Great Program

So, my dear brethren, I am led to say again what you have read from me so many times, we have a great PROGRAM. Great CHURCH! GREAT PROGRAM. Anything that can be done to get a church in times like this, to do better than it had ever done before, is worthy of being called GREAT! and I am willing to say it over and over till we all believe it so hard that every Goal will make a showing that will look as real and as vital as the ones I have used for illustration. Great Program, people!

What Makes It Great?

Have you figured out just why this Program has been called great by so many of the leaders of the church? Well, I can tell you. It is because it secures unity of action. No one church can or could make it great. But all, working along the same lines and tabulating the results, makes us know that, in unity there is strength. Great because it gets greater results than otherwise.

A Little Adulation

This is for the preachers; it is not taffy nor would I have it to be epitaphy. Some years ago, when I was a minister of another denomination, I had occasion to visit a "Progressive" conference at Winona Lake. It happened that most of the preachers were at supper at the Inn, that evening, I think, and I beheld what I see right now, as I contemplate what will be done with this Program in another year.—in the next two, rather. They were a bright, brainy, virile, happy "bunch' 'of the youngest preachers that I had ever seen at once in so large numbers. I said, "a church that can enlist a group of young men like that in her ministry, ought to do wonders;" then, in a few years, I counted myself happy to be one, and have never repented.

Do Wonders

Now, young men—I do not forget the wonders that the women are and have been doing—DO WONDERS. I have not the slightest notion that you have been doing other than that or that this harvest of reports will allow us to think otherwise of you. I want to congratulate every pastor at the Winona Conference for the effort he has made to make good and so, I have a right to ask that you have something to show that the effort has been made.

Be Prompt. Delay is Disastrous

Now, brothers, do not delay the return of the reports. The time is late for their coming. Further delay will make them too late to get into the tabulation. Your delay will cost whatever your church will add to the sum total. It is as easy to do the right thing at the right time as to do it at the wrong time. DO IT NOW, is a motto that will serve well in this effort, especially. Do it now. "Tomorrow may be too late," is for this program as well as for evangelistic messages.

BAME.

The Minister's Problem

It is gratifying to know that the churches of the country are showing an increased interest in their aged ministers. The early circuit rider was glad to get enough to eat and, now and then a change of clothing. Little by little cam ca realization that the clergy should receive pay in money instead of being supported by occasional pound parties. However, salaries are still so small, for the most part, that the problem of caring for the superannuated minister is becoming increasingly important. Consequently the leading denominations are striving at this time to provide pension funds, so aged pastors may spend their declining days in peace instead of poverty.

The census department reports that the average salary of a minister is $663, which is held to be $37 lower than the income on which the average family can live "with any approach to decency." These figures were made before the cost of living had mounted to its present plane, and the ministers now face graver financial problems, than ever before. Ministers have larger families, on an average, than men of other professions. They are expected to dress well and to clothe their families neatly. Also they are expected to contribute to missions, charitable funds and other funds raised for the public and church good. How they do this on the salaries they receive is a mystery.

A recent report on fifty different denominations in the United States alone showed a total of 175,637 ministers and 223,294 churches. These churches had a total of 37,280,370 members. During the year the report was made there had been an increase in the number of ministers of 1,841, while the churches had increased 2,032 and there were 665,908 new church members.

Each year shows a crop of new clergymen. Many of them take the places of ministers who have become too old to occupy the pulpit longer. Numerous preachers who have spent an average lifetime in the ministry drop out of sight. New men come in and the old, faithful servants are forgotten. However, they must live, and the amount of work they have done to improve moral conditions entitles them to live in as much ease as possible. That is one reason the various churches are going ahead with the pension proposition. The Methodist Episcopal Church is now conducting a drive to raise a large fund for its aged clergymen. The Baptist, Congregationalist, Church of Christ, Episcopal, Lutheran, Presbyterian and other churches are actively engaged in furthering this movement. Dr. Joseph B. Hingeley, president of the Interdenominational Council of Pension Agents, recently said that the Protestant churches of the country now have $33,000,000 in their treasuries to be used as pensions for preachers. The goal these churches have set is $65,000,000. There is every reason to believe the total they have set will be reached.—News, Indianapolis, Ind.

If the World Is Growing Better, What Is the Method?

BY EDWIN ELMORE JACOBS, PH.D.

The question of the improvement of human society has long engaged the attention of thinking and earnest men everywhere. The methods suggested for this improvement have been many. And while some say one thing and some another, there are still others who sit back and say that not only has the world not improved but that it can not be improved. It is the old question oft asked, Is the world growing better or worse, and if growing better, how?

Those who insist that humanity shows no real and lasting improvement, point out that the scriptures say that many are called but few are chosen that the way of life is narrow only the few find it, and that the Christian elite have been rare in all the centuries. They ask, with Christ, whether or not, on his return, he will find faith in the earth, implying that he will not find faith on the earth for the love of many will wax cold, antichrist will come and mislead the multitudes.

On the other hand there are those who point out that charities are constantly growing more numerous, hospitals have multiplied, politics are cleaner, childhood more endurable, womanhood better provided for and that our outlook on life is generally more cheerful, more invigorating, more sane.

Without stopping to argue the question, the writer assumes that in general life is more endurable today than formerly, and that it is better to be alive now than ever before in the world's history and that if it were not for the present blood debauch, life would be infiniely more happy than it was, say at the opening of written human history.

But, if we assume, that humanity is better situated today than formerly, the next and by far the most important question is, what is the method of improvement?

There is a belief abroad today and has been abroad for many years, that humanity if left to itself, would gradually improve not only biologically but morally as well. It is pointed out that in time humanity would see the folly of sin, and hence war, lust, jealousy, dishonesty, and the lust for brother's blood, would be sloughed off by wholly evolutionary processes. Tennyson even suggests that we should work out our destiny and "let the ape and tiger die" which man has ever concealed within his breast.

Then comes too, the superstition that humanity has wonderfully increased in its biological inheritances not only rapidly but recently. We hear much of the ape-man, the cave-man, and the half-human beings of the not remote past, while we today stand as the proud paragons of the evolution, the apex of all created things. And what we shall be doth not yet appear, but we know, they say, that when we are fully come to the perfect end, we shall be away and beyond anything that humanity yet has seen or even dreamed of!

Nothing could be farther from the truth and yet contain many elements of the truth. That we are the products of evolutionary forces, no authority would deny, but that we can hope for and anxiously await a perfect humanity by this method alone, only the foolish can assert. All anthropologists will agree that man has come a long way, even perhaps from the cave-man and ape-man. We can believe this if we are so disposed, but to assume that man changes from century to century in his biological inheritances to any degree that is detectable to us here and now, is beyond either belief or proof. Abraham did not bring any more or less biological inheritances into the world at his birth, doubtless, than did my little boy born less than two years ago. The little Indian baby born on these college grounds, say five thousand years ago, from which I now write these words, did not bring any less biological inheritances with it, than those of the same race line, who are born today in the Dakotas. We speak of the rich inheritances into which our children are born today, but mark you, these are wholly social rather than biological, if we are considering the recent past. And these inheritances must always be watched with great care, for they may slip at any time, and from any generation, just precisely because they are social. If they had been worked into the chromosomes of our being, then we might laugh at all the talk about uprooting civilization. If the steam engine, the telescope, the compound microscope, the dynamo, Dante, Shakespeare and Christ, were inherent in the consciousness of every child born unto the world, then might we laugh at bestial Germany today. But it is just because our rich inheritances are wholly social that we must see to it that they are passed on with great care. If all the adults in America were to die today and if it were possible for the little children now less than a year old, to grow up and live, they would all have the long and weary way to travel over again. There would be absolutely no inheritance, rich or otherwise, to pass on, except the biological one which is as old as modern man.

And this biological inheritance does not rapidly change, certainly not rapidly enough to be of any real value to men and women living now, I must have a better inheritance, being social I may contribute my share in making it better. It is all too long to wait on natural causes if indeed, they were all working in the upward direction, to make life more tolerable for my children, for as suggested biological improvement if there be any, is slow. Take the Essex girl as an illustration. She lived about 5,000 years ago. Her measurements are practically identical with men walking the streets of London even as I write these words. Take the Tilbury man living somewhere between 15,000 and 30,000 years ago. practically the same may be said for him. Take the Dartford type, which may have lived so long ago as 50,000 years and this type has shown no great change one way or the other to say nothing of the Cro-Magnon type which if anything was even more advanced than modern types. These together with many others show I think rather conclusively that man changes in his biological inheritances but slowly if at all. Certainly since Homo sapiens has come to the planet, he has changed but little.

What, then, becomes of all our boasted improvement? Does it vanish? Not at all, but on the contrary it is the one most impressive fact of all history, i. e., that man is never satisfied with the present. And improvement must lie in the direction of social relationships, using the word social in a broad way. | Religion is a social phenomenon, in that it has to do with inter-relations. Just here comes in the beauty and glory of our common Christianity. Christ did not at all seek to change men biologically. He left man with every inheritance which he had when he found him nor did he add one iota to his equipment at birth. The children born the next generation after Christ were just precisely the same in their biological inheritance as those born before, but the possibilities of their social inheritance were multiplied infinitely. Hence the challenge of Christ to Nicodemus to a new birth, was not for him alone but must be for every man ever born into the world. So far as we can think into the future, every man must make this new birth personal for all the human instincts are here and are bound to be, and only as the new births hold sway, only so far are men fundamentally changed. |

If any one thinks that the ape and tiger within the human breast, have died or are even ill, I bid him to look at blood-mad and power-mad Germany today. Every bestial instinct which surged within the breast of the cave-man seems to be there today and where Christianity has been known the longest, there humanity seems to be at its worst which only proves that the devil can strike as full a chord now on the gamut of the human heart as ever he could.

Human improvement, then, can come only as we can bring men to see the reasonableness of right and of the Christian ideal. Those who see and adopt it willingly, are in the vanguard of advance. Those who are so selfish and blind as still to think only in terms of the cave-man, must be forcibly restrained in the interests of all. And then if in that far away and happy bye-and-bye, there shall evolve a super-man, superior in moral goodness, kindness, and love, let that day be welcomed. Meanwhile, let us preach, to what now appears as unchanging human nature, the Christian ideal,—the new birth,—thus helping to usher in that day, the event of which the Lord has bidden us to make the first of all our petitions to him.

The Church in the New World

BY JOSEPHINE B. WOGAMAN, A.B.

The fact of war is now a conscious reality. All normal plans of the world have been overturned and every activity, international, commercial, industrial, has been organized toward that end. Old orders and methods were revised to meet the new demand. The Christian church has not escaped criticism and reorganization. During the normal peace period the church performed her various duties in a quiet and unenthusiastic way. But today she stands waiting to do her part among the thousand million who are thus engaged in this world struggle.

Once church and state were united and jointly they directed the affairs of nations. The church exercised her authority in all legal affairs and manipulated the transactions of the political regime. Her influence thwarted many evils which attempted to enter the political and social life of early civilization. When the Christian religion entered the Roman Empire, it added its own contributions of great ideas to those of the Greeks and Romans. And in the end was the dynamic force in transforming the ancient into the modern world. At the middle of the fourth century, it was the prevailing religion,—not in numbers,—but in influence and control of society. But the papacy began to dominate over the state, until it became an asset, and consequently lost its authority. The church receded into the background, completely severing her connections with the state.

At the beginning of the war the Y. M. C. A., a religious institution based upon broad social lines, was called to direct the spiritual life of our soldiers. This organization, an arm of the church was prepared to minister to the intellectual, physical and spiritual life of the men, The church now serves under the leadership of the Y. M. C. A., and will continue to function through this organization until the close of the war.

Is Christianity as a world relgion on trial? The Christian people know that the world is being shaken to its foundations and that the kingdom of God is moving forward. But why has the church failed to rapidly spread the kingdom of God? Because of this neglect, the world is asking that the church prove that Christianity is not on trial, and that it is the final and complete religion.

The call has come for reality in the social and religious worlds and since this has sounded we have discovered that the principles of the Christian church have been vaguely practised. The scribes were religious, the Pharisees were even punctilious, but their testimony lacked virility. Form was the essence of their religion, and it continues to be a predominant factor in our worship, But if the religious practice had been the genuine teachings of Jesus Christ, war would not survive on the earth. But the challenge of the church today in the new world is not a new form, but a new spirit: a spirit of love, instead of a spirit of hate and war.

Society has been considered as a mass, not as individuals. The church failed to see the individual in the multitude, and as a result they receive no sympathy, because they are far removed from our shores. But war has bridged the chasm and united the people of the old and new worlds. Our deepest emotions have awakened for suffering Belgian, wounded Armenians and the crushed but ever courageous French. How real is our Christianity that we are sending to these lands? Is it the simple direct religion of the Master? To quote Bishop Oldham of the Methodist church, "The attitude of the non-Christian peoples towards Christianity will be determined in the end by what Christianity actually is in practce, and not by what missionaries declare it to be. . . . The Christian protest against the unChristian forces in social and national life must be clearer, sharper and more patent than it has been in the past."

The question that startles us is, is our Christianity worth propagating? Has the Christian church a vital experience of Christ? Can we go out into the heart of heathenism and say that we have an experience that knows that Jesus satisfies? The strength of the church lies in what she has to propagate in Christ. Her message, her power and her experience must be ready to be given every day and very hour. Every true Christian knows that God is zealous that he shall communicate his spirit to another soul. The war task will stimulate to broader spirit of sacrifice and compassion toward distressed people.

Furthermore the spirit of world evangelization must permeate the church in order that real Christianity may be given to non-Christian lands. A young French soldier who was killed in a bayonet charge, said shortly before his death: "This war must not be sterile; from all these deaths there must burst forth new life for all mankind." Our young men are prepared to give their full measure of devotion. Is the Christian church eager to meet the new spirit of sacrifice manifested by her youth, who demand a more efficient program? Will the church grasp this challenge push forward a speedier world evangelization?

Another great strength of the church in the new world will be that the Christian people must be more responsive to the sufferings of humanity. One of the great glories of the war will be the capacity of the human heart for sympathy and it will result in deeds of mercy. But why has our sympathy so long been withheld from the non-Christian lands who have been suffering the same pangs as our waring nations? This world task calls us to relieve the poverty, hunger and disease in the war zone. But elsewhere this call has been present for years. Poverty has pervaded the non-Christian world for ages, for every non-Christian nation is destitute. We have eagerly aided the hungry in Belgium and Poland, but more people have been suffering from hunger in India than in Belgium and Poland combined. But the war has stimulated our efforts, and the awakened church in the new order will hear the cry of these dying people. Because war is harassing our land is no excuse for the church to retard her missionary endeavors.

Yes, the Red Cross, Y. M. C. A. and Liberty Loan are consuming our time and money, but these are insufficient reasons to relax in our missionary propaganda. The church is not a failure, but it must arise in its strength and proclaim the glorious gospel as the foundation of our system of morals.

But what will be expected of the church in the new world after the war? History has shown us the union of church and state, their separation, but now the new world will proclaim another union, but it will be on a new basis, an ideal state. The joy of achievement will be fresh in the minds of men and they will be restless in the arts of peace. Here will be the supreme opportunity for the church to show the largeness in the spiritual conquest of the world, to interpret Christianity in world terms. Cumbersome forms struggling for prominence will recede and a new spirit will pervade the earth. The kingdom of God is determined to come with a new faith based on the teachings of Jesus Christ. The Christian is looking for a world in the ideal, a world based on faith.

J. Lovell Murray contends that, "This is the call of a world task in war time. We speak of it as the call of a task, an emergency of a need. But after all, is it not the call of Christ? In the present call of the nation, the call of liberty, the call of humanity, many men and women have recognized his imperative. More sharply still in this other campaign, through all the voices that cry out for prompt, effective and sweeping measures should be distinguished his voice of entreaty and command. It is God's will that we should move forward."

Therefore the church will be called upon to answer in one voice, with one mind, the great commission, "All authority hath been given unto me in heaven and on earth. Go ye therefore, and disciple all nations. . . and lo I am with you always, even unto the end of the world.

The Winona Bible Conference

The Winona Assembly and Bible Conference, at Winona Lake, Indiana, has incorporated a great many patriotic features in a long list of attractions which it has provided for its patrons this season. Rev. J. Stuart Holden, D. D., of London, heads the list of Bible Conference speakers, and scores of others prominent in church and state have been announced to appear. The dates of this conference are August 16 to 25. A Prophetic conference will be held, the first of its kind at Winnoa. The several views on the prophecies of the Bible will be presented by men who have made careful study of the subject. Dates for this conference are August 8 to 15. The Bible school under the direction of Dr. F. N. Palmer will be in session from July 8 to August 2. An evangelistic meeting, led by one of foremost evangelists in the country, has been arranged for. It will precede the Assembly program, covering dates June 30 to July 14. Other important events of the season are, Woman's School of Missions, June 20 to 27; Sunday School Training School, August 7 to 15; Conference against Crime, July 22 to 24; Christian Citizenship Institute, August 4 to 15; Bethany services, all season; Presbyterian Young People, July 10 to 16; Interdenominational Association of Evangelists, August 20 to 24; Winona Assembly Program, July 15 to August 15; Rescue Mission Workers, August 16 to 25; Prof. E. O. Excell's grand chorus all season; Jewish Conference, August 2 to 4; Dry Workers' Conferecne, August 16 to 25; Boy and Religion Conference, August 19 to 21; Christian Conference, August 26 to September 1; Brethren General Conference, August 26 to September 2; United Brethren Conference, September 4 to 8. The Red Cross School and the Summer School will be in session July 8 to August 16.

*With apologies to our Brethren in Washington, Idaho, and Oregon!

This report is only a summary. The complete, itemized report will occur in the June issue of "The Brethren Missionary." My books show a record of $3,332.80 having been paid into foreign funds between September 1st, 1917, and January 1st, 1918. This makes a total since last Conference of $15,426.48, which is "over the top," thank you! It was our determination that the Easter offering alone should "go over the top" for the $10,000.00 Goal fixed at the last Conference. It will be seen that this was nicely exceeded. One good lay brother writes that we should have set $50,000.00 as the Goal for this work. One thing sure, this is more than twice the amount, as it is, that we have ever before given. I have a real desire to see at least $1.00 per member given by the Brethren church next year, or, at least, $25,000.00 We need to get down to this work of carrying the Gospel to the unevangelized peoples of the world in deadly earnest, so that we Brethren can no longer be accused of believing in only part of the Great Commission in Matthew 28: 19.

There will be many interesting side-lights brought out on this present offering in the complete report in the next issue of "The Brethren Missionary." Subscriptions for this magazine should always be sent direct to the undersigned, at the rate of 25c a year, unless you are a member of the Foreign Missionary Society.

I am only happy to be able to say, that, while I have urged others to give, my own church at Long Beach was not failing in her duty. Our total Easter Offering amounted to $2,601.06, which is almost exactly $7.00 per capita for the church. This is our answer to those timid souls that have been urging only 30c per capita. We do not expect all other churches to do as well; but there are a few churches to whom we do not hesitate to say, "Go thou, and do likewise." It is true that one-half the Long Beach offering came in a large amount. But the other half, or, $1,301.06, came in small amounts in which $100.00 was the largest single gift. Most of it was given in small amount such as all God's children should give. This simply shows what people can do when they will, and when they believe in a cause. We now stand ready to do our full duty toward reaching every other Goal the Four-Year Program has set. Brethren let us put every one of them "over the top" at the earliest possible moment, and prove to God and men that we believe in the mission of the Brethrn church in a sadly smitten and sinful world.

LOUIS S. BAUMAN,
Financial Secretary.

1905 E. 5th St., Long Beach, Calif., June 1st, 1918.

Don'ts to Pastors

Don't make yourself any trouble you will have a plenty anyway.

Don't throw brick-bats at your people from the pulpit; they often fly like an Australian boomerang.

Don't charge your laity with tightwadism when your salary fails to come, unless you visited and prayed with them.

Don't hammer stay-at-home sinnners of the church Sundays in your pulpit; reprove them privately. You do more good.

Don't fly to pieces when the devil gets into your flock, but cooly drive him out with prayer. He hates this weapon.

Don't thrash thrashed straw over, unless you made a miserable job of it the first time, and can do better now.

Don't feed your laity stale straw when you want good work out of them; but give them hay, oats and corn.

Don't neglect the sick and needy; after a while you may be sick, and need cheer and help.

Don't fool away precious time with old second-hand automobiles, they keep you away from pastoral work and study.

Don't spend all your salary on the kitchen table; spend some for your book-table.

Don't plagiarize sermons, for there are too many detectives in the pews.

Don't run when foes turn on you, your feet are made to stand on solid Truth.

Don't be a janitor for a stingy, indifferent church people; for they will not appreciate you the more. —Selected.

The Sunday School

Big Questions the Church Must Answer

Under the above heading and over the name of Robert Wells Veach appears an editorial article in "The Christian Educator," which, from the point of view of its timeliness, is of exceptional interest. The author of the article puts his thoughts into four initial questions and five big propositions, which he then proceeds to answer and develop briefly by giving a short paragraph to each proposition.

The subject with its succinct treatment must make its appeal to all who are interested in the work of the Sunday school, especially that portion of it which has to do with the development of the men in and out of the church. It will be well worth the time, and many times more, of every pastor and Sunday school superintendent and teacher to read the article. It is a vital question, or questions, the writer proposes. Every paragraph in the discussion is "packed" with thought that throws out a challenge to the church of the twentieth century. Will the leaders of the church accept the challenge? Note the emphasis on Bible study, how it inspires and prepares for service, how it appeals to men of practical affairs, how the life and death of Jesus meets the needs of men and supplies the dynamic for great achievement. But let us read the article. It follows:

1. What are you doing to develop the men in your church?

2. What are you doing to get hold of the large number of vigorous men in the community?

3. What will the church do with the young men when they come back from the front?

4. How can the church challenge the manhood of America with a program for the Christianization of the social order after the War?

In answering these questions, the church should consider carefully two questions. First, what are the religious needs of men?

There are five elements in the religious needs of men, as follows:

1. Men need a spiritual vision and objective that will give meaning and purpose to life.

2. Men crave a moral ideal and power that will cleanse from the guilt of sin, help overcome temptation, and furnish an adequate motive to service and sacrifice.

3. Men want Christian fellowship, a conscious sense of the spiritual basis of brotherhood, a mutual communion with God.

4. Men must have a program—a practical, constructive, challenging, world-wide program of Christian service to which they can give themselves with unstinted devotion.

5. In all religious work men demand a human leadership of the right caliber.

The second question is, How can we best meet these needs?

The answer is that there is the men's Bible class—the basic organization for promoting permanent and effective religious work among men.

Long experience has proved that the best religious work can be done with men when they are first organized for Bible study. While a teacher in a sparsely settled district in western Pennsylvania, the writer gathered seventy-five men together every Sunday afternoon for Bible study.. As a result three dead churches came to life and forces were set in motion which transformed the community. It was the writer's privilege, while a pastor in Rochester, New York, to teach a men's Bible class which had been in continuous existence for twenty-six years, and out of which had come every male officer and teacher of the Sunday school and more than thirty men who are now leaders and trustees in various churches. For the past six months it has been his special privilege to be Director of Religious Work in Camp Dix. All the experience of this and other camps bears testimony to the peculiar power of Bible study to mold the lives of men. This editorial is written out of an overwhelming conviction that the best dynamic force for effective religious work with men is the organized men's Bible class. Its possibilities have not been half developed. They are not, in fact, fully understood by the average pastor and church. Four million men in the United States and Canada meet every week for some kind of Bible study, according to a careful estimate. Does the church realize the significance of this fact? Then why do we not go to work and organize four million more men for the same exalted purpose?

How does Bible study meet the religious needs of men as above stated?

1. Bible study is the one unfailing source of spiritual vision. The Bible is the one Book in the world that challenges the whole man and opens up to him a life objective that is worth while. Life is so full of struggle and strife, of perplexing problems and dark questions for which men have the right to demand an answer. The problems of social life, of sin, of sorrow and social injustice, of war, of death and immortality, press close upon the conscious experience of every man, without excepiton. For all of these problems he is constantly seeking in some way or other a solution. For all these things the Bible has the answer and the key of life, and, what is more, the vast majority of men know it and secretly long for a teacher who is powerful in the scriptures.

2. The life and death of Jesus Christ is the only satisfactory answer to the need of men for a moral ideal and a dynamic. In the life and teachings, in the death and resurrection, in the conscious presence of the spiritual Christ, men come to find the one thing above everything else which they crave. Nowhere can men come to know Christ so well as when they are gathered together for the study of the Scriptures.

3. Take the Bible out of life and out of history, and you take away from humanity its Magna Charta of human brotherhood. Slowly but surely the great masses of men in the church and outside it are coming to realize that the teachings of the Bible are the sheet anchor of human liberty and the spiritual basis of the brotherhood of man.

4. The vast number of men are practical and objective. They instinctively believe that religion is a thing to be applied to the whole of life, and that the principles of religion should be involved in the whole process of the building of society. The future of Christianity is at stake in the present World War. Christianity stands for democracy, for freedom, righteousness, justice, mercy and love. For these things men are fighting and they propose to continue to fight for them after the War is over until they are established in society. They, therefore, want an ideal social order, with a practical program for its attainmnt. The idea of the Kingdom of heaven as set forth by Jesus and inaugurated by Christ's early disciples, furnishes us with both the ideal and the program; and here again men are coming more and more to see that the Bible contains the basic principles for the reconstruction of society.

5. Men need a human leadership. It is in the Bible that we find the secret of such leadership, not only in the teaching of the Scripture, but in the portrayal of the great characters of Scripture. The great leaders of men are usually rated according to Biblical standards. "He goeth before them, and the sheep follow him: for they know his voice."

So we come to the conclusion that the five fundamental needs of men are best met by gathering them into organized Bible classes for the study of God's Word and for the application of spiritual truths to the needs of the world.

Is not this fine? There is nothing vague about it. It is a clear-cut statement of what lies within the possibility of every Sunday school in the brotherhood. What an opportunity for church and Sunday school leaders! and what a privilege! and above all, what a responsibility!

Are your men organized? Is the program of Jesus Christ being presented to them systematically and appealingly? Are they being stirred to DO something? Are they being made to feel each Sunday during the half hour devoted to Bible study that they are called of God to enter the kingdom of God as inaugurated by the Lord Christ and his early disciples, that the Christ of the first century is the Christ of this twentieth century, that today, as of old, he makes his appeal to brave, strong and stalwart men to join the ranks of his mighty army which is set for the winning of the world for him?

This is an opportune time. Beginning with the first Sunday in July we enter upon a series of twelve studies in THE CHRISTIAN LIFE,—how to begin it, how to promote it, how to make it efficient and count for the church and the world, what it means to be a Christian, the conditions of discipleship in the year 1918,—it is the finest series of studies ever brought before the Sunday school and Bible study world. Bring in your men, organize them, and present to them enthusiastically this splendid opportunity for Bible study,—DO IT NOW. Order outline studies. Fifteen cents per dozen.

REVIEW OF
The Thought and Work of the Church

This is LAST WEEK'S PAPER, but don't be alarmed. The freight and railroad traffic are toblame for it. The car load of paper we bought last February has not yet arrived, and the small shipments we have been receiving over the electric line from Detroit failed us last week, and it was simply a case of no paper to print on. But our car is somewhere along the road and when it arrives there will be no trouble for many months.

Hats Off! L. Garvin Smith, Conemaugh, Pennsylvania gets the honors this week. The biggest thing that has ever been pulled off in the Brethren church has just been accomplished at Conemaugh, and we can imagine we see the smile spreading clear over Brother Smith's countenance, even to the apex of his dome, as he realizes how he and Beachler, with the help of God accomplished this great thing. We will not comment on the achievement. Just read what Beachler says. He says it better.

The leading contribution this week is a digest of a sermon preached by Dr. Jacobs in the college chapel a few weeks ago. While it may not be in exact harmony with some of our preconceived notions it appeals to the editor as being based upon sound principles and entirely in harmony with the teachngs of both science and the Word of God.

The announcements that appear on the Christian Endeavor page this week should have been in last week's Evangelist, but they arrived after the matter for the week had all been made up and as a consequence had to be carried over one week. All such announcements should reach the office in time to make it unnecessary to disarrange matter that has already been made up for any page in order to give them room. These announcements are of importance and we regret the necesity for their delay until this week. Small cuts of two of Ohio's state workers appear in connection with the announcements.

The brief report of the Easter Missionary Offering for the Foreign Society of the Brethren church as made by the secretary, L. S. Bauman is a memorable one for the church. Not that the offering was so great in itself, but because it was great in comparison to what it has been in the past and because it is an index to what the church may be expected to do in the future. The church seems to be awakening along several lines and especially along lines of missionary opportunity and obligation.

This week we give to our readers a contribution from Miss Josie Wogaman on "The Church in the New World." This now completes the publication of the class orations as delivered at the recent commencement exercises of Ashland College. We feel that the publication of these addresses in the Evanglist for the past three weeks will result in bringing the church in general in closer touch with the work of the College, and while we are now engaged in an endowment campaign this is the one thing needed by both the church and College.

We are always glad to receive good reports from our lay members of the church relative to the work being done in their congregations, and this week we have such a report from the Gratis, Ohio church. This is one of the strong churches in Ohio that is serving a rural community and we believe it is giving good service. Its new pastor, C. E. Beekley, has ben hindered some in his work because of illness, but we are glad to know that he has recovered and is now hard at work for the Master.

W. M. Lyon is facing some of the really hard things in church work in his labors in Washington at the present time, but he is a man of large faith and much prayer and is not cast down, nor does he feel forsaken, but he does ask that he shall be remembered in the prayers of those who are interested in the cause of the Brethren in the large cities.

There are only a few Brethren churches in the state of Michigan, but these few are faithful and true and in spite of many handicaps maintain a district conference organization which meets regularly. A brief report of their two-day conference which recently met with the Brethren in the Campbell church appears in this week's Evangelist. While the workers in Michigan are so few and the opportunities for work are so large there is no room or place for inactivity among the workers of that district. Eleven members were added to the Campbell church by baptism during the conference.

The churches of Southern California that had such a successful Bible conference at Long Beach have arranged for a similar conference in July. The conference will be held at Long Beach as it was last year and no pains have been spared to make the program worth while to those who have it in their hearts to attend. Read the announcement from the secretary as it appears on another page.

The Lanark, Illinois church is one of those middle-western churches that is always doing things, and a reading of the report from Brother Burnworth will reveal the fact that the pastor is doing things also, which may account largely for the great activity of the congreagtion. The Brethren at Lanark are to be congratulated thay they have undertaken a building project in these strenuous times. "The King's business requireth haste."

We know the entire church will appreciate the brief report which comes this week from W. H. Bock, one of our missionaries in South America. We are glad for the good impression our representatives in this southern field are able to make on the people where they labor. They should be remembered in our prayers.

A. P. Reed, Los Angeles, California, is always interested in the work of the whole church and consequently tries to promote every department by co-operating with them. The First Church of Los Angeles is striving in every-way to make itself felt in the work of the kingdom of God.

Around the Editor's Table

Praying for Victory

One of the exchanges that comes weekly to our table has a great deal to say about the "victorious life," and one of the things it never fails to emphasize strongly is that such a life is not an accomplishment but a gift, that it is not accomplished by what man does but by what man lets God do for him. This same principle may hold true in other things than in the individual life. Possibly it may be true in the life of nations that are willing to trust God, to sometimes, "stand still and see the victory of the Lord."

When people who have a belief in God are engaged in a great war it is but natural that they hope God is on their side. One of the incidents related of the life of Lincoln during the great civil strife in America is that of a friend who anxiously said to him, "Mr. Lincoln, do you think God is on our side?" Mr. Lincoln's reply was characteristic of the man as he said, "I am not so much concerned whether God is on our side as I am whether we are on God's side." And right here hinges the question whether we should pray for God to give victory to any cause. "If God be for us, who can be against us?" And if he be for us in this great war then praying for success to come to the Allied cause is not only a privilege but it is a duty as well. It has been suggested that the American people are neglectful in regard to this matter. A recent number of the Literary Digest says:

When we made Decoration Day a day of intercession as well, at President Wilson's suggestion, we only fell in line with our allies in Europe, whose leaders have given evidence of their belief in the power of prayer. England is exhorted to a stricter "spiritual discipline" by Mr. John Oxenham, the novelist, who sees that "something more than even mental, moral, and bodily discipline is needed if we are to win what we set out to win in this war." While the Government calls upon all its people to put themselves and all they possess at the disposal of the state "for its salvation in this time of need," Mr. Oxenham, in the London Daily Chronicle, reminds the British public that "there are Higher Powers still, only waiting to be called upon for the help that is so sorely needed to assure the speedy and final triumph of right over wrong." He concedes for the generality that at heart all this is well known, but he points out what may probably have a wider application to the immediate public he is addressing when he says that "we are a careless, free-and-easy, self-willed lot, and we have wandered our own primrosy ways so long that we find it not easy to get back to the solid bed-rock path, though we recognize that it is a safer road to travel." Still more, so he shows, do the "great leaders on land and sea know and feel it."

Prayer Saves Paris

To the average onlooker it seemed as sure as fate that Paris must fall into the hands of the Huns in 1914, but it didn't Was there any reason for it not being accorded such a disgraceful fate? Was it because of the superior forces that met the hosts of the Prussians that saved Paris? It was not thought so at the time and it is not thought so even now. It seems that a power higher than that of big guns or poison gas was appealed to and responded in this instance. In writing of this in the London Daily Chronicle, Mr. Oxenham says,

"It is on record that when the triumphant German hosts were sweeping on Paris in 1914, and suddenly swerved and gave it up, Lord Roberts was sitting with Lord Kitchener when the telegram announcing their unlooked-for retreat was handed in. Lord Roberts, a firm believer in prayer, exclaimed, 'Only God Almighty could have done this.' 'Somebody must have been praying,' said Lord Kitchener.

"Neither of them mawkish or canting men, if you please.

"And a day or two ago I cut from a daily newspaper—not given to dilating on such matters and inserted simply as interesting items of news on two different pages—the following: 'Victory Depends on Prayer—General Sir W. Robertson, in a letter regarding the Intercession service at Queen's Hall on May 7, says, "It is only when the whole Empire unites in prayer as well as in work that we can look forward with confidence to a successful conclusion to this tragic war and to a just and righteous peace.'" Weighty words from such a man!

"The second paragraph runs: 'General Foch and Prayer—A Frenchman who knows General Foch tells me that he is an ardent believer in the power of prayer. "We shall be saved by it," he says, "and it will not be the first time in this deadly struggle!"

"I believe I am right in saying that Lord Jellicoe, Sir David Beatty, and Sir Douglas Haig hold firmly by that belief also.

"All these are men whose very names carry weight with us all. It is worth our while to give heed to them. The knowledge that the whole nation was doing so would quadruple their confidence and that of every man in the fighting lines on land and sea.

"I remember an old story of a particularly disreputable sailor-man who, when his ship was in the last extremity and all the rest were laboring hard to save her, suddenly fell on his knees and began praying. And the captain, finding him at it, kicked him back to duty with a scornful, 'Keep your prayers for fine weather!"

"Foul-weather prayers, evoked only by an acute sense of danger, can not count for much. And formal Intercession services do not seem to me likely to be of much greater avail.

"Unless the nation's prayers for deliverance from peril come spontaneously from hearts earnestly desirous of alining themselves with God—of cleansing themselves of the old concretions that have clogged them like the barnacles on a ship's bottom—of substituting new guiding lamps for the old misleading will-o'-the-wisps—of casting aside the false gods we have followed and turning steadfastly to the True—they are not likely to serve.

"It is no good asking God to fight on our side unless we first make our side fit for him to fight on.

"As a nation, we have a terrible amount of leeway to make up. Are we as a nation making any real effort thereto? Until we genuinely do so our tribulation may have to go on."

Christian Ethics

All ethics can not be called Christian, but any systems of ethics that does not take God into consideration and that is not based on the teachings of Jesus Christ is not capable of developing either individual or national character that is worthy and noble. A great deal has been said about the ethics of Germany, and of the Kaiser and of the war lords of the Prussian Empire, but none of it has been regarded as wholesome. Consequently it is a relief to know that there are intelligent and conscientious Germans who do not agree with the Kaiser and his contingent of the German people in their ethics. While the Prussian system as a whole is woefully corrupt there yet remain a few "men in Israel who have not bowed the knee to baal," and to these few Germany must look for whatever future good may come to her people. She can not follow and trust in the old system or the old leaders and expect to again win the respect of the rest of the world.

Among the intelligent men of Germany who hold to sane views of life and who believe in a system of ethics that is wholesome and acceptable may be counted Prof. F. W. Forster, of the University of Munich, a brother-in-law of Nietzsche, who recently contributed an article to the Munchener Post, and which was reprinted in America by the New Yorker Staats-Zeitung and The Christian Register (Boston). The English translation was made by A. W. Vernon, who remarks that "after these long years of strife we the Americans appreciate not only the sanity but the rare courage of such writing." The object of the Munich professor is to show his countrymen why England and America keep on fighting and he says:

"They are waging war to rid the world of war and the threat of war. That seems beyond the horizon of many modern Germans, who have grown up in military Romanticism. They have no idea how pacifistic thought has filled the English and American world in the last two decades, not merely on ideal grounds but because, as Herbert Spencer reiterated, highly developed methods of mediation in international disputes belong to the essence of industrial society and its world-wide organized needs and assurances . And simply because we do not realize that, and therefor insist on attributing the decisions to our opponents to the most obviously sefl-interested hand-to-mouth diplomacy, we allow ourselves to be misled by those superwise folk who insist that America's stupendous preparations are meant for Japan and not for us. That is 'Prussian' folk-psychology. . . . .

"But must America really continue this war in order to obtain the recognition and accomplishment of its world-program? Haven't the resolution of the majority of the Reichstag and the answer of the Central Powers to the Pope demonstrated our entire willingness to work with them for the accomplishment of their plans for the future? What is there more that we can do? The answer is simple: the Entente still misses the convincing moral guaranty behind all these declarations. It does not believe that the majority of the Reichstag is seated firmly in the saddle. It can, alas! point to too many haughty protests of the most influential classes against this resolution. It notes the unique position of the 'spiritual leaders' of the nation. It pursues with interest the heathenish editorials of the Christian Kolnische Volkszeitung, which justifies a machiavellian policy for a great growing people. It cites numerous witnesses for the purely military kind of thinking which still predominates in the university circles of Germany with regard to the great race questions. Yes, it suspects a large group of those who supported the majority resolution in the Reichstag of voting not from any thoroughgoing transformation of international thinking, but because of a virtual pause of military enterprises, believing that every change in the military situation would change the convictions of such people. On such insecure foundation, however, the future international order can not be built. The Entente asserts that a superstition, cherished through the entire history of Prussia, concerning military methods of national security, has eaten deep into the German soul through these gigantic successes, that a romantic faith in the sword and in might has grown up, that can be shown its absurdity only through the drastic experience of a breakdown of Germany's position in the world. This mistrust is unfortunately strengthened by the idea of Czernin to postpone his impressive confession of faith in a peace without annexations. As though a conviction of the only possible basis of internatonal life in the future could be postponed! If I am convinced that the nations can no longer bear competitive armaments on economic, financial, and moral grounds, then I am compelled to resist every new occasion for the continuance of hate and suspicion, no matter how far others lag behind my opinion; otherwise, I arouse the not unjustified belief that I have no conviction at all, but am merely a clever chess-player."

Rio Cuarto, Argentina Sobremonte 1531

Recently I have had the privilege of a few days' vacation and the pleasure of visiting some of the other missions and Christian workers of the Argentine.

The principal reason of my going was to get some dental work done. The dentists in these interior towns are rather primitive in their workmanship and also impose very heavy "war taxes" when it comes time to pay. The missionaries of the Argentine are fortunate in having an excellent dentist among them, who gives them special rates. Dr. Hotton is an Australian who has been in this country about fourteen years. He has not only been successful as a dentist but as well has a flourishing missoin in Zarate, about two hours' ride by train, between Buenos Aires and Rosario. I shall take oscasion to mention here that he would be glad for some Christian young man to come and assist him as a dentist, who would also help in the mission work. If any of our young men are looking toward the Argentine and are fitted for such a position, here is a unique opportunity. No foreigner can come to this country and begin work as a doctor or dentist without a diploma from the schools here, no matter how competent he may be. He can, however, work as the assistant of anyone holding a diploma, and then after being here a few years the probabilities of obtaining a diploma for himself are more favorable. The laws are very rigid with the purpose of excluding the foreigner and protecting the native students.

While away, I took advantage of the opportunity to visit a number of churches and missions in and near Buenos Aires and Rosario. I visited twelve different places of worship in all, besides the pleasure of meeting a good number of Christian workers. Also it was a special joy to meet and converse with some of the pioneer missionaries of the country. I will now mention the name of one, the venerable F. G. Penzotti, well known in South America as "Father Penzotti." A short time ago I read his autobiography which was an inspiration to me, but to meet him and know him was a genuine blessing. In a short letter I can not write about his life, but what is better, I can heartily recommend that those interested obtain a copy and read it. It is a booklet called, "Spiritual Victories in Latin America," published in 1916 by the American Bible Society, New York. It was translated from the Spanish by Miss Bertha Bell, who has the reputation of having been one of the best Christian workers in the Argentine. When reading of Mr. Penzotti's hardship, privation, imprisonment, of his consecration, faith and glorious victories, one is reminded of the life of the great Apostle to the Gentiles.

Also, I have just received a copy of "Christian Co-operation in Latin America," by Samuel Guy Inman, who has just completed an inspection tour of the religious activities of Latin America. This late report will prove most interesting and helpful to persons and mission study classes who want to know what is doing south of the Rio Grande. It is published by the Committee on Co-operation in Latin America, 25 Madison Avenue, New York.

I also visited Brother Atkinson in Cabrera. He reports the various activities of the work as progressing nicely. In Rio Cuarto there is nothing out of the ordinary to report. Our Sunday school ranges from sixty to eighty and the services are attended as well as usual.

SIAM AND MALAYSIA

Opium in Siam

There is an increasing need for anti-opium legislation in Siam—as is remarked by a Siamese writer in the White Elephant.

During the year 1916-17 the value of opium imported into Bangkok was Ticals 2,772,024—(a Tical is equivalent to 37 cents). The following letter by a Chinese appeared a short time ago in the Bangkok Times:

"Sir—In your leader of the 11th inst. you stated that after the war the opium question will be tackled. I need not refer to any length to the injury done by opium to the unfortunate Chinese, who are the principal consumers all the world over. I and many others will be very pleased and thankful to the local Government if females are not allowed on the smoking premises either as 'maids' or perhaps as embellishments to the already brilliant dens well illuminated with the numerous tiny opium lamps. In Singaport, the British Government is doing its utmost to close down shops that break the law.

"I hope the Siamese Government will frame a law for the earlier closing of the shops and forbidding of girls on the premises, as a preliminary to the abolition of opium smoking after the war."

Picturesque Definitions

A certain Siamese teacher is remembered by a former missionary chiefly because of his unique definitions of English words. Some of these are the follwoing:

Kick—A verb of the foot.
Hop—A verb of the frog.
Liar—A bad adjective for boy.
Flattery—A good kind of curse word.
Wig—Hypocrite hair.
Bullet—Son of a gun.
Whiskey—Sin water.

Laos Ready to Listen

The people of Northern Siam are expecting a Savior to come to them and are therefore all the more ready to listen to the missionary message.

When Dr. Claude W. Mason went on an exploring expedition to find a site for a residence at the new station of Chieng Rung, he pitched his tent under a tree reported by the natives to be the abode of an evil spirit. The fact that the spirit did not hurt the white man helped to dispel the fear which the people had of him. Dr. Mason says:

"We were especially guided here at the Governor's birthday, when princes from all over the provinces have come in to celebrate. Consequently we have reached people from every district of our new field. Many have called at the tent to see the wonderful sight of a white man who can talk their language.

Against the Law in Borneo

Many a worker on the mission field has had to remember the injunction to be "wise as serpents." Such a one was a certain Methodist missionary who had been engaged to teach English in a Chinese school in Borneo. His contract forbade his reading the Bible in the classroom. More than that he was told he could hold no religious service outside of school.

"What do you consider a religious service?" he asked a high government official.

"Standing up in a house or under any roof with an audience of ten or more people," he was told.

"Thank you," he said and departed.

That night he held a meeting. He gathered his band about him. Then he sat down on the floor.

For eighteen months he conducted services in this fashion, seated always on the floor with the Bible in his lap. At the end of that time, the government relented. Missionaries now stand up and preach anywhere.

Interest Among Javanese Moslems

Among the Moslems in Java there is reported to be an increased interest in the Gospel. A missionary in the town of Solo writes:

"Everywhere we find open doors. Last year we baptized 65 adults and children. This year the number up till now is 48. We have Communion services four times a year, and baptisms as a rule just before. That means that there will be two more occasions for baptism of adults this year.

"The trouble now is, that the cost of our station, because of its success, is rapidly increasing. Also, as there is an increasing need of Dutch schools for the Javanese, we are opening as quickly as possible a number of schools here, some for boarders, as the missionary influence in a boarding school is much more effective.

"Mohammedan propaganda is increasing here. Two Moslesm from British India came to us recently for a Malay-English New Testament, as they wanted to learn the Malay language. They were acquainted with Bible stories and told me that they did not consider the people here Mohammedans."

Ohio's New Officers

At the Fremont Conference it was found necessary to make a change in Christian Endeavor officers for Ohio. The committee on nominations recommended the election of Dyoll Belote as State Secretary, E. A. Rowsey, Life Work superintendent. and Roy A.

Patterson, Quiet Hour superintendent. The last named is the efficient president of the Dayton society and we regret our inability to present his likeness at this time. Brother Rowsey serves the Mansfield church while pursuing theological studies in the College. He is enlisting the services of his local young people and is eagerly ready to render the young people of the State a like ministry, as his initial message in another column indicates. The Christian Endeavor record of Brother Belote has been well known to those conversant with his pastoral activities. His associates in Canton and Starke county have duly recognized his interest and ability. During the winter he conducted union classes in Expert Endeavor. Recently he was promoted from the position of pastoral counsellor to the office of president in the County Union. We anticipate the pleasure of meeting all these new officers at Newark, and hope that every Ohio society will make an effort to send at least one delegate to greet them.

J. A. GARBER.

"Ohio and Life Work Recruits"

Every young man and woman today is keenly conscious of the all important fact that this is a day of "Recruits." A great host of our Christian young men have left the Christian Endeavor societies, responding to the call of our country and are placing themselves on humanity's altar. Their consecration and their courage challenge the Endeavorers all over this great state. While they are freely giving, yes enthusiastically giving their life's blood to make the world safe for Democracy, those of us who are left at home must realize that we have a task equally as great, namely, To make Democracy safe for the world. Walter S. Athearn presented the truth in a very unique manner when he said, "The present world war will have been waged in vain if it hands Democracy over to any ignorant and Godless people. The world will never be safe for Democracy until intelligence and Godliness are the common possessions of the whole human race."

The purpose of this article is to burn upon the hearts of our Endeavorers who are still at work in their societies the fact that our task is growing bigger. Some one must take the place of the hero who is no longer present in body. Some day he will return to his society with the words on his lips, "Victory for our country and Old Glory." Will he find us asleep on the job? No. he will find us in the heart of a great battle. We will give him a warm welcome and respond, "Victory for our king—Jesus Christ." If you add these two elements together you will have a democracy for the world also a safe world for democracy. Any "quack" can cry out, "We are at war." But the man who really reads the signs of the times and seeks to link himself with some plan of reconstruction is the man the world needs today.

The Four-Year Challenge of the Brethren Christian Endeavor Union asks the societies of Ohio for "Twenty Life Work Recruits." Under the present conditions that number should be increased to forty. Surely we will not be satisfied with twenty. A logical question to ask is, how can we reach this number? I will tell you how it can be done. Send your prospective "Life Work Recruits to the State Chrsitian Endeavor Convention, which will be held at Newark June 25-28. This is the thirty-third annual encampment of the Ohio Christian Endeavor. Newark is located almost at the center of the state and is easily accessible from everywhere. The main lines of the Pennsylvania and Baltimore & Ohio systems go through Newark. You can come from most any part of the state on the Interurban.

You will find at Newark many inviting and happy surprises. It is a locality of great historic and pre-historic interest. It was the home of a primitive man in prehistoric times, the race of people designated as Mound Builders, and their celebrated earthworks at Newark are a wonder to students of archaeology. The people are wide awake along the line of education. Newark was the first city in all Ohio to establish public high school. I mention these facts to create within you a desire to take advantage of a golden opportunity.

The entertainment committee says, "It is with great anticipation that we are looking forward to the opportunity of entertaining the Endeavorers of the State. All Newark offers a royal welcome to you. Surely we will not disappoint such a people, and such a welcome as Newark offers to us.

Attend the Convention and you will return home with an overflow of inspiration. Your enthusiasm and consecration will fire your society with greater ideals. The members will see your attitude toward the work and they will be willing and anxious to render some sacrificial service. When you leave the Convention you will say. It was good for me to have been there.

Hoping to see a large delegation from each society at Newark, I remain yours for the Master's service.

A Typical Mountain Community

The following article taken from the "Soul Winner" will help the friends of our Kentucky mountain mission work to appreciate the need among the hills that tower almost within sight of our comfortable homes and almost unboundless Christian privileges. Read it carefully and then pay your pledge for Kentucky misison work if you have not done so and if you did not give a pledge send us a gift for the work anyhow as it is greatly needed now. For the first time this year we can see the bottom of the treasury barrel.

Every Endeavor society in the Brotherhood ought to have a part in this work. Have you helped this year? If not, do it now. Many personal gifts are needed each year. Have you helped this year? If not, please act at once.

A Prophet's Chamber

Two miles east of Bridgeport, Tenn., on the Southern Railway where the French Broad bends deep into the mountains, is the little flag station called West Myers. About twenty souls live in this place. There are just two ways to get into or out of this community. You either have to flag a local train or walk. High cliffs of rocks jut closely to the railroad above and below the station, and with the river in front and the mountains in the rear, this is truly a "shut-in" community.

Here in an unusualy large house live an old couple who never fail to warmly welcome those who are connected with the Ebenezer Mission, which is "just over the top." In this home the pastor is usually entertained each month. After supper Sunday evening the neighbors are invited in and we have a little service. With the excetpion of this couple I do not think there is another Christian in the whole community. The last time we stopped there it was very rainy, but there were ten at the service. Five of them expressed a desire to live a better life.

One other of the audience was a little girl between eleven and twelve years old who has never been to school in her life. Some others about as old are in the first grade, having been to school only a few days. This is only three miles from the Ebenezer Home, yet they can not go there to school. Miles differ in different localities. The first two of these are spent in reaching the top of the hill and the other in descending to the school. I cannot better tell you how steep it is than to give you the expression of the writer's wife as we were climbing that hill a few years ago on our "wedding tour." When about half way to the top she stopped, "to look at the scenery," and said, "my feet just refuse to get in front of each other."

We are expecting right soon to paper some rooms at the Home, repair the building and be ready to take some of those children into the home when school begins again about the middle of the summer. Will you not see that a few extra dollars are put into the Home Mission Fund in Atlanta that our Superintendent may be able to write us a check for this work, which he expects to do.

What Made the Blue Jay Blue

BY ABIGAIL BURTON

Jemima Jay sat in a gooseberry thicket, watching the goldfinches play tag in the sunlight. Her feathers were all ruffled, she was scowling dreadfully, quite as if she had a headache. She had no headache, of course,—Jemima Jay never had a headache,—and there was nothing the matter but jealousy.

You see, Jemima Jay had always wanted to be beautiful. She admired a gay coat more than anything else. No one had ever told her that fine feathers do not make fine birds. I am afraid she would not have believed it, anyway, for she felt that she should be perfectly happy if she could dress in bright colors.

Now, you must know that in those days Jemima wore a sober costume of pale brown, without any trimmings. Against the background of a tree she hardly showed, and when she alighted on the ground, unless you looked twice, you really would not know she was there. And Jemima longed to make a sensation. She dreamed of flitting, a scarlet streak, from branch to branch, like the tanager, or of bringing the sky down to earth, like the bluebird. So Jemima Jay was not at all pleased with her appearance.

She might have been very happy if only she had been a little wiser. Her voice was naturally sweet, and all the birds love a fine singer. If she had been able to trill and to warble, no one would have noticed how she was dressed; but she would not learn that lesson of the thrushes and the song sparrow. She would not study and she would not practice, and all that the wood people knew her by was her frown.

So Jemima crouched out of sight among the wild gooseberries and frowned at the gay little goldfinches; and she ruffled her feathers, until the ruffle stuck up on her head as if it had intended to stay there, always, as indeed it did. But all her ruffling and all her frowning did not change the color of her dress.

The goldfinches flitted back and forth over a tiny pool. The water caught the glint of their golden wings and, reflecting it, made the scene twice as gay. Suddenly Jemima began talking aloud and scolding. Angry as she was her voice was sweet, and the goldfinches stopped their play to listen. But the minute they came near enough to hear what Jemima was saying, they were so shocked that they flew away in a hurry; for her words matched her scowl.

Jemima scrambled out of the thicket, scolding worse than ever. She went so fast that she was within an inch of plunging headfirst into the pool. The water was a wonderful deep blue, for, you see, it was full of sky. And there were flecks of white in it caught from the clouds. A moment before it had been shot with gold from the goldfinches. If the pool could change its own color like that, thought Jemima, why could it not change hers?

The next minute Jemima Jay was wading into the water. It was very cold. She could almost feel hreself turning blue! She closed her eyes and holding back her head went in deeper, until only her bill was above the water. And there she stayed, until she was so stiff that she knew she must go out at once, if she were going at all. Besides, she felt blue.

And she was! Her feathers had turned the color of the sky, and were flecked with white, as the sky is sometimes flecked with white clouds. And the ruffle on her head made a fine crest. Only her bill had not turned blue, because she had kept it out of the water, nor her feet, because they had been sunk in the mud.

But do you think Jemima Jay was satisfied? Not at all! Why had she not stepped into the pool when it was shining with the goldfinches? It would have been much grander, she thought, to have dashes of gold over her dress. More than that, she had caught a terrible cold. When she tried to speak, she found that her lovely voice was gone, and the only noise she could make was a harsh scream. The other birds would have admired her, no doubt, had not her harsh tones frightenem them away. She was frightened herself—so badly that every time she spoke she jumped nearly out of her newly-dyed feathers!

Now, Jemima Jay never got over the cold she caught in the pool, and she was not any happier in her beautiful blue coat than she had been in her sober costume of plain brown, for it is no fun to be afraid of your own voice.—Youth's Companion.

News From the Field

To The Members of The National Ministerial Association of The Brethren Church:

Three times, in earlier years we have been called upon for three assessments, to met the death claims, caused by the departure of members, and twice, a fourth claim was paid from the sum which had accumulated from previous calls. This year, for the first time; we are called upon to meet the expense of a fifth claim due to the death of Elder Strother Hansel, who passed away at his home near Garber, Iowa, on May 6. Your secretary issued a call for assessment Number 23, on May 16, which is due on June 16. Inquiry has been made as to the legality of the call, upon the presumption that no more than three calls could be made in any one year. A glance at the copy of the constitution which you hold, will convince you that such is not the case. In reality, a call must be issued upon the announcement of every death which takes place in our ranks. The first time we were called upon to meet a fourth claim, your secretary was completely tied up on account of the great flood in Dayton and it was not possible to get out the call. He consulted the president, Brother Knepper, and secured his consent to pay the claim, and submit the matter to the Association, at its next meeting. At that meeting, the secreary explained the case, and asked for instruction to pay any fourth claim from the funds on hand and consent was given. Such a rule can only be in force so long as our membership is sufficiently strong, to furnish the funds. At this writing, but four days remain of the time allowed for the payment of assessments, and more than one-third of our members have not reported. Are you dear reader, among them? It is true that we have considerable funds on hand, and the amount is increasing, and your secretary will submit a proposition to the Association, at its next meeting, as follows:—Let us keep our funds until the amount reaches at least $5,000, by which time it is believed The Old People's and Children's Home can become a reality, and then use our funds in the building of a home for our aged ministers and their wives. This would be in perfect keeping with the spirit of our organization, and give us an objective toward which to strive. In the meantime do not forget assessment 23, do not make it necessary for your secretary to remind you further.

Faithfully, Your Sec-Treas.,

Masontown, Pa. MARTIN SHIVELY.

Bible Conference

The program for the Southern California Bible Conference is about ready for the press. The strength of the work can be estimated by knowing the men who are to have a place in the meeting. President Furry of Ashland, Ohio, Professor P. B. Fitzwater of the Moody Bible Institute, Chicago, Elder Roger Darling and Evangelist N. W. Jennings are the men from outside our own district who will give a number of addresess.

Our own pastors are considered to be splendid teachers and preachers and that by many in their own country and they shall have a place on the program.

The meeting will last ten days, July 19-28. The large, comfortable church at Long Beach will be the place of meeting. The fine equipment of the kitchen department will be placed at the disposal of the visitors under certain rules and regulations, and in every way possible the expense of the stay at the beach will be made reasonable.

Requests for programs will be given attention just as soon as they are ready. All other information regarding this meeting will be gladly furnished if you address,

A Word from Gratis, Ohio

Last fall when our dear Brother G. H. Jones left us, the church gave an unanimous call to Brother C. E. Beekley of Cerro Gordo, Illinois. He came to us in due time, but was only allowed to preach a few sermons when he became very ill with heart trouble. The prayers of all were made in his behalf for we felt he was the right man in the right place. Thanks be to God for he regained strength and again took up the work during the month of March. He has been able to guide our ship since that time and has been an able and devoted leader.

Our church followed the advice of the Four-Year Program Committee in taking up the Budget System for the year's work which has been done very satisfactorily by the Finance Committee.

Our Communion services were held Sunday evening June second. We had a good attendance and a very pleasant and inspiring meeting.

Our Sunday school is very progressive. Just at present we are having a hundred percent class campaign. This increases the attendance and creates much interest.

Last Sunday when our service flag was dedicated Brother Beekley gave a splendid address in honor of those boys who have answered their country's call.

Other special sermons have been on Lincoln's Birthday, Easter, Life of Edith Cavill, Mother's Day, Memorial Day and Brethren's Day.

May God continue his blessings upon us.

DOROTHY FUDGE.

Lanark, Illinois

It must be very difficult for the editor to write church news when the churches fail to report. Perhaps there is reason for the dearth. No sooner does the evangelistic season close than the busy pastor who might also have been a revivalist finds that he is flooded with a series of special days in the calendar year. I am sure that the ordinary congregation often does not realize the activities of a pastor. Pardon a personal reference which no doubt can be duplicated by many.

The Four-Year Program

I have the joys and pleasures of being the District Goal Director. How many will arise and testify the unbounded joy of trying to get statistics from . . . certain kinds, of pastors and congregations and then compiling them for the national goal man. Let us hope however, fellow laborers, that it is working a far more exceeding weight of glory than we know. The Program is proving a great eye opener and many must see that it can't be obtained by fit and spasm but by system and bulldog tenacity. To my mind it is a good thing that some of the goals have not been reached as yet. But it is a worthy standard and 1920 may be a year of Jubilee.

The Sunday School

In this Department I serve as a national officer, district and county, as well as teacher and chorister in my own local school. We made a gain of 27% in average attendance the past year and three years ago the school's total enrollment was not more than half the membership of the church, now it is equal to the resident and non-resident or total membership of the church.

Special Days

These have all been observed, among them being Mothers' Day that never loses its sacredness nor value, although this year we had to conserve on the usual floral tribute.

The Woman's Day service but recently held was a credit to the women not only as a program for the evening but it reflected very creditably upon the work of the year and the attainment of national goals. A very substantial offering was received for the Theological Chair at Ashland.

Patriotic Meeting

One of the great meetings held was the unveiling of a service flag that now has upon it fourteen stars in honor of the boys in service. We feel that this is a very small part compared to what the boys are doing for us and we gladly show them this honor and respect and assure them they are missed but not forgotten while at the front.

The writer also has been called as speaker in four patriotic mass meetings and we were glad to do our bit and best.

Communion Services

It has been the custom for Milledgeville and Lanark to unite twice a year in these services. However at both places on the appointed evening rain prevented this fellowship but we have more than reached the goal in number of communicants.

I have been realy surprised that contributions to the different benevolences have been as uniform as in former years. With Red Cross drives and Liberty Bonds and Thrift and War Saving stamps to gather up even the pennies of the school children and the dollars of the adults yet we believe none will suffer and it may teach some to be far more generous than before.

The New Building

We have been censured quite severely without and within for attempting to build at this time. But we have learned by past and bitter experience that there is a time that opportunity knocks at the door and if not admitted passes on even sometimes never to return. I don't believe a church can prepare for years for such an event and then at the supreme moment wait for an indefinite time as "until the war is over" and not miss many a fine opportunity, besides she can't stand still and is mort apt to go backward than forward. Then there has never been a time when we needed to buy up every opportunity as just now and the home base made strong for what is surely coming to this and the church in general in the days not far distant.

What We Are Doing

We are building to our already commodious church building a modern Sunday school auditorium on the Akron plan. We have torn down three rooms used for the Sunday school, but were in reality just the baptistry and robing rooms and will extend the building thirty-two feet by forty in width, making an auditorium that will seat between 800 and 1,000 people, being the only building in the town that seats more than half that number. The church will be reversed in its seating so that the new addition becomes a part of the main auditorium by rolling doors. In the new part proper, will be flexible doors separating it into individual class rooms both below and in the balcony. The basement will be finished with room for a kitchen, dining room and rest rooms. This will incur an expense of more than the original building cost but that of course is true because of materials' advanced price.

We claim justification for one reason only and that is for Sunday school work. We are growing and have no doubt if we prepare we shall continue to grow.

Haggai 2: 4-7 is to be remembered: "Be Strong all ye people and work for I am with you and I will fill this house with glory saith the Lord."

FIRST BRETHREN CHURCH

Los Angeles, California

With our pastor, Brother Reagan, back with us again we are all encouraged and every one seems to be resolved to help put in a good year's work.

Last Sunday morning at the close of the preaching service we had the pleasure of seeing one of our Sunday school pupils come forward for baptism and the ordinance was administered at once. It is one of the finest boys belonging to our Junior Department. This is one of the results of the good work of the officers and teachers of that department.

Next Sunday morning under the leadership of four of our young women there will be given the Children's Day Program which promises to be one of the best we have ever had. It will be largely missionary in character and an offering will be taken for district missions.

As this program is to be given at the preaching hour, Brother Reagan has arranged to go with the Billy Sunday Chorus to San Pedro to preach to the soldiers at Fort MacArthur next Sunday morning. This chorus is regularly organized and is doing some good work singing for the glory of Jesus and in an effort to help in the conversion of souls. That Brother Reagan should be selected for so important a work as this is a fine recognition of his ability as a gospel preacher. We feel that of all the things that are being done for the boys "with the colors" nothing is mort important than giving them a chance to hear the gospel message from some of our best preachers. May our Father in Heaven bless every one of these addresses and may they reach the hearts and the wills of the soldier boys.

General Conference, Winona Lake, August 26 to September 2

Fearing that some unfortunate development incident to war-times might make it more difficult, if not impossible, to hold General Conference this year, we have withheld announcement until now. And, while watchfully waiting, some persons, for patriotic reasons, have questioned the wisdom of holding such a meeting after the plan of former years. Most of the churches, however, have held, or are planning to hold, their conferences without the slightest retrenchment. Practically all the religious conventions are being held. Winona has announced her varied program with some extras. Judging the multiplied governmental appeals addressed to the people through the ministry of the church, it behooves her not only to keep intact her present work but to prepare for a larger service. It is incumbent upon her to nourish the spiritual morale and strengthen the moral sinews of the nation. Much more! Through her ministry of religious instruction and training in the Sunday school and Christian Endeavor society, she will develop among the nation's children and young people a future citizenry of intelligent Christian men and women into whose hands the coveted prvileges and responsibilities of a costly democracy may be placed with reasonable safety. The church must prevent a shortage of righteousness, a dearth of spirituality, a famine of Christion leadership.

Gripped with convictions like these, we are seeking to prepare a program that will in some measure meet the requirements of the hour. Once it has been reviewed by the members of the Executive Committee it will be given publicity in these columns. Meanwhile let the churches pray for a conference that will equip us for this momentous day in the world's history. Let them plan to send key-workers—men and women engaged in his business and on business for the King. Certainly no one can afford to indulge the exepnse of attending conference this year for merely a good time. Moreover let our brethren who are thinking about the stupendous tasks which await the church write some thought-provoking articles for the Evangelist. Use it as a medium of communication for promoting like-mindedness.

J. A. GARBER.

A Sketch and an Appreciation

Elder John A. Myers was born in Augusta County, Virginia, November 7, 1850, died at his home near Williamsburg, Iowa, June 10th, 1918, aged 67 years, 7 months and 3 days.

On May 27th, 1880, he was united in marriage to Anna V. Stoner, of Westminster, Maryland, and thus together they faced and solved the problems of life for over 38 years. To this union were born four sons and three daughters.

Brother Myers came to Iowa when a mere child and lived practically his whole life in the one locality, on the Myers' homestead,—the home of his parents—then his own home.

Besides his farm work, Brother Myers preached for over 37 years and was pastor of the home congregation from the time of its organization to the close of his life.

In early life Brother Myers united with the church of the Brethren.

In the fall of 1880 J. H. Swihart held a meeting near Millersburg—and organized a Congregational Brethren church on November 8th of that year.

Brother Myers was one of the 16 charter members. He was installed as pastor the same day and served as pastor and elder (save a short time) from the inception of the work to the close of his life. Later on the church here became a part of the Brethren church.

So he was the founder and pastor of the first Brethren church organized in Iowa, as well as the first minister to expound the teachings and doctrines of the Brethren church in the state. Thus he saw the work grow from a nucleus of 16 members to its present proportions in the state.

He was elder, pastor, counsellor to the church all these years, of a mild disposition, patient in tribulation, longsuffering and lenient with his fellowmen and co-workers, a man of firm covictions, deep faith, and true to the church.

He loved his church and people and was willing to spend and be spent for the cause he loved. He was a regular attendant at our conferences, both district and national, an active participant in conference activities, a liberal giver to all worthy causes, and a member of the Foreign Missionary Society and the Ministerial Association.

The spirit of hospitality characterized his home, and his Brethren in the ministry and others always received a welcome, and the fatherless here found a haven sharing the home and home blessings with his own.

His interest and trust in his family was strong and he was not alone father, but counsellor and companion to his children.

When Stella left last December to go to Africa as a missionary, he, knowing conditions were such that they would no more meat on earth, was reconciled to her going, and words of admonition, prayer in the family circle, the breathing of a benediction and God's blessing on her marked the parting hours.

When Ernest left last May for one of the camps, he was reconciled to his going and expressed confidence in him, that the life teachings given had not been in vain.

His desire was that his children should live lives of usefulness to their fellowmen. He showed this by giving a daughter as a missionary to Africa, another daughter to teach several years in our work at Lost Creek, and a son to the service of his country, in all showing the spirit of the Christian and the Christian citizen.

Elder John A. Myers—his life's work is done. The church has lost a worthy pastor and advisor. The community a respected citizen and neighbor, the home a loving husband and a kind father.

He needs no monument—the Pleasant Grove Brethren church, his sons and daughters, his work in the community and the church at large are his monument.

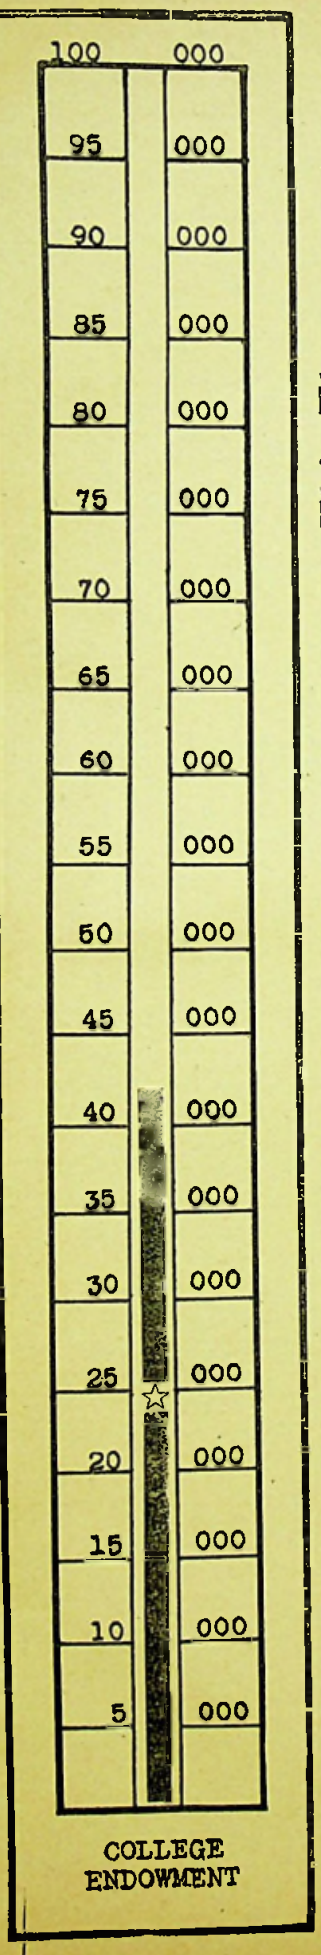
He leaves to mourn his departure his wife 3 sons and 3 daughters, two grandchildren and a host of relatives and friends.

We feel a prince of Israel is fallen, but our loss is his eternal gain.

Funeral services were held at the Pelasant Grove Brethren church by the writer, assisted by Rev. Miller of the church of the Brethren. Revs. Cole and Lambert of the Methodist church. Revs. Kaufman and Brower of the church of the Brethren also were present.

We used as a theme the subject, "A life well spent," As a text II Tim 4, 6, 7-8.

The body was laid to rest in the North English cemetery with the assurance of the blessed hope that when Christ cometh he will claim his own.



May the peace of God assuage the grief of the stricken family and our faith in a glorious hereafter not be lessened, each so living that all is well.

CAMPAIGN NOTES

Our church at Conmaugh has in its membership very few retired people. Indeed, practically the entire membership is composed of laboring people—men who are engaged in the various departments of railroad work. And now I am able to report that our canvass in this congregation has been completed, and with the completion of this canvass a new standard has been set. I might have said "standards" instead of standard. For not only has the Conemaugh church as such set a new standard, but two of her organizations have also set new standards. Of this I shall speak later in the report.

Brother L. Garvin Smith is the pastor of the Conemaugh church. He assumed charge of this work last fall. And the results thus far attained in his pastorate here indicate that Smith and Conemaugh make a real team. When this pastor and congregation set about to do a thing nothing can stop them. Last Christmas Smith and Conemaugh conceived the idea that it would be worth while to lead all of the Sunday schools in the brotherhood in their White Gift offering. This they accomplished. Later it was decided to place the Evangelist in all of the homes of the Conemaugh church, and that was put across too. So that, whereas there were only twenty Evangelists coming to Conemaugh before the budget system was put into effect, there are now one hundred and forty coming here; and this puts Conemaugh high up in the list of the congregations taking the greatest number of papers.

And so, having achieved two splendid goals in six months Smith and Conemaugh found themselves again thirsty for conquest. And they decided when it came to the matter of raising Permanent Endowment that they would see just how it would feel to lead all of the churches thus far canvassed. And now Conemaugh knows just how it feels; for she has planted her banner $1,000 higher than any church up to this time. As for the feeling of pastor and people over this superb achievement, it is not necessary to ask; because "delighted" is the word written plainly on every Conemaugh Brethren face. And well may it be so for a royal record has been made.

The Conemaugh church went $5,100—to be exact she went $5,133.50. And we considered that we would not be accused of partiality if we ran with this report the cut of the first church to reach that mark. Hence there appears the picture of the splendid edifice which was dedicated by our Conemaugh people some three years ago. Nor do I doubt the perfect willingness of our Editor to run the cuts of others churches just as fast as they reach $5,000 or more. Now then, what church will be the next to have its picture appear?

No doubt our readers will be interested to know how the gifts ran in a result like this. I might say first, we got a great deal of cash and a fine lot of Liberty Loans. And the women of our denomination ought to be proud to learn that the biggest note received here was that assumed by the Dorcas Circle for $1,000. These brave women assumed this obligation without blinking an eye. They are used to doing big things for the church. And it does not frighten them in the least to think of raising and giving money in big sums. This same organization has each year for six years raised $1,000 for the new church. And to pay off a note for $1,000 to the College in five annual installments will be just play for them. I already have the assurance that this will be paid and forgotten long before the five years roll around. And thus, talking about standards, here is a fine, new standard set for the rest of the women's organizations of our church. And I just dare any of the Societies of our churches not yet canvassed to go beyond that mark ??? The Sunday school also did nobly by gviing a note for $500. This gift is just one hundred per cent higher than any Sunday school has given up to this time. And here again we have a sew standard set for our Sunday schools. What school will be the next to get into the $500 class?

Our biggest individual gift here was $500. This means more company for those who have heretofore enlisted at that figure. The next in size was $300. We had one such gift. We also had a gift for $200. Half of this was for the parents and the other half was given for their children. The people in this home were tithers. It is a joy to canvass tithers for invariably tithers are willing to enlist in any good work which pertains to God's cause. They always have money. We also had a great array of $100 gifts and many for $50, and from that on down, or up, as the case may be.

There were several gifts out of the ordinary at this place. For example one man gave me a check for $100 who is not connected in any way with the Brethren church. However, he believes in the Brethren and in the people who make up the Brethren congregation at Conemaugh. And he believes in it in that practical way which very materially helps the cause of College endowment. I really ought to carry that man's photograph with me and when I meet a "weak kneed" Brethren who is blessed with the things of this world but who is stingy and who is just a Brethren as long as it don't cost anything, I ought to show him that man's picture. I believe it would help some. Another man who is not a member of the church (his wife is) gave me a $50 Liberty Loan. That man looked good to me too. And a third man, a Greek Catholic gave me a check for $25.00. In the face of gifts like these it surely must take a lot of nerve for a man who has means and who claims to be a "really Brethren" to say no in the great work of permanently endowing our only College.

In closing I want to say that this canvass was a pleasure. We were received on every hand in the most kindly manner. And as for the result of the campaign here practically no credit is due me. It belongs to Brother Smith and his loyal people. Before I arrived at Conemaugh, I may say long before, the pastor had made a careful preparation of the soil and he had also sowed the seed. And when I arrived on the scene things were ready for the sickle. Needless to say, getting the Evangelist into the homes of his people was a big factor in the preparation for the campaign. Moreover, in addition to keeping the campaign before the minds of his people, the pastor also dared in a frank, courageous way to challenge his people to enlist in this great work. Consequently when the Secretary arrived the people were ready. And almost day and night for nearly a week I "tried" to follow Smith. Smith did most of the "chin work" and I wrote the notes. And the Conemaugh people have once more maintained their good name for generosity and Brethren loyalty. And again I freely admit that little credit belongs to me. But to God let us give the glory!

There is more I might say but my report is already very long. It perhaps ought to be said that Conemaugh still owes three thousand dollars on their edifice; but rarely did I hear that used as an excuse for not giving to Permanent Endowment. Indeed throughout the entire canvass hard luck stories were rarely heard. From start to finish the canvass was characterized by magnificent response. Space will not allow me to mention the names of the good folks who entertained us in their homes. But if anybody wants to know about the "cooks" at Conemaugh just ask me. I lodged with Brother Smith in the parsonage. May God richly bless Conemaugh church and her people! And if I ever have to go back to Conemaugh to make another canvass I want Smith there to help.

WM. H. BEACHLER,
Campaign Secretary.

Marriages

FLORA-CRESS—Oscar M. Flora of Miami County, near Peru and a member of the church at Center Chapel, and Hazel F. Cress of Twelve Mile were united in marriage at the home of the writer, Monday evening, March 25, 1918. They soon left for Wyoming, planning there to make their future home. They have the best wishes of a host of friends for a long, happy and prosperous wedded life. May Gods blessings attend their way through life.

Pastor ROY BRUMBAUGH,
Roann, Indiana.

REIGHARD-GOOD—At the parsonage of the Conemaugh Brethren Church, on the evening of March 30th, was solemnized the marriage of Mr. Robert W. Reichard and Miss Ethel Verne Good by L. Garvin Smith, pastor of the Conemaugh Brethren church.

NOON-CUSTER—At the Conemaugh Brethren church, on the evening of April 27th, was solemnized the marriage of Mr. Byron R. Noon and Miss Ona B. Custer by L. Garvin Smith, pastor of the Conemaugh Brethren church.

YEAGER-McCREARY — At the Brethren parsonage, on the evening of April 30th, was solemnized the marriage of Mr. Samuel E. Yeager, Jr., and Miss Ethel McCreary by L. Garvin Smith, pastor of the Conemaugh Brethren church.

These most estimable young people have the best wishes of a host of friends for a happy and successful married life.

LEITSCH—-LINSLEY—On May 18, 1918, Sister Nellie M. Linsley, of Carleton, Nebraska, and Carroll N. Leitsch, of Camp Funston, Kansas, were united in marriage at Carleton by the writer. Miss Linsley was one of our loyal C. E. workers and Mr. Leitsch is a fine young man in the service of Uncle Sam.

Z. T. LIIVINGOOD.

EMMERT-ROW—At the First Brethren church, Dallas Center, Iowa, on Thursday evening, May 23, 1918, Mr. Ray Alvin Emmert and Miss Bertha May Row were united in marriage by the pastor of the church.

These young people are both members of the Brethren church and have been very active in the work of the Kingdom of God. The church and their many friends wish them heaven's choicest blessings as they journey through life together.

R. F. PORTE.

ESSIG-JONES—On May twenty-fourth, at the home of the bride's mother, Mrs. Evan D. Jones, occurred the marriage of Mr. Carl F. Essig and Miss Katherine Jones. The occasion which made these two young lives one was officiated at by the undersigned, pastor of the bride, the shorter ring service being used. The best wishes of their friends go with these young people on life's journey, and may the Holy Spirit lead them to his glory here and to their eternal salvation hereafter.

DYOLL BELOTE.

HUTZEL-MOATS—On March the 9th, 1918, Edward L. Hutzel and Myrtle Moats were united in marriage by the writer at the parsonage at St. James, Maryland.

ROWLAND-SPRECKER—At the parsonage, St. James, Maryland, on May 15, 1918, Admiral Dewey Rowland and Minnie Alice Sprecker were united in marriage. Ceremony by the writer.

The Church and the Changing World Order

The days in which we live make history rapidly. A generation now is longer than a century was at the opening of the Christian era. And the activity of an ordinary human life may accomplish more now than a millenium could have wrought in the days of Abraham. Events occur with an amazing rapidity and of an order hitherto undreamed of. Long historic processes are culminating now and the consumations are easily discerned. This brings me to the first main fact which I should like to stress.

The Present a Changing Order

The present world order is a changing world order. So I believe the New Testament clearly teaches. It is not fixed, permanent and of the highest quality. It is ever in a flux, an ebb and a flow, betraying itself as transient and impotent in its efforts to recover. It is withal a striving and an achieving. It may appear as stagnant and dead. And suddenly it may as now hurl the mass of humanity into a titanic cataclysmic upheaval. But the fact stressed is that we are just now tied up with a changing, dying world-order. And this brings me to suggest that already a

New Order Is Upon Us

This needs no demonstration to a thinking man. The world in which we now live and seek to fulfil our destiny is not the world of 1914. It is not my province to point out here the cause of this great change. Neither am I concerned to indicate all the changed conditions and relations in the world. What changes have taken place that affect the work of the ministry and of the church in the world? This is a pertinent question. And it is a few of the changed conditions as they relate the world to the work of the church that I next wish to refer. The new order is upon us. The church must still be at work. Will the church be wise enough to adjust herself to the call of the day? Will the church have an evangel for the times and a power that will compel attention? Will her ministry be bold and strong and virile with a challenge that will command respect? Will the Christian life and conduct of men and women who profess to know Jesus Christ and follow him hold the confidence and respect of men and women? These certainly are vital problems.

Factors to be Taken Account of

In the changed world-order it seems to me that the church must take serious account of the following factors:

1. Ideals have changed. Slowly but surely it seems to me the ideal of the church has changed. Personally I have for a long time had a struggle to see the New Testament Ideal of the church realized in our so-called modern churchlife and organization. I have frequently called attention to the most glaring discrepancies between the modern ideals cherished by nominal Christianity and the Apostolic type as revealed in the New Testament. Today men are confessing that the church has not been wholly Christian. The BRETHREN CHURCH will do well to copy so closely after the twentieth century conceptions of the church in the midst of a dying order. Better study the first century type as revealed in the New Testament. ideal of Christ and Paul, of Peter and John. It will be preeminently safe to do this both in respect to personal life and experience on the one hand and as to doctrine and polity on the other.

2. Values have changed. We are coming to see that the estimate we have placed upon material things has been altogether out of proportion to the true value. It is not perhaps that we should now value less the wonderful material gifts of God's world but that we should learn to place the proper value upon the spiritual. It is the moral that is the enduring and gives all else worth. The members of the church have been most guilty in valuing their possessions too highly and with that too selfishly. So there was scarcely an interest committed to the church, as for example foreign and home missions, that did not go begging for lack of support. Much of the work which the church undertook was but illy done and oftimes church finances brought discredit and disgrace. Stewardship was forgotten and ownership of God's own was brazenly claimed by hosts of the unregenerate members of the church. The wealth of the civilized nations was in the hands of professed Christians and yet the interests of the kingdom of God committed to the church were stingily administered. But men have experienced a change. They now give of themselves and of wealth as never before. If the BRETHREN CHURCH IS WISE she will preach stewardship and giving as never before. Men will hear and respond. Evidences are abundant that this is true.

3. The mental temper has changed. Let me make clear what I mean. Men's thoughts are undergoing change. Life is becoming serious to thousands who never before gave a serious thought to it. Does life have any meaning? Does the world have a meaning? Is there anything a man should do? Does it make any difference what a man does? And how he does it? Does it matter how a man lives? These and a thousand other questions press upon the minds of men today. And what is more men not only ask these questions but they seek to find an answer. Without going into any further detail let it be said that men not only think seriously now upon the greatest things and issues of life but they seek help and enlightenment upon them. What institution in all the world should be able to supply all that serious men seek if not the church? To her God committed the eternal gospel of his Son. And who if not the minister ought to be able to help by counsel and instruction every man coming to him? If the BRETHREN CHURCH is eager to meet her opportunity in every community where she is established she must be fully prepared to supply what men now seek. It will take more than sentiment and a good time. It will take the real living bread from heaven to feed the hungry souls of men. Ah, brother preacher and pastor, what a day for you. If you have the spirit and the genius and the soul-satisfying message of the gospel how you may save men now! If you can not do this, then —how indescribably sad and fruitless must your ministry be.

And Yet——

With all the change our world-order has undergone there remains at least one aspect,—(I believe there are more!) in which it is the same old world. Let us not deceive ourselves. Sin is still here. The fact is according to the New Testament the present world-order, however much it may change, is under the power of the evil. Men are sinners and have need of a savior as much as ever they did. All of the machinations of evil seem set loose in the world war now raging. Let there be no hiding of the fact that sin is yet sin; that men must repent and be born again; that salvation is the gift of God and not the earned reward of human achievement. If all this is so then there ought to be no hesitancy in preaching and teaching the WHOLE GOSPEL. It ought to be preached with a conviction and an authority that will compel the attention of men.

The Church

In every community the church must become the refuge for

From the Editor's View-Point

Solomon's Request

Since we were small boys going to Sunday school we have had drilled into our very beings the great lesson to be learned from Solomon's choice when he came to the throne of Israel. That he did not choose riches, honor or glory, but wisdom and knowledge that he might go in and out among his people and judge them righteously has always been regarded as one of his greatest virtues. And though he had many lapses in his personal life, yet the one thing that always seemed to get him back on the right track was the wisdom God had given him at his own request early in life. The destiny of his people depended very largely upon his exercise of this divinely given wisdom, and it is very evident that apart from this help his rule as king would have been a pronounced failure instead of one of such success that his fame spread to the ends of the earth and brought rulers of other countries, as the Queen of Sheba, to visit Jerusalem to behold the glory that had not half been told.

It may seem a far-fetched comparison but just now there seems to be coming to America in a very much larger degree some of the responsibilities that came to Solomon as he ascended the throne of Israel.

A gentleman of note has said, "On Americans and America's conduct after the war, I verily believe the destiny of civilization for the next century will hang." If this saying is based upon facts and real conditions, then a responsibility is coming to America that has never before been the lot of any modern nation. The question of real importance is: Are the American people equal to the task? For a number of years we have been a rather self-satisfied people and have felt that we are almost in a class by ourselves. We have really felt just a little better than the people of any other country. We do not forget how a famous United States senator declared in a speech in the Senate about twenty years ago that "It would take four worlds like this to whip America." We know better than that now are in a little more humble state of mind, but we are not yet in either a position or in a condition to say to the rest of the world, Do just as we do. We have too many national shortcomings and we are beginning to realize it thoroughly. Consequently if the destiny if civilization for the next century shall hang on us it is high time we fall upon our knees and ask for a portion of the wisdom that God gave to Solomon so many centuries ago. We need to root out some of the evils that have fastened themselves upon our American civilization before we can hope to set a Godly example to other nations. We need just such a lesson in broad humanitarian interests as the great war is forcing home to our very doors. May the nation awaken and be alive to the great opportunity that is coming.

The Salvation of Selfishness

Salvation may be looked upon from various angles and may sometimes be measured by degrees; but we take it that the real salvation, the salvation Christ brought into the world, is complete and full or not at all. However the world does not always seem to take this view of the matter and it has various ways and means to suggest that may lead to its kind of salvation. And it is sometimes suggested that if one method will not save a man perhaps some other plan may succeed.

As a means to this end the famous Ed. Howe says, "If honor will not save a man, and selfishness will, let selfishness do it." Just what a man may expect to be saved from by selfishness we do not quite understand, and as to the salvation brought by honor we are not quite sure. But we are sure the salvation Christ brought into the world was not prompted by a sense either of honor or selfishness on his part.

A man may be saved from committing an overt act of sin by either honor or selfishness, but neither honor nor selfishness can save a man from a sinful heart or a sinful nature. And as for the salvation that selfishness may bring to a man even in this life we have not a very exalted opinion, for it is in direct opposition to the principle involved in the teaching of Christ that "he who would lose his life for my sake and the gospel's shall find it." The salvation man needs and that the whole world needs is not that prompted by either selfishness or honor but that that is prompted by the love of God who sent his only Son into the world that ALL men might be saved through him.

Simple Minded Folks

Having no reference to what is properly feeble minded folks we say the world is greatly in need of simple minded people, that is a people whose minds have not been swayed and bent and hardened by the glittering baubles that wealth and fashion have fastened upon such a large portion of humanity. We may regard these simple minded folks as "rubes," "yokels," or whatever we please, but the fact remains that some of them show the finest spirit and manifest some of the purest virtues that can be a part of any human character.

In a little village in France is a little old woman who for nearly a generation kept a small shop to support herself and to educate her boy. She succeeded in both, and her boy became known both at home and abroad for his learning and ability, but France claimed his services in defense of her liberty and one day he fell, never to rise again in this world. While the light went out of the life of the simple minded French mother she did not grow hard nor bitter, but when an army camp for American soldiers was established in her litlte village she found that some of the "Sammy Boys" wanted to be served with simple home food and her simple mother heart was moved to help them as much as she could, so without willing to do so she found herself in the restaurant business with an ever increasing patronage.

Such an experience might turn the head of any one but a simple minded woman and they would have commercialized their place, but not so this French mother, without a child, she made her place attractive to the common soldier, and army officers who came and demanded wine on the strength of their commission found that this simple minded woman had sufficient strength of character to quietly inform that she preferred to serve the common enlisted men who did not ask her to violate the rules of the encampment rather than to serve officers who did. Of course she is only a simple minded woman and did not realize how the American gold might have found its way into her money drawer had she listened to the requests of the officers, but thank God for the simple minded folks who can not be bribed, but who are too simple minded to commercialize service they render for love, they are the salt of the earth.

The Latest Standard

Standardization has become so much a modern "fad" that everything from a warship to a baby is now expected to be constructed along standard lines. The cheap and popular automobile was made possible and became a reality through the standardization of parts, and this system is being brought into use more and more evrey day in war preparation as being made by our government. Some few automobile manufacturers build automobiles to order, but most of them construct them along standard lines and thus they are able to construct a better and at the same time a cheaper car.

There is little, if any room for argument against the standardization of parts of machinery and of things constructed in great numbers by the hand of man, but when it comes to standardizing human life it is altogether a different matter.

We are told that in New Zealand the care of babies has been standardized, and that the movement is spreading in England, and we may now soon expect to be visited in America by some of its apostles. We would not question for a moment the need of improvement in the care of babies, but that the care can be standardized and result in what is best for the babies is a different matter. It has been pointed out that standardization is more proper on the teaching than on the research side of any study. The theory of standardization is almost flawless, but the practice of it is altogether different.

However the question of standardizing the care of babies is worthy of discussion and investigation, but only those who have had personal experience with the subject can speak with authority.

FOUR-YEAR PROGRAM PAGE

NOW THEN DO IT.—II Samuel 3:18

Conducted by Charles A. Bame

REPORTS

The final call is now to be made for the reports of the churches on our Four-Year Program. Perhaps sooner than you get this, you will have had the blanks sent you from Secretary Goughenour asking that you get returns to myself (address, Onekama, Mich.) not later than July 30th, 1918. Of course, churches are directed to get them to your District Goal Director who will have addressed you before this is in print giving you exact information.

Up to the Keymen

The gatherng of this harvest of data is the most important thing that the churches have to do between now and Conference. And Conference is not so far away. Till that time, there will be a lot of work to be done by someone who will have to have a lot of time so that it will be apparent who is working and what is being done. This reporting is to be the work of the pastors, mainly. Some churches may have other Keymen, but in the main, the work falls on the pastors. So, pastors, either you or the right fellow will not fail us in this, I feel sure. Do not lay back some place, the blanks that come to you, but fill in so that your Keyman shall have it not later than July 20.

July 20, 1918

That is the next big date in our Denominational History. It is the limit for churches to be "on time" in the first year's accounting.

How great will you make that day by your reports? Will you be a slacker in a thing greater than beating Germany? No, I do not think wou will. I have greater confidence in you. Then it will not look well in the reports.

Why Not Make It Unanimous?

Not every church reported, in the last effort. Why? Well, I have a "hunch," but will not give it away. But why not every church? If any church has won but a single Goal, and they all report, it will make a difference worth something, if they report just what they have.

Small as a Hair?

The Good Book says that even the very hairs of your head are all numbered. One Goal reached is more important than that. If God can look after the minutest detail of the things of His Kingdom? We can and we will.

No Coaxing

No, this is not coaxing. From the beginning of my ministry, I have made it a rule not to coax people. Do not think of this letter as that. It is not. I am just trying to make it seem to you as it does to me: that this affair is of tremendous importance. You do not want to be coaxed nor forced nor cajoled; so, just come in with your reports.

An Inventory

This report will help to show what we as a denomination are worth when faced by a definite task. It will show whether we can do things according to a definite program. It will show, mighty clearly which of the pastors are willing to be loyal to the Conference and her plans and programs. If it does no more than reveal to the churches looking for pastors, which ones are willing to try to "work together" with God and the Brethren, it will have done a thing worth while.

Captive, Fighting or Death?

There is no surrender. One of the fine things that we hear of our boys across the water (God bless them) is that they fight right on till they fall or are surrounded by the enemy and even then they fool them, sometimes and get the German, instead. Now, we need a lot of that spirit in the church. We have to have it. Go right on with the work, knowing that the Lord will be with us as long as we are in line of duty. No back traveling nor wavering along the line.

The New Day

The new day in the world will be upon us soon. Perhaps, before this conference meets, the world will be ready for a new adjustment. I am convinced that, before another meets, we shall have to face the adjustments that that new day will ask of us. Are we statesmen enough to be ready to take our share of the world responsibility that we ought? Hundreds of Brethren boys will return from their baptism of fire ready to do as big things for the church and God's Kingdom as they have been called to do for Uncle Sam and unless we are planning and working on the Program before they return, we shall not be ready when the opportunity knocks. New fields of conquest are to present themselves for the taking and we need to know whether we are able to go in and possess the land. TO THIS TASK WE MUST ADDRESS OURSELVES AND THE FOUR-YEAR PROGRAM WILL HELP US TO APPRAISE OURSELVES BETTER THAN ANYTHING WE COULD DO IN A DECADE.

My Final Word

With this issue, I am turning over, largely, to others, the Program Page for the summer. It may be my final word. To District Goal Directors, Congregational Keymen, Pastors, and all, let me appeal to you. BE PROMPT. BE EXACT. BE CALM. BE GOOD FOLLOWERS AS WELL AS LEADERS. Keep your eyes open for the new vision. Keep your ears open for the new message of the day. Keep busy; for the Master may soon return to make a fuller accounting than I have asked. Make your returns as full as you can and better each year as we go toward 1920. I thank all who have helped to make the Program whatever success it has been and await with great anxiety and concern ,your FINAL REPORTS FOR 1918. BAME.

P. S.—If the congregations will report to the District Goal Directors by July 20th, I can easy expect the final reports to come to me by the 30th. If any Director cares to see the final reports, they can write me for them. BAME.

the lost souls seeking the way. She must become not only home but the school of the soul. Her ministry, through the pastor and his immediate helpers, must be able to meet the changed conditions. They must give a satisfying answer to the troubled men and women who come for help and instruction. For many the light of life seems to be going out and they must rekindle it and fan it into a flame again. To many sorrow and the shadows of death come and no light appears. To such succor must be given. But it is not enough for the church just to thus minister. She must become an aggressive and vigorous champion of her Lord and his program for her. To conclude let me put it in a word. The church must bring a positive and convincing message from Jesus Christ to men. She must attest this message by her own life and spirit and thus exemplify Jesus Christ before men. I covet for every Brethren church a commanding position in the community. I know but one thing that will give this position. That is DOING THE WILL OF GOD.

War-time Phenomena. BY GEO. H. JONES

Our amazement is beyond description when we stop long enough to consider the trend of events, under the stress of world-war pressure. The most notable, of course, are the industrial consolidations and distribution. Other fields are feeling the strain as well, but are overshadowed by the strides of industrial necessity.

Progress is being made in a miraculous manner, where, under pre-war conditions, a generation of agitation and education was necessary. Business men, politicians, social reformers and leaders in many walks of life are accomplishing more in a month, than they would formerly accomplish in years, before the conflict.

Every one seems keyed up to an expectancy that makes a war-time stride natural and easy. But what will happen when the conflict is over? What are the possibilities in the present condition? The evidently different conditions which will prevail at the close of the conflict make the student of history somewhat uncertain, as to the status of corporation, political party, reform movements and social service organizations, including the church.

Hazarding a review of conditions amazes us at our accomplishments. In many directions they are out of all proportion with what might be looked for in others. The most astonishing fact is the lagging church and Sunday school. In the Pennsylvania State Sunday School Association, the general concession is a 20 per cent decrease in attendance at the Sunday school sessions. The churches are reporting a remarkable slump in interest and attendance. This is noted by all the denominations.

Perhaps the drainage of active workers into the military establishment has caused the apparent decresae, and that is accentuated by the comparison of progress with our other institutions. Many Atlantic Coast cities report one-fourth of pastors gone.

A backward look, still farther than war-time progress, might give clearer conceptions of our direction. It seems like a dream now to face around and contemplate nineteenth century phenomena. The great industrial upheavals, the concentration of our urban population and the vast combinations of capital. Out of these three great factors can be traced, the strength to make the gigantic strides that are now shaking civilization to its very foundation.

A remarkable fact is the almost complete absence of church or denominational activity, except as needed locally by Y. M. C. A., Red Cross and Anti-Saloon League propaganda. Naturally the question arises: Has the church ceased to function properly, in the face of war-time conditions? Is its chief work now to furnish an occasional minister or layman for an expanding unit of any one of these three interdenominational bodies? Here is food for thought. Whither are we drifting?

There are several splendid achievements that stand out as colossal accomplishments. Many are unconscious, the by-products of an entirely different aim. The first most impressive is—

The Social Solidification

The great industrial communities divided more or less sharply by traditions of European nationality, and still widely, but with a different attitude now. Formerly the ill feeling was fanned into flame by national vanity and in a narrow-sighted flattery by demagogues. But what a change.

It was laughable to watch the efforts of two bright high school boys, with long Jewish names, trying to hide, or ignore their evident foreign parentage. They were employed after graduation, by a Pittsburgh journal and went to work with the night force. In the universal conscription they were caught with the other young men of their age and are now laughing, themselves at their former shame. Abnormal social prejudices are giving way under a national need.

It was pitiful to see a neat, clean, intelligent girl of the teen age, religiously trying to hide from the other students the direction from which she came when leaving her home. She came from the "Wop" colony. Now she is the prize winner in the great city school oratorical contest, "Why we are in the World Conflict." Her pride of nationality hides the shame of uncouth relationship. She is an American now.

The boy with the features of Italian extraction was ignored again and again in the great machine shop when it became necessary to promote one of the apprentices, until his heart burned with the shame and injustice of it. But his chance came, and he is now a sunburst of good humor and jollity. His older brother was wounded last week in the trenches of France. The hearty handshake of the other laborers was only part of the joy of life, for he got his promotion.

Scores of similar instances might be related, but they could only deepen the impression that the wide gulfs of social estrangement between the "foreigner" and the native needed a bridge, and the war had provided the structure. These instances are taken from the working strata of society. The army is providing the healthier, more wholesome democracy, that has been our boast, but was rapidly becoming an illusion. Welding the diverse elements of a nation whose annual tide of immigration had overflowed the million mark, into a national unit, was a miracle needing several generations. But under the stress of conditions now existing, is hastened into months.

The Legislative Unification

Few Americans have been unmoved by the leveling of political walls which took place at the beginning of the conflict. All were astonished at the unanimous effort to socialize the industrial fabric. What fallacies and personal opinions were thrown on the scrap heap of political dreams. Under the storm of public opinion, there was an unanimity that was astounding. Party organizations torn to shreds by a patriotism that vaulted custom and tradition. Disintegration and realignment that thrilled and sobered men. Out of the contending elements and unlooked for personal opinions came some of the most revolutionary laws the statesman ever dreamed about. Party lines merging from different angles, party prejudices melting under the heat of national necessity, it was the realization of the dream of the independent voter. A law received consideration upon its merits, not being the football of party interests. Great majorities where genuine patriotism demanded them. A dream of Utopia realized.

Industrial Pacification

The bludgeon of labor transformed into a walking stick. Strikes discussed as a sword sheathed until the war is over. Supply taken care of by government control. Demand for labor foreseen and provided for, by labor leaders and capitalists under complete agreement. Wages raised or lowered according to commissioners' judgment. Walkouts and boycotts, strikes and contentions, for the time being considered little less than treason. Great salaried officials becoming employees of the government at the munificent wage of $1.00 per year. What more could labor unions desire?

Moral Transformations

The great change in military minds concerning moral conditions surrounding camp life. To properly understand, just a glimpse of old world military ideals of a generation ago might help us to appreciate the change. During the campaign in the Soudan, under Kitchener, the London populace joked about the popular demand for prostitutes for the English Army of Occupation. During the Spanish-American war the conditions in our own country were appalling. Many times has the writer heard commanding officers condone the visits of abandoned women to the outskirts of the great camps at Chickamauga, Tampa, Anniston and Lexington. Now all this is changed. There were no Y. M. C. A. tents in those days, only canteens where the drinking soldier left the greater part of his monthly wages. Every brigade almost, with a canteen calculated to deliver liquor to as many as three thousand men, if that many came to drink. It was no rare occasion for the writer to be compelled to dodge empty beer bottles, thrown from the tents of high officers, during his turn on guard duty.

Now a city is denied the privilege of even selecting their police chief unless he is personally known to be favorable to the elimination of liquor and vice. Moral qualifications are the chief requirements now instead of political "pull." The news sounds like the dawn of the millenium.

Spiritual Inertia

But the most astounding fact of all is the listlessness of the churches. There is a shrinkage in conversions reported, a falling off in church attendance and a decrease in Sunday school interest and attendance that seems alarming. Are the church activities temporarily sidetracked under the influence of the great benevolent drives? Are the battles in Europe so engrossing that we fear to attempt strong battles for local preservation?

Many mothers are excusing the war-time lapses, whether they be of habit, morals or speech. Has the patriotism of many, degenerated into a hysteria that forgets eternal values, in the desire to approve of great sacrifices? Sure the boys are our boys, but does that mean that patriotically enlisting entitles a boy to smoke cigarettes, cuss like a trooper, and have his "fling" before he leaves for camp?

Recently a good mother invited the pastor to her home for the last meal before the boy's furlough was up—he expected to leave for France shortly. The most inspiring thing that this pastor has enjoyed for many a day was the request that the last ten minutes in their home for the boy who was going to France, be given to a family gathering in prayer before his departure. I think I can see the deeply spiritual look upon every face as they looked into th future and prayed for their Heavenly Father's protection. How many mothers reading this wanted the boy's last impression of home to be religious ones?

The increasing death list from France is but the introduction to a lerger one. In the face of this can we drift as the many churches report? or has the time come for taking stock of our resources and shortcomings, and preparing ourselves for a supreme effort? It is high time to awaken, Brethren.

That "Summer Slump." BY QUINTER LYON

Our people in Washington have decided not to have that "Summer Slump." This is a timely subject and one which should be in the minds of all church members. "Does my religion stand the test of fire?" "How often do I attend church in the summer?" "Do pleasure and ease come before God?" These are questions which Christians should ask themselves at this time of the year.

I am aware of the fact that many religious organizations throughout the country, perhaps the majority of churches, dismiss some of their services or even all of them when hot weather comes. Moreover, those churches which do remain open during this period experience, as a rule, what we have spoken of as the "Summer Slump," a very marked and noticeable falling off of attendance and interest. But the big question is, should this be? We know that Satan and his imps are busy all summer long as well as in the fall, winter, and spring, and this seems very bad policy for the Christian church to lay down arms when hot weather comes along. We know that this is not pleasing in the Lord's sight. And those people who allow hot weather to interfere with the Lord's work may some day come before the Great White Throne with a sorrowful countenance, telling the Lord what great works they did for him down on earth,—in good weather. The Lord's reply will be exact and in his all-knowing mind he will tell them about the boys they lost from Sunday school by dismissing for the summer, about the young men and young girls who became gradually victims of sin who found their pleasure on Sunday evenings in the places of amusement which were open during the hot weather when the churches were closed, and of the sad lack of interst on their part which allowed, not only the destruction of their own souls, but the destruction of others who were captured by the imps of Satan while the soldiers of the Cross slept.

The Lord looks deeper than man's words and his intentions, however good they may be. To man's feeble protest, "We did great works," the Lord's reply will always be, "Where are the fruits?" We cannot prove that we love the Lord and his salvation, we cannot prove that we want to worship him and serve him, unless we show the fruits. While the harvest is white and abundant, and the imps of Satan are reaping the grain with the sweat rolling off their brows, shall the soldiers of the Cross lie cooling in the shade looking out over and beyond the harvest towards the far off purple mountains? While our boys and girls, our men and women are waiting for the Word of Life to be spoken to them shall any Christian seeking pleasure and dreaming sweet dreams while the weather is hot, allow the enemy to steal into his presence and carry away to destruction the manhood and womanhood that, with a little diligence on his part, should have belonged to the Lord? Surely this is not God's will. And now, while all the forces of sin are gathering themselves together for their harmful work, let all churches and all Christians be on their guard and resolve to band together for service that will be highly pleasing in God's sight and cause the angels to rejoice and Satan to weep. Let us all pray that the Lord's work will not suffer on account of the hot days which are about here.

Safety First for Others but Not for Himself

BY REV. HOWARD W. POPE

As I was returning on the train one night after preaching in the suburbs of a western city, the conductor stopped to take my ticket. As I handed it to him, I also gave him a tract, saying as I did so, "You railroad men do not have many opportunities to attend church. Here is a tract to take the place of the sermon that you did not hear today."

He took it with a smile saying, "Oh, we have pretty fair opportunities." Evidently he read the tract, for after collecting his tickets, he returned to talk with me.

"Yes," he said, "they allow us one Sunday in four, but usually a fellow is so tired that he sleeps nearly all the forenoon. However, my wife and children attend church very regularly."

"That is good so far as they are concerned," I said, "but what your wife and children do will not help your soul."

"No, I suppose not," he replied, "but I used to attend church very regularly myself, before I took this job."

"How long have you been on this job," I inquired.

"About fourteen years," was the reply.

"Fourteen years," I said, "man alive, do you realize what you are doing to yourself?"

"Doing to myself? No, what do you mean?"

"I mean that you are committing spiritual suicide."

"Explain yourself," he added, for evidently he was becoming alarmed.

"I mean just this," I said. "You have a body, but suppose you gave it a good square meal only once a month, where would your body be in a couple of weeks? Out in the cemetery. You have a mind, but suppose you used it only once a month, in a little while yould not have brains enough to count your tickets or to make change. Now, you also have a spiritual nature. You were made to know God and enjoy him, to worship and serve him. But, if you do not exercise your spiritual faculties, if you do not think of God, or pray to him, or read his word only once a month, don't you see that in a little while your spiritual nature will become dwarfed and stunted and you will be a dead man spiritually?"

Seeing that the man was interested, I moved into the seat, so that he could sit down with me. Then, assuming that he did not know how to become a Christian, I said to him, "How long did it take you to become the owner of that tract which I gave you?"

"About a second, I suppose," he replied.

"Do you realize that you can become a Christian as quickly as you became owner of that tract?"

No, he did not realize it, according to his own admission.

Then I showed him that the difference between a Christian and other people is that the Christian has Christ dwelling in his heart. "He that hath the Son, hath life, and he that hath not the Son, hath not life." (John 5: 12.) Then I explained to him that sin is having one's own way instead of walking in God's way. "All we like sheep have gone astray, we have turned everyone to his own way," (Isaiah 53: 6.) "Your way," I said, "may not be an immoral way, or a dishonest way, but it is your way, and not God's way in which you ought to walk."

I showed him that Christ was standing at the door of his heart, knocking for admission and that if he would open the door, Christ would come in and take possession of his heart, and so change it that he would actually love God's will better than his own. Furthermore, I told him that if he would obey Christ's commandments, he would so manifest himself to him that he would be conscious of his presence. "He that hath my commandments and keepeth them—I will manifest myself to him." (John 14: 21.)

Then, having shown him from the Bible that he was a sinner, and needed a Savior, and that Jesus Christ was the Savior he needed, I said, "There are just three steps in becoming a Christian—the first is to accept Christ as your Savior just as you accepted my leaflet, and you can do it in a minute. The second step is to confess Christ as your Savior, and that will not take a minute. The third step is to obey Christ as your Savior, and that will take all your life. With this understanding of what it is to become a Christian, will you take the first step now? Will you accept Christ as your Savior, and give me your hand on it?"

As I held out my hand ,he grasped it heartily, and said, "Yes sir, I will, I will accept Christ as my Savior now."

The next minute he shouted, "Last station, everybody out," and away he went for the door as if he had been shot out of a cannon. While I had been talking, we had reached our final destination, and his business was to land his passengers but he was helping them out as a Christian gentleman, with a new purpose in his heart, and a new hope in his life.

Here was an intelligent man, an efficient and faithful servant of the public, but he was neglecting his own spiritual welfare. Doubtless he would have risked his life to save mine, had there been an occasion for it, but he was risking his soul without an occasion. His policy was "Safety First" for others, but not for himself. The least I could do was to point out his danger, and show him how to avoid it, his great opportunity, and how to improve it. He landed me safely in the city which I desired to reach, and I did my best to help him to reach heaven.

Do we realize what a multitude of train and trolley men are daily risking their lives for us? Do not forget to thank them for it, or to express your appreciation of their patience, courtesy, and faithfulness. Some of them may die for us some day, and there is one who has already died for us, and for them. Speak to them about him occasionally, for they have much in common with him. They know by experience the meaning of those words. "He saved others; himself he cannot save."

And because he would not save himself in his hour of crucifixion, he is now "able to save to the uttermost them that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them."

Impromptu Flashes. BY W. J. H. BAUMAN

Preachers without a definite message had better change vocation.

The highest, noblest, purest, and most useful aim in human life has its center in Jesus the Christ of God.

Grace—unmerited favor—is the tree of salvation upon which grow the most delicious fruits of noble manhood. See Eph. 2, 8, 9, 10.

Simplicity: Thou art a jewel.

If Jesus Christ was not and is not now, Deity; Then the Bible becomes a woefully beclouded book.

No, No, my dear Brother, The Apostles were not mistaken when they looked for Christ's second coming in their time. They lived in the morning of the eleventh hour. See Matt. 20: 6. We live in the evening of the same hour of the gospel age. Prophetic fulfillments of today plainly sustain us in this conclusion. Praise God's name for the glory at eventide.—The 12th hour.

If you did not believe more than you are able to comprehend, how much would you really believe?

I believe that God's knowledge is infinite, while human knowledge is finite. And for that reason I don't like to argue with him.

Yes, sir, you can offer a public prayer even in a big crowd, you can ask a friend for favor and also thank him. God is your greatest and best friend.

You seem to talk and know so much about your neighbor's faults; Has he no good qualities? If he has, why don't you talk about them? Say, I am a little afraid that you are either a gossiper or a gossipess.

Clerical gowns are often an affect as well as an effect.

Do you really want to be happy? If so, then live in Biblical communication with God.

The happiest life possible now is the hopeful Christian life.

Personally, the writer of these flashes believes the Kaiser of Germany to be at least one of the meanest human beings living on earth today. But I think its lost time for preachers to drag the old scamp into the pulpit every time they preach. Better treat him with silent contempt, and talk more about Jesus and his love. Thus keeping your hearers more thoroughly acquainted with him than with any one else.

Chaplains in France

Chaplain Francis B. Doherty, U. S. A. and Chaplain Lyman Rollins U. S. A., have just returned from France on a Military mission to the United States.

Chaplain Doherty is attached to General Headquarters in France, being associated with Bishop Charles H. Brent and Chaplain Paul Dwight Moody (son of the well-known Evangelist of that name) in the General Headquarters Chaplains' office. The function of this office is the direction and distribution of Chaplains' activities in France to the end of the attainment of the best and special interests of all concerned, under General Pershing. This work carries with it considerable travel and gives an intimate knowledge of the situation from a religious and moral point of view.

From this broad knowledge Chaplain Doherty says: "Everywhere we find the same situation, hear the same story; the condition and the spirit of the men are excellent." When leaving France on his present mission the Chaplain asked General Pershing: "May we not tell our people in America that the moral and religious situation here is eminently high and very satisfactory?" The reply was "Yes, and you may say furthermore that it is going to be kept up to that!"

Chaplain Lyman Rollins, who is associated with Chaplain Doherty on his mission, is Chaplain of the 101st Infantry, formerly the 5th and 9th Massachusetts National Guard, the first National Guard outfit to arrive in France. He was formerly Rector of St. Michael's Episcopal Church, Marblehead, Mass. Chaplain Rollins was the recipient recently of the Croix de Guerre. He says of his regiment: "There are religious ministrations to every man in the organization, Catholic, Protestant, and Jewish. All are regular in their attendance at services, and their moral conduct is of the very highest. The Military Authorities are doing everything possible to safeguard the men, and these respond readily and eagerly."

Both Chaplain Doherty and Chaplain Rollins spoke enthusiastically of the altogether admirable spirit of fraternity existing between those who are ministering to our soldiers. The Cahtolic Chaplains, they say, are not merely looking to the good of the Catholic boys, nor the Protestant to that of the Protestant boys. Each is working for the best interest of every man.

Accompanying the Chaplains is Private Adabert Bresnehan who captured the first German prisoner, and who was awarded with the Croix de Guerre. They have left Washington to visit the Chaplain Training School at Camp Zachary Taylor, Louisville, Ky. On the completion of their mission, they will return to the Front.

Keeping Baby Fit in Summer

BY MRS. MAE WEST

Through the long hot summer days it is a great task to keep children happy, well and out of mischief especially when the mother already has her hands more than full with the work of her house.

In the first place, children must be kept as cool as possible. In hot weather this is not an easy task, but it may be accomplished in some measure by clothing them suitably. Babies need only the diaper and one other garment, band or slip. Older children need only enough to cover their bodies. As far as possible, children should sleep out of doors at night, if screened porches are available, or, if not, with all the windows and doors wide open. A full tub bath in cool or tepid water will do much to make sleep comfortable, and a little plain talcum powder will help to allay the irritation of prickly heat.

Children must be provided too with occupations suited to their age. A play pen on a cool porch, or even under the trees in the yard where the mother can watch the baby, will give much pleasure. Sand piles, swings, and many other simple pieces of play apparatus which are easily made at home without any great expense will keep older children happy and out of mischief. Rainy days may be spent on the porch. Hints for mothers as to the selection of play and occupation for young children will shortly be published by the Children's Bureau. Very much of the annoyance of mothers and the fussiness of children would be done away with if the little hands and minds had plenty of occupation. Many a cross child is cross because he has nothing to do which interests him, and many a piece of mischief is only the result of the child's trying to find something with which to busy himself.

Children's food must be chosen with special care in summer to suit the ages, and proper food habits should be established. The nursing baby will cause the least anxiety. If a baby is nursed at regular times, preferably three or four hours apart, and is clean and as cool as possible, he will not usually suffer harm even in very hot weather.

Babies newly weaned from the breast up and to the end of the second year will need special care. Properly modified cows' milk will form the principal part of the diet of all such children, and must be as clean and as fresh as possible. Detailed directions for the feeding of children will be sent free from the Children's Bureau of the U. S. Department of Labor to all who care to send for the bulletins on the care of children.

Older children should be taught to observe regular habits, also, and mothers must guard against the dangers of over or underfeeding, and especially against poor food materials, such as overripe fruit. Young children need to be taught to chew their food thoroughly and to eat slowly. Cleanliness of the body is necessary for health and comfort at all times, but is demanded in the summer time. These fundamental rules for health should be in effect in every family, and where carried out faithfully sickness should be largely done away with.

The Sunday School

First Secretarial Conference of the Orient

The First Sunday School Secretarial Conference of the Orient

The World's Sunday School Association has a group of field secretaries in the Philippines, China, Korea and Japan. Rev J. L. McLaughlin has been the Sunday school secretary in the Philippines for the past five years. Half of his time has been devoted to the work of the American Bible Society. He has just been called home by the Bible Society and while en route he was able to hold important conferences with the Sunday school secretaries of China and Japan. Rev. E. G. Tewksbury of Shanghai, is in charge of that work in China and directs the work of the Sunday School Union. Mr. H. E. Coleman is now the full time educational secretary for Japan. Until recently he divided his time with the Foreign Mission Board of the Friends Mission. These men, together with Rev. Harutoshi Kawasumi, National Sunday school Secretary for Japan, Rev. C. T. Collyer, Secretary for Korea, and Rev. N. Tamura, Sunday school author and specialist, of Japan, held a ten days conference in Shanghai for the study of national Sunday school problems. Some of the vital topics considered were Organization, Promotion, Literature, Standards, Evangelism, Special Days, Teacher-training, Home Welfare, the Sabbath and Temperance.

Another major subject was that of the next Convention of the World's Sunday School Association which will be held in Tokyo, Japan, soon after the war is over. In addition to the general and inspirational meetings where all the delegates will be present there will be many sectional conferences for groups of Koreans, Chinese and Japanese, where specialists from abroad will have an opportunity to give definite instruction along the lines of modern methods. Collyer thought there would be 150 to 200 present from Korea, and Mr. Tewksbury felt that there might be from 200 to 250 from China. With at least 2,000 from America and other parts of the world the Convention will be very well attended. Some meetings will be held in the well-equipped Y. M. C. A. building. This will be the location for the stereopticon and moving picture demonstrations as well as for many group meetings. For the general gathering of delegates it is proposed to erect a temporary building, possibly along the lines of some of the large evangelistic tabernacles that are now being used in America.

The Sunday school secretaries in the Orient are not lessening their great work while waiting for the World's Convention but are projecting numerous summer schools and institutes for the training of a native leadership. While Messrs. Coleman, Kawasumi and Tamuri of Japan were in China they held several meetings for the Japanese in Shanghai. Then Mr. Coleman went to Nanking and Tsingtau to hold similar meetings with the Japanese Christians in those cities. Thence he passed through Peking and joined Mr. Kawasumi and Mr. Tamuri in Manchuria, after which they spent two weeks touring Korea in the interest of Sunday school work among both Japanese and Koreans. Their Sunday school tour has just closed with an Institute at Kyushu, Fukuoka, Japan.

Teaching Others How to Teach

Rev. George P. Howard, Field Secretary for South America, representing the World's Sunday School Association, will probably return on furlough to the United States in the fall. Meanwhile he is very active in reaching key workers. As opportunity offers Mr. Howard gives lectures on Sunday school methods. He just sent the following interesting information about this phase of his work, and said, "If we are ever to win—etc."

"If we are ever to win out on these mission fields it will be through a properly trained indigenous leadership. We must make sure that the native pastors who are in the making, leave our Theological Seminaries with the modern Sunday school vision as part of their intellectual baggage. I have managed, so far, to squeeze into my already full program, three hours a week for a course of lectures on Religious Education and Sunday school methods to the students of our Buenos Aires Theological Semniary.

Besides these lectures, I gave a course of lectures for English Sunday school workers during the winter months of 1917. This course lasted from April to October and the lectures were given every two weeks. The annual meeting and conferences of the different missions, furnish me with excellent opportunties for representing the cause of the Sunday school and the rights of the child.

First Things First

One of the members of the Executive Committee of the World's Sunday School Association recently increased his pledge to that work and subscribed for a Life Membership in the Association payable one-third each year for three years. This means the payment of One Thousand Dollars. In making the pledge he expressed his personal opinion of the worth of the work in the following sentence: "I want you to know that I consider the work of the World's Sunday School Association in importance and results at the very top of the list of Christian agencies: first, because it reaches the childhood of the world with the Gospel message and Christian training; and second, because it is the clearing house of the Protestantism of the world." There are about 100 Life Memberships in the World's Sunday School Association, each one being constituted by the payment of $1,000. The donor has the privilege of naming himself or another to the life membership. An illuminated certificate is presented which bears the singatures of H. J. Heinz, Chariman; Arthur M. Harris, Treasurer; Thomas R. Ferens, President and Frank L. Brown, Secretary.

An Honor for "Timothy Standby"

In these days of early summer when colleges are conferring honorary degrees it is interesting to note an honor which has just come to the senior secretary of the State Sunday School Associations. Rev. Joseph Clark, D. D. of the New York State Sunday School Association has been made a life member of the World's Sunday School Association. This was done by the payment of $1,000 by an admirer of Dr. Clark, and who is one of the past presidents of the World's Association. Dr. Clark is familiarly known to Sunday school workers by his non-de-plume "Timothy Standby." He is the author of a number of books and writes frequently for religious periodicals.

Dr. Clark entered the organized Sunday school work in 1880 and in 1881 was the General Secretary of Colorado, which then also included the states of New Mexico and Wyoming. He remained there until 1886 when he became editor and proprietor of the Susquehanna "Transcript." In 1888 he left newspaper work for the ministry and was ordained by the Ohio Conference. For eleven years he was a pastor of Methodist churches in Ohio, his last charge being the Keen Avenue M. E. church of Columbus. In 1889 he succeeded Mr. Marion Lawrance as General Secretary of the Ohio State Sunday School Association and was their honored and successful leader for thirteen years. Since 1912 Dr. Clark has been the Superintendent of the New York State Sunday School Association. For nine years he was elected recording secretary of the International Sunday School Association and was a member of their Executive Committee. He was also a member of the Sunday School Board of the Methodist Episcopal church and represented the five Ohio Conferences.

REVIEW OF
The Thought and Work of the Church

The minutes of the last meeting of the conference of the Brethren churches of Ohio which appear in this number of the Evangelist are somewhat late in their apparance, but there is a reason. Our good secretary, Prof. E. G. Mason, is a busy superintendent of schools and the conference was held just before the close of the public schools and during the very busiest time of the school year and Brother Mason found it impossible to prepare the minutes for publication until after his school work was out of the way. It is rather a full report and the reading of it will reveal that the Ohio churches are awake to their responsibility and will make an honest effort to do their part in helping the entire church to achieve the goals set for the great Four-Year Program.

This week we have a short contribution from the pen of one of our youngest ministers, Quinter Lyon, son of Wm. Lyon of Washington, D. C. Our young brother will now take up the active work of the ministry if a place opens up to him somewhere in the east, Pennsylvania preferred.

George H. Jones has been so busy since returning to Johnstown that he has found little time for writing for the Evangelist, but this week we are glad to give to our readers a contribution from his pen that treats a vital topic in a most realistic manner. The things of which Brother Jones writes must appear to all of us, but the question is What are we going to do about it? Are we going to use the opportunity to make our organized work count for God? Or are we going to turn the work of ministering to the spiritual needs of the world over to others? However the work the Y. M. C. A. and the Red Cross are doing is not a work that the church could do, as a church, but it is a work that they must do as agents of the church. They could not possibly carry on their work without the backing of the churches and the support of Christian people who see in this way an opportunity to give expression to their religious principles. Of course many men who are not Christian personally also help in this good work, but it is the teaching and practising of Christian principles that has brought them to the place of helpfulness.

From now until the meeting of the General Conference at Winona Lake the Four-Year Program page should be one of the most interesting pages of the Evangelist. Things ought to be doing every day from now until that time. It will be a gaterhing up of results, an examination of the work done during the year and the results of this examination will reveal in a large way the efforts that have been made to reach our set goal. We are indeed glad that in a number of points the church has gone away ahead of the goals set for this year's achievement, but the glory of this achievement may be clouded in some respect by our failure to achieve in other lines of the set work. But a finding out will be good for us and will help us to do better another year, so we would urge all the pastors and all the church officials to heed the requests that come to you from the goal directors and key men of your districts and to give them all the information you can in as complete and as accurate a manner as possible. This will not only lighten their burdens, but it will make their reports of more value to the church.

Among the things that have come to our notice in the busy season of receiving and filling orders for the quarter's Sunday school supplies is that we have added four new schools to our list, Brethren, Michigan; Baltimore, Maryland; a new school in the mountains of Kentucky near Krypton; and the school at Linwood, Maryland which has heretofore been conducted as a union school has ordered a full supply of Brethren literature. This is as it should be, and only as the schools do use Brethren literature and patronize the Brethren Publishing House can a good strong publishing institution for the Brethren church be made possible. This is a point some Sunday school workers in the Brethren church seem to have missed, but it is a point that must be recognized or in time there will not only be no such thing as a Brethren Publishing House, but there will be no such thing as a Brethren church. Unless we preach the gospel upon which the Brehtren church stands in our Sunday schools as well as in our churches we will in time find ourselves without Brethren congregations to preach to.

An important announcement to the Sisterhood of Mary and Martha appears in this number of the Evangelist from Miss Marie Lichty. All the sisterhoods are urged to give this matter immediate attention.

W. S. Crick reports a most interesting and profitable meeting recently held in the Mt. Olive congregation in Virginia when L. G. Wood of Roanoke came to his help in the work. As an immediate result of the meetings twenty-two members were added to the membership of the church and the congregation greatly revived.

By reading the report of the work of the Ohio mission board as made by its president, A. D. Gnagey, to the Ohio conference it will be seen that the Ohio churches are doing a great deal to strengthen the cause of the Brethren in the state, and at the same time it reveals the fact that so far only the fringes of opportunity in Ohio have been touched by the churches. Every church should be "up and doing" in this great work for the Lord.

The copy for the June number of the Brethren Missionary has just been received in the office. This will be a number of special interest. Not only will it contain eight extra pages, but the pages will be of more than ordinary interest as they will contain the full report of the Easter offering for foreign missions, by far the largest offering the Brethren church ever made for this work.

The subscription list to the Missionary is growing right along and we want to see it grow, but please DO NOT SEND subscriptions to the Brethren Publishing Company. We have nothing to do with that and are obliged to do the work you should do and to send the subscription to L. S. Bauman. Send ALL subscriptions to him, and NONE to us.

In his brief report from Roanoke, Virginia the pastor, L. G. Wood tells of the activities of that church and of their endeavors to do at least their share in helping the church to reach the goals of the Four-Year Program. Brother Wood recently found time or took the time to assist Brother Crick in a meeting at Mt. Olive, Virginia. Here the splendid conference of the Maryland-Virginia district was held as was reported through our columns last week.

The announcement made on another page by Martin Shively, secretary and treasurer of the Brethren National Ministerial Association is of importance because of the unusual number of deaths among the ranks of the Brethren ministers during the past year. And since the writing of this notice by Brother Shively another one of our brethren in the ministry has been called to his eternal reward. It was another one of the real pioneers of the Brethren church in the west, Eld. John A. Myers. An appreciation and a sketch of his life by W. H. Miller appears elsewhere in this number of the Evangelist.

Around the Editor's Table

Who Was Jesus?

After spending six months in the study of the gospel of Mark and the life of Christ there should be no hesitancy on the part of any member of the great Sunday school army of Christ in answering the above question. Probably not one member out of a thousand of this Sunday school army ever gave half as much time to the study of the life of Napoleon or of Washington and yet a very large portion of them have a rather complete knowledge of these two men prominent in the history of the world, though widely different in character.

If we may know who Napoleon was or who Washington was, is it anything out of the ordinary that we should be expected to know who Jesus was?

This six months study of the gospel of Mark should have taught us that, if it taught us nothing more, for that was one of the questions concerning himself that Jesus insisted on having his disciples answer, and he was not satisfied to have them give the answer in the words or thoughts of others, but insisted on knowing who his disciples themselves considered him to be.

If one has ever had any doubts about the identity or the personality of Jesus a careful study of the gospel of Mark should remove that uncertainty. When Peter made the great confession he made it in a twofold manner. In the first place he confessed or expressed his belief in Jesus as the Jewish Messiah, "the Christ." To many of us who view his life at the distance of nearly two thousand years it seems surpassingly strange that the whole Jewish people did not recognize his Messiaship and flock to his company as hungry birds will flock around one who has food that will save them from starvation. But of some things the perspective of distance may give a better understanding, and it may be possible that the experiences of the intrevening years of both those who did believe on him and those who rejected him as Messiah are a help to our belief today, and possibly we are a trifle harsh in passing judgment on the Jewish people of the time of Jesus, for undoubtedly some of us would have been as perverse of heart and as slow to believe on him as were some of the men of his day.

But we are glad for Peter's confession; it will be a help to mankind as long as time lasts to get a better understanding of the life and ministry of Jesus. But it can hardly be said that the most important part of Peter's confession was the expression of his belief that Jesus was the Messiah. There was something more to his confession than that, and that was his declaration that he believed Jesus to be the Son of God. Jesus' divine Sonship is one of the vital truths that needs to be emphasized in this age when gross materialism would rob him of this precious heritage. "The Son of the living God" are the words of Peter and how any one can claim to accept the salvation brought into the world by Jesus without admitting his divine Sonship is more than some of us can understand.

The person and being of Christ as the one and only begotten of the Father is the very heart or center of the gospel, and as has been said, "Christianity is Christ." No doubts should arise in our minds as to the answer to the question, Who was Jesus?

The Woes of the Publisher

So far as the Brethren Publishing Company is concerned it is now free for a time at least from one of the woes that publishers have had to meet for nearly two years now, that is the difficulty of getting paper when it was needed. Our large supply has arrived and is safely stored and ready for use and will meet our needs for the greater part of the year; but this is only ONE of the woes of the publishing business. Another woe is the scarcity of help for the printing industries. We presume there is not a printing plant of any size in America that is not scouring sea and land for printers or for help in some special department of the business. Some of our religious exchanges run great display advertisements on the back page of their papers almost begging for workers to fill places made vacant in their business by the war.

Trying to meet our own needs we have written to a number of our leading pastors asking them if they can refer us to a good printed in their local communities that might be secured for a permanent position in the Brethren Publishing House, but after more than a month we have not received a single reply. For several weeks we carried on negotiations with a printer now working in Vermont, but formerly from Ashland, using both the mails and telegraph in an attempt to secure his services, but we received a polite note from his eastern employer asking us to let him alone as he needed him in his business just as much as we did in ours. So we make this appeal to the entire brotherhood. Is there anywhere in the Brethren church a good printer, not subject to draft, that would take a permanent place with the Brethren Publishing Company? One who is a good pressman on cylinder presses preferred. We have a place open for such a man and will be only too glad to correspond with any one who is able to fill the place or to be referred by any of our pastors to such a one. We must have more help if we would get our work as promptly as it should be, and with all the daily papers carrying advertisements in every issue for printers and pressmen, offering high wages, it seems our only salvation lies in calling upon the brotherhood to help us find some of the help we need.

The Troubles of Others

The above note does not express nearly all the troubles that the publishers of periodicals now have to face, but only a small part of them. One other serious problem with many is how to meet the increased postage rate that went into effect last week. This does not worry us much because we think we are going to get through with only a twelve and a half percent increase, not more than twenty-five per cent at most; but other publications of a much wider circulation and that carry much advertising matter will have trouble "a plenty."

The following is taken from the Christian Herald and shows just what effect the new postal law is already having on a number of publications both large and small:

L. V. Ashbaugh, publisher of the Clover Leaf Publications, announces the suspension of the American Home Weekly and the Omaha Rural Weekly with the current issues.

This action on the part of the directors of these two corporations is due to conditions wrich face the publishing industry, more particularly the postal law, which goes into effect July 1.

Mr. Ashbaugh said in an interview: "The publishing business is undergoing greater hardships than any other industry in the country. The cost of white paper is 50 per cent above normal, all other material and labor are ruinously high, and on top of that Congress has passed a postal law which will bankrupt hundreds of loyal, patriotic publishers who have done everything possible to help in the prosecution of the war. Recognizing that there is no use of continuing under these impossible conditons, the stockholders of two of our newest publications, which have a combined circulation of 400,000, have decided to risk no more of their money in these ventures and to 'scrap' the effort and investment already made. Many more publishers will follow the same course within the next two months."

The Ladies' World, a long-established New York magazine, has also ceased publication, and there are many others. The American Newspaper Directory for 1918 chronicles the death of 616 publications in this country since its issue of 1917.

These are trying times for publications, and with their postage being increased from 50 to 900 per cent on July 1, the worst is yet to come.

The Senate Post-Office Committee has refused to consider legislation to suspend or modify the increased postage rates. The determination in Congress is to try the thing out and see how it will work. The suspension already of more than 600 publications in anticipation of the postage increase must be pretty good indication to any open mind as to how it will work.

Unless protests from the public to Senators and Congressmen are made promptly, the list of useful publications suspended will soon be rapidly increasing.

IS THE WORLD GROWING BETTER OR WORSE?

Sir Joshua Reynolds' sister, "poor, trembling Frances," wrote concerning Samuel Johnson a few lines worth more to his memory than all of Boswell:

"When he went home at 2 in the morning he would put pennies into the hands of children sleeping in the streets, that they might buy breakfast when they awoke."

When you give to the Red Cross you put pennies into the hands of poor, starving children across the ocean, and into the hands of poor old men and women.

The world improves. Even now in war time, with all its horrors, Dr. Johnson might walk from his tavern to his lodgings many times without finding half-starved children sleeping in the streets.—Los Angeles Examiner.

News From the Field

Report of the Ohio Conference Held at Fremont, Ohio, April 16-18-1918

The conference opened on Tuesday evening, April 16 with a fair representation of delegates present. The Fremont choir led the delegation in an inspirational song service, which was followed by several sentence prayers. Moderator Teeter then introduced Elder S. M. Loose of the Fremont church. Brother Loose is perhaps the oldest active member of the Brethren church in the State of Ohio, and the founder of the Fremont church. No better choice for an address of welcome could have been made.

Address of Welcome by S. M. Loose.

The speaker voiced the welcome of the Fremont church to the visiting delegates. He said "That this Christian life is not all a cross bearing life but a rejoicing life as well. We are here to sanction and aid in the Lord's work and to work out our soul's salvation. Love is the keynote of the church and the force that binds us together in our work. The beginning is the only end there is to the Christian life. It is commanded that we aid and encourage each other. That is what we are here for. This has been my church home for 58 years and I pray that I may contribute, before I am called home, some aid and encouragement to the youth in our church and rising generation."

Credential Committee. The Moderator appointed E. F. Miller, F. L. Garber and Alvin Byers to collect and pass upon the credentials of the delegates.

Conference Sermon By W. S. Bell, Dayton

The need of Doctrinal Preaching. Text Acts 27: 28-29. In brief he said, "The church is the greatest institution in the world. The church is the only solution of the problem of the human race. There are some institutions that call themselves churches which have no right to be called a Christian church. The Mayor of Dayton said that the only solution to the problems of the human life is the Gospel. President Wilson said that the most efficient work any man can do is to go back to our churches and render the most efficient service possible. All that this world has of comfort and cheer and all that has raised it from lust and despair is the gospel of Jesus Christ. There can be no church unless it have a doctrine upon which to stand and these doctrines must be rooted in the teachings of Jesus Christ and must be fundamental in the organization and growth of the church. There is no church that stands out so four-square and so fundamentally upon the teachings of the Bible as the Brethren church. If we do not live up to and perpetuate these doctrines, we are hypocritical. The baptism and the communion service as fundamental and extended doctrines are insufficient and valueless in themselves but are practised to teach the fundamental teachings of Christ. The drift of times is away from the doctrines and substitutes are taking their places.

Nothing can be substituted for the gospel of Jesus Christ. We are asked, "What is the matter with the church?" There is nothing the matter with the church nor the teachings of Christ but not enough emphasis has been placed upon these teachings. There are four anchors to which we may fasten our hope and thus prevent our drifting away from the observance of fundamental doctrines.

1. Deity. Much of the drift is due to the denial of the deity of Jesus Christ. All rests upon him. Christ was not a manifestation of God but God manifest in the flesh. Jesus is God, all power and all truth. If he is but a manifestation or demonstration, all is false or a sham.

2. Atonement. The work upon the cross was an atonement for our sin. There is no character salvation. There is nothing in man himself that will lift him to the highest elevation of manhood, he must be lifted by the salvation of Jesus Christ. He alone can save us from the punishment of sin.

3. The Word of God. The authority of the Holy Scriptures. It is the only thing that will hold. "Heaven and Earth shall pass away but my word will not pass away." The Word, not themes, should be chained to the pulpit today. The greatest power of the great evangelists is due to their simple presentation of the Word of God.

4. The Resurrection Hope. We must believe in the resurrection of Jesus Christ. Jesus took from death its power and from the tomb its dread. He is the hope of the life to come. Daniel's question "What will the end of these things be?" can be asked today. This is an age of man but a new day will dawn, this will be God's day. The settlement of the problems of men and nations today will be found in the right. God will reign eventually in peace."

This session of the conference was fittingly closed by the congregation singing "Faith of our Fathers" and the benediction.

Wednesday Morning Session—Business.

After a short season of prayer and song service, led by W. J. Barnhart of Pleasant Hill, a business session was held.

Report of the Credential Committee. The committee made a partial report. This was adopted and the committee ordered to continue its work.

Report of the Trustees of the Brethren Home. In the absence of Elmer Wombold, Secretary to the Board W. S. Bell read the report:

RESOURCES

Mortgage loan to Geo. F. Kem	$ 5,000 00
Mortgage loan to Elmer Wombold	200 00
Mortgage loan to Mansfield Church	500 00
Int. on above loan for 8 yr. @ 3%	133 40
Certificate in Savings Bank	4,262 95
Balance in Incidental fund	2 00
Total resources	$10,098 35
No liabilities.

After some explanatory remarks and discussions, the report was adopted. A motion prevailed that a committee be appointed to make a report of plans for inviting other districts to add to this fund for the establishment of a National Home in this State when a considerable sum shall have been obtained. The committee consists of J. A. Miller, W. S. Bell and Dyoll Belote.

Report of Ministerial Examining Board.

Fremont, O., April 16, 1918

To the Brethren of Ohio State Conference in session:

Greeting,—The Ministerial Examining Board beg to report the following ordinations during the conference year. viz.—Noble Victor Leatherman. Dr. Florence Newberry Gribble.

Respectfully submitted,

ELDER A. D. GNAGEY,
ELDER J. ALLEN MILLER,
ELDER W. C. TEETER.

By order of the conference the report was accepted and ordered spread upon the minutes.

Report of the Board of Evangelists. The members of the Board, Dyoll Belote, J. A. Garber, H. M. Oberholtzer, W. S. Bell, J. Allen Miller and S. M. Loose made individual reports on the condition of the churches in their several districts. The report was adopted.

Reports of Mission Board.

President's Message.. A. D. Gnagey.

To the Brethren in Conference assembled at Fremont, Ohio, — Greetings:—Grace, Peace, and Mercy be to all them that love our Lord Jesus Christ.

I deeply regret my inability to be present with you at this time and to make this report in person. Yet I rejoice that it is not through any physical disability nor any lack of spiritual desire to enjoy the fellowship which is one of the blessings of our yearly conferences. The Editor of our church paper, to whom I have committed the reading of this message, is in a position to make satisfactory explanation as to the cause of my absence, though even at this writing I am hoping to be with you the last day of the conference.

I have pleasure in presenting to this body my fifth annual report of the work and progress of the Brethren Mission churches under the care and direction of your Mission Board. I shall not trespass on your valuable time by going into minute details which have become a necessary part of church work in these days of new tasks and duties. But I feel sure that you will be interested in hearing of the progress of the work in these mission churches for the support of which you are so generously contributing of those things with which the Lord has blest you. In so far as progress of church work may be tabulated or indicated on paper this report will interest you.

I COLUMBUS.—This church is now and has been for the past nine months or more under the pastoral care of Brother S. E. Christiansen whose faithful service has already been rewarded with gladdening fruitage, increased attendance at church and activities in the various departments of church work. The pastor of this church has taken the pains to keep a record of attendance at both morning and evening hours of worship. The figures he has submitted to me are very gratifying indeed. The average attendance from August 1, 1917 to April 1, 1918, at the morning hour has been 48, the evening hour 78; the Sunday school reports an average attendance of 66, and the Christian Endeavor an attendance of 50. How many of our well established churches can boast of an average Christian Endeavor attendance of 50? Many a pastor preaches to less than 78 people at his night services. I emphasize these figures because they are significant.

The spiritual progress of a church is not so easily tabulated, but the report of the pastor justifies the statement that it has kept pace with the growth of the work in other ways. Last year I had the privilege of visiting all our mission churches but one, while this year I have visited but one of the five mission churches under the care of the Board. Yet frequent inquiries as to the progress of the work in Columbus lends encouragement to the hope of a continued enlargement of the work in that city. Accessions to the membership have not been reported to me. Probably the pastor is prepared to supply this information, which ought to be incorporated in this report. Brother Christiansen, as I understand, expects to continue his services there the coming year.

II MANSFIELD.—Our mission at Mansfield has had a checkered career, owing to unfaithfulness on the part of one who instead of being a true shepherd was a scatterer of the sheep. To a very large extent however, Brother Rowsey, the present pastor, has overcome the difficulties and the discouragements which naturally result from such unfaithfulness, and in his hands the work at Mansfield has been forging ahead. During the year the membership at this place was strengthened by the accession of twenty members by letter and twelve by baptism, a total of 32. This was largely the result of an evangelistic meeting held by Brother A. E. Thomas during the past winter. The active membership is now 55. Brother Rowsey believes in revising the church roster once in a while, otherwise he might report a membership of more than a hundred. The Sunday school averages from 40 to 50, with an enrollment of 60. The attendance in the morning averages about 60, while in the evening it passes the 100 mark. The church contributed $15 to foreign mission work, which is very commendable. The pastor of this church is planning larger things for the coming year. Present indications are that within a year or two this church will be able to care for itself without the aid of the Mission Board. This spirit of the pastor and his people also deserves commendation. Brother Rowsey has engaged to serve this church for the conference year, beginning April 1, 1918.

III RITTMAN.—This place is being served by a student in the Senior class of Ashland College, Brother Leatherman, who preaches for them morning and evening twice a month. At this place we have a band of faithful believers and if properly cared for will in time become a self-supporting church. They have purchased and paid for a good lot advantageously located, and, but for the fact that we are living in war times, would probably erect a church building during the coming summer. The contribute to both home and foreign missions. and are interested in all the activities of the church at large. The Sunday school numbers about 40. The membership is 43. For the support of this work the conference appropriates $100. For more than a year weekly contributions are being made to a church building fund.

IV CANTON.—The work at this place is in charge of Brother Dyoll Belote, who has already begun his third year at an increased salary. During the year the membership of the church has been increased by 18 accessions. Two have withdrawn membership, leaving a net gain of 16, all of whom are proving to be a spiritual force in the work of the church. The younger members especially are taking an interest in the work that is most commendable. Five of them have been taking the work in a class in Expert Endeavor, a union class taught by the pastor in the city.

The pastor has been active in working out the financial problems of this church and we are glad to report that he has been and is succeeding. A payment of $200 on the debt was made, besides the interest. The plan in active operation now provides for the liquidation of the entire indebtedness by December 15, 1920. The plan calls for the raising of $500 each year by the congregation, in addition to the other regular expenses. This is no small undertaking and both pastor and church are to be congratulated for this courageous effort.

The pastor has been giving part of his time to the work of the Stark County Christian Endeavor Union, which has brought some notice to their local work. He is now superintending a second class in Expert Endeavor in the city of Canton, and has an invitation to teach a third class at Louisville.

This church faces all the problems of a city church and, we are glad to say, is making a courageous effort to meet them in that spirit which usually spells success.

The Sisters Society and Sunday school are doing their usual work and proving helpful in furthering the cause for which the church stands.

V—FREMONT.—The pastor of this church has not submitted a report of his work to the president of the Mission Board, and not having personal knowledge of its activities, I am not in a position to report intelligently.

The churches of Ohio through their Mission Board at last Conference made the following appropriations for the support of the work at the different points indicated in this report: Columbus, $300; Mansfield, $250; Rittman, $100; Canton, $250; Fremont, $100, making a total of $1,000. From my personal knowledge of the needs of these mission churches and the prospects for an increased and larger work, I suggest that these appropriations be continued for the coming year. (Of the needs of the Fremont work I do not speak from personal knowledge.)

It should be remembered that, of five mission churches to which you make contributions, THREE are without resident pastors. It is no reflection whatever on the students of Ashland College who supply these mission churches to say that it is a "makeshift." In conversation with two of them very recently they have said as much to me. It is their conviction that supply at long distance is not a satisfactory method and that some arrangements should be made by which these people might have regular pastoral care. This suggests the thought of a mild form of state or conference supervision. For example, the Zion Hill and the Rittman churches being but eight miles apart could be served by a resident pastor who would give all his time to the work. This is nothing more than a suggestion and in no way intended as interfering with the present arrangement of Zion Hill church which is being so satisfactorily served by our enthuhiastic Brother Lynn.

I feel it a distinct loss to myself in not being able to be present at the time when this report is read and the mission work of the state discussed. I had hoped to give at least a ten minutes' address on this department of our church work and I am yielding the privilege only in deference to the yet larger interests of the brotherhood at large which demand both my time and service during these days. I shall very cheerfully yield my place and position on this Board to one less urgently engaged, if the conference in its wisdom feels disposed to relieve me.

Dear Brethren, I can not but add here what you already know, that the church of the living God today is on trial as never before since the beginning of my active relations with it nearly forty years ago. It is in very deed a critical moment, and I have wondered whether we as a church fully realize and appreciate our opportunity in this present crisis. At this very moment the fate of nations is hanging in the balance. In this hour a stupendous spiritual task awaits the nations and the world,—a task which only the church of God can meet. It amounts to a crusade in which only the church may safely lead. As we enter anew upon our work for the year which lies before us, let it be the supreme function of every church and of every pastor who is set to lead his people to call men unto the life of faith in God which alone is big enough and strong enough to face the tremendous tasks of a world that has played the part of the prodigal and needs to be called back to its God. The Lord bless this conference and give it wisdom and courage to plan wisely for the kingdom of God.

Secretary's Report. In the absence of O. F. Brumbaugh, R. R. Teeter read the report:

Total apportionment	$1,064 50
Amount paid	775 96
Amount due	288 54

During the conference the secretary of the conference was authorized to make whatever collections were sent with the delegates. A part of the amount due was collected at this time.

Treasurer's report. E. J. Worst, read by J. A. Miller. By order of the conference the reports of the Secretary and Treasurer were referred to an auditing committee to report at a later session. Dyoll Belote, G. S. Baer and W. C. Teeter were appointed by the Moderator to compose this committee.

By vote of the conference the courtesies of the Ohio Conference were extended to the visiting ministers from other districts.

A motion was duly made and seconded that we proceed to elect a committee of three to nominate departmental officers for carrying out the Four-Year Program. The mition carried and J. A. Garber, Geo. S. Baer and A. J. McLain were elected.

A motion for the appointment of a committee for drawing up rules for the government of conferences of the future and the continuance of the organization from year to year, was approved by the delegation assembled. The committee as appointed consisted of Dr. J. Allen Miller, Dyoll Belote and the secretary of the conference.

The Moderator's address was then given by R. R. Teeter.

The discussion of the address was led by H. M. Oberholtzer and W. S. Bell, J. A. Garber, J. A. Miller, W. J. Barnhart, A. J. McLain and some laymen spoke during the discussion. All commented upon the increase of resident pastors throughout the brotherhood.

A motion prevailed that a committee be appointed to prepare a slate for the election of members to fill the vacancies on the Board of Evangelists and Mission Board. C. E. Beekley, J. L. Hudson and W. C. Teeter were named for this Committee.

This concluded the business session.

Wednesday Afternoon Session

The devotions were led by E. A. Rowsey who fills the pulpit at Mansfield with his characteristic enthusiasm.

The addresses of the afternoon were devoted to the consideration of the Four-Year Program. The first address was "Ohio's Responsibilities" by George S. Baer, director of the Program in this state. In substance, he said, "Ohio has a certain part to play in the Four-Year Program of the National Conference. If Ohio fails it may mean that all the departments on the program shall fail. Each church is responsible for the church standing. Hence the burden falls upon each member and is a program for our betterment. Ohio has within her borders the center of Brethren interest. Ashland College. This is another reason why Ohio should live up to her responsibility in carrying out this program. We owe it to the demands of these strenuous times. We, as a church, must be able to meet the demands of the war and of the period of construction following the war. There must be co-operation, organization and provision for financing this campaign if we shall win. In conclusion, there must be prayer.

Ohio as a field for church extension. Dyoll Belote. This subject was handled as a round table discussion. The point was raised that no new mission points should be formed until the points now supported were made self-supporting. W. S. Bell, M. S. White of Fostoria and his colleagues Brother Hazen and H. M. Oberholtzer and J. Allen Miller took part in this discussion. At the close of the period allotted to this topic, the opinion prevailed wherever possible, mission work should be carried on without the aid of the Mission Board. But wherever aid is needed for the organization of a church, it should be given. An organization must be effected wherever a few members are found in order that they may become a neucleus around which a church may be built.

Just such an organization is now being effected in Fostoria. A few devoted members have banded themselves together and are holding services, both Sunday school and church in the home of one of these and are bravely struggling forward toward the establishment of a church and already they have raised $2,000 for that purpose. They have done all this and have not asked the Mission Board for aid. This we must call devotion and pluck, however the help of any one in the brotherhood will not be refused. At least we can help them with our prayers.

The Fostoria Sunday school attended in a body and favored the conference with a special chorus, "Will you do your part?" Words can not express the respect and admiration the Brethren of Ohio have for these people.

Due to the fact that one or two numbers of the program were not present the rest of the session was devoted to conference business.

An adidtional report of the credential committee showed a total of 70 delegates present. The committee was continued until it could make a full report.

Report of Committee on Nominations. We, your nominating committee for Evangelists in the several districts of the State of Ohio Brethren churches, submit the following names as evangelists until next conference,—J. Allen Miller, Dyoll Belote, J. A. Garber, H. M. Oberholtzer S. M. Loose, W. S. Bell and C. E. Beekley.

In the second place, we recommend that the Nominating committee be continued until next conference and be empowered so that if any evangelist leaves the district his successor may be appointed to fill out such unexpired term or that some provision be made to meet the situation so occasioned.

Third,—Your committee would kindly request that the conference in regular business session, elect the Secretary of the Mission Board and relieve them of the responsibility of making such nomination. Signed,—W. C. Teeter, J. L. Hudson, C. E. Beekley.

The report was adopted as read and with the amendment that the filling of vacancies on the Board of Evangelists should be left to the chairman of the board.

E. F. Miller of Gretna was elected Secretary of the Mission Board for the coming year.

Provision for meeting the expenses of our Four-Year Program committee. It was decided that each congregation with 100 members or less would be asked to pay $1.00, all others $2.00. The sum thus raised was considered sufficient to meet the expenses of the committee.

Change of time for holding the conference

After some discussion a committee composed of two ministers and two laymen was appointed to bring in a recommendation to the conference at a later session. E. F. Miller, Rufus King, George S. Baer and L. B. Wilkins composed the committee.

Resolutions Committee. G. L. Maus, Alvin Byers and W. R. Deeter were named.

Election to fill vacancies.

1.—Church Trustees. E. J. Worst was re-elected. 2.—Ministerial examining board, W. C. Teeter, re-elected. 3,—Trustee of Brethren Home, J. A. Miller, re-elected. 4.—College Trustees, retiring, E. J. Worst, E. L. Kilheffner, J. D. Finley, E. J. Worst, E. L. Kilheffner and J. H. Young were nominated.

Place of meeting for next year.

Invitations were received from Ashland, Canton and Gratis. By vote of the conference, the invitations were referrd to the Committee on Time for holding the next conference.

Wednesday Evening Session

The evening session was opened by a season of devotions, led by S. E. Christiansen.

Report of the Committee on Nominations for departmental heads. The committee appointed at an earlier session of the conference for this purpose submitted their report at this time as follows,—

State C. E. Superintendent, Dyoll Belote; Life Work Superintendent, E. A. Rowsey; Quiet Hour Superintendent, Roy Patterson; State S. S. Secretary, W. R. Deeter; Elementary Superintendent, Josie Wogaman. By a vote of the conference these officers were elected.

Auditing Report. Dyoll Belote as chairman of this committee read the report that they had found all accounts correct and no discrepancies between the books of the Secretary and Treasurer of the Mission Board. The report was accepted as read.

The Preacher and his message. B. S. Stoffer.

The speaker took the text of his message from John 1: 6-8. He handled the subject in a very scholarly manner. He approached the topic as a problem. The preacher received his first consideration. Briefly he said, 1,—He must be a man of stalwart Christianity. 2,—He must be talented and feel the call to preach. A call consists in seeing the needs and feeling the responsibility of having a mission to perform. 3,—He must be broad and sympathetic in his work. 4,—He must have a love for mankind and a passion for souls. In the second place, he considered the message. What is it? Does it meet the vital needs of life? To all and to our boys who are leaving for the front, we must have a message that will produce a stalwart Christianity within them sufficient to combat their temptations. 2,—We must emphasize the divinity and humanity of Christ. Lastly it must be a positive message, and we must place our all in it.

The discussion of the address was led by W. J. Barnhart. He said, the message must be original, positive and definite. Theology stands for something fundamental and substantial. We must emphasize certain phases of the gospel message in order to get the people to understand and heed it. A part of the message should be the redemption from sin by the salvation by blood. There is but one solution to the great question of the day and that is the preaching of the coming of the Kingdom of God.

At this time we were again favored with a selection by the Fremont choir.

The sermon of the evening was preached by Dr. J. Allen Miller. He chose his text from Romans 12: 28-29. In outline, this is what he said,—"The present world order with wihch we are concerned is dead. The kind of Christianity which we have had has failed in many respects due in many cases to wrong living and wrong teachings.

Men have failed to preach the gospel that saves men. We must render a service pleasing to God. The Will of God is not reconciled to this order of things. The man or woman who ties his or her life up with the present order of things is dying. Here are some of the things that we must preach. 1. —the world of which we are a part is of God. If you take out of the hearts of men the belief in God, you take out of their lives every thing that vitalizes life. Belief in God is the beginning. It is instinctive. The world is God's and although it is now in the grip of the devil it will eventually go back to him and work out his great plan. We are created in the image of God and no sin or degradation can destroy this image. Jesus was eternally the Son of God and we shall become the sons of God. The Word and Judgment of Jesus Christ can not be surpassed. The Word shall not be destroyed but the order of things will be destroyed. 2. The fundamental truth of the implication of God. God is the Father. Accountability to God is a necessity and must come. We will be held accountable for all things we have done. If men believed that they would have to be held accountable for every act there would be no sin. 3. Life is worth living for right will prevail. There is a reason for living, we shall fit into the niche of the plan of God's work. The Bible is the only book that puts the Golden Age in the future. It is literature. It is better to die as a beast than to die as a man without future hope. Our Christian message is a message of hope.

Thursday Morning Session (S. S. Session)

The devotoins were conducted by L. B. Wilkins.

The Minutes of the Conference thus far were read, corrected and approved.

Report of the Committee on Time and Place

The report was divided into two parts as follows,—

1.—It was recommended that a change of date be made to late fall, either the latter part of October or first ten days of November. 2.—That Canton's invitation be accepted.

1918 Fall Meeting. A motion prevailed that the next meeting be held in Ashland in November of the present year and that it be a Bible rally primarily and devoted to only the necessary business. By action of the conference all officers elected by this conference shall hold office until the fall conference of 1919.

Report of the Committee on Brethren Home. The following report was approved by the conference:

"We recommend that our next National Conference be asked to endorse the Ohio district effort to establish a Brethren Home. And that the other district conferences be requested to co-operate in assisting to establish this Home at the earliest possible time. That the same shall be open to the members of the Brethren church. And that National Conference propose a plan of co-operation for the districts with the Ohio Conference." Signed, Dyoll Belote, J. Allen Miller, W. S. Bell.

Election of Conference Officers. The following officers were elected: Moderator, J. A. Garber; Vice-Moderator, Dyoll Belote; Secretary-Treasurer, E. G. Mason. The Secretary-Treasurer's fee was fixed at $10.

The Secretary was instructed to prepare a ballot to be used at the next election of conference officers in order that the use of time and misunderstandings may be minimiezd. Said ballot to be prepared for distribution among the delegates.

Secretary-Treasurer's Report. The following report was read and accepted:

Ohio Sunday Schools—Their Needs. W. R Deeter. Brother Deeter strongly emphasized the following points, Organization, Enrollment, Classification, Attendance, Home Department, and Teacher's Training Class. The greatest need of our Sunday schools is more and better teachers, teachers who can teach. Teachers who can make the application of the lesson so strong and so applicable to living that the Sunday school will be but a stepping stone into the church. The Sunday school must tie up with the church at large. The Sunday school is not receiving its full share of support, for, its income is only one-tenth the income of the church and it gives nine-tenths of the church members to the church. Does it pay to support such an institution?

The Teacher's Preparation. J. A. Garber.

In substance he said,—This is an age of Preparedness. Men can not go into the various professions without preparation. It follows that men and women who are to teach our boys and girls the spiritual things, must be trained.

Sterling Christian character is necessary.

There are three things required in the preparation of the teacher. 1.—He must have a thoroughgoing knowledge. He must know the person to be taught. He must recognize the teen age. The boy is not understood in the teen age, and he is a problem to both the parent and the Sunday school teacher. It is an age of responsibility, a heroic age. They are years of promise. The high water mark of conversion are at the ages of 12-16 and 20 years. The teacher must appeal to these qualities. We must provide for the social as well as the spiritual growth of our charges. 2.—The matter to be presented. The kind of material that is safe to give to our young people. 3.—Method. The teacher must be made, in part. Who is responsible for the making of this teacher? The church must make the teacher. Jesus taught his teachers so we must teach our teachers. The pastor should do this. It is a great opportunity for him.

Dyoll Belote the newly chosen state head of the Christian Endeavor, was given the next place on the program. He had had no time to make any preparation for this place, consequently he made no set speech but conducted his part as a round table. He called upon H. M. Oberholtzer, Quiet Hour Superintendent, who explained the Quiet Hour and its importance in Christian life. The Quiet Hour calls for at least 15 minutes each day to be devoted to a quiet and earnest study of God's word and prayer, 15 minutes is the minimum, blessings will be multiplied in proportion to the time given. Mr. Oberholtzer also offered many suggestions as to how this may be observed and as to how an organization in each society in the state might be effected.

E. A. Rowsey spoke very enthusiastically for a few minutes on Life Work Recruits, explaining the requirements of the recruits and laying special stress on their need. As an example he referred to the number of students now in Ashland College preparing themselvs for the ministry which is one way in which one may enlist his services with the Life Work Recruits.

Mr. Belote now called upon J. A. Garber, the National president of the C. E. societies of the Brethren church. He briefly reviewed the standard set for the societies in the Brethren church which is a part of the Four-Year Program. He made an urgent appeal to all C. E. delegates to take the need of meeting these goals back to their societies throughout the state. On the wall of each church in the state which has an Endeavor society will be found a chart, showing the aims of the Four-Year Program in the state and the requirements of each society carefully worked out, so that each society shall know just what it will have to do. This however, is a minimum and any society can go as far beyond meeting its share as it can go.

Thursday Afternoon Session

After a short devotional service, the regular conference program was resumed. The first speaker was G. L. Maus, his subject, "Financial Methods." He outlined the importance of having some business like method for meeting the financial needs of the church. He said all churches can support a pastor if they want to. There are three things that we can each give,—Time, Talents and Money. Three plans of giving were outlined but greatest stress was laid upon each member giving as God has prospered him. In order to get each member lined up on this proposition, it is necessary to make an Every-Member Canvass. This method will in no way interfere with the tithing system. If the Ohio churches fall down in this goal they will fall down on all the others. Pray and lay your plans.

A. J. McLain was the next speaker, his topic was "Loyalty to Christ, The Bible and the Church." He said, "Loyalty to Christ would of necessity include loyalty to the Bible and to the church. Christ, himself has defined loyalty. John and Paul displayed their loyalty to Christ. Loyalty means that we not only accept his life but demonstrate what he has taught us as well. Nothing need be said of the value of loyalty to the Bible nor need anything be said of its infallibility or inspiraton, for it is inspired. We must stick to the Word of God if we wish to preserve Peace and Right. Punctuate the Bible with doubt and you hand down to the rising generation a failure to believe in Christ. The reason that the Bible has not been used so much in family worship is that it has not been used so much in the pulpit. As to loyalty to the church, it has failed only when she has lost track of her faith. The Divine work of the State is to make the world safe for Democracy and it will under God."

"Ohio in the Endowment Campaign."

President W. D. Furry

Dr. Furry did not recite the dismal story that most college presidents have to tell this year that of a falling off in attendance and financial support. Most colleges are closing the year with a deficit, while Ashland College will come out a little better than even. Most colleges have lost 40 per cent of their students, while Ashland has lost but 20 per cent. The need of an education in a Christian college is more necessary than ever in this day and age of the world. The growing Godlessness in education in America and the world is largely responsible for the collapse. The only hope for the world order is the revelation of the Lord Jesus Christ. Ashland wants to make a contribution to the world to come. When this war is ended the world will enter into a new order of things, and the Christian church will have a great deal to do with determining what that order will be. No church is stronger than its leadership. It is no higher than its adequate leadership. Leadership must be developed in our own church colleges. If we wish to safeguard our church, we must preserve our College.

1.—Ohio must keep pace with Indiana and not fail in the Endowment Campaign.

2.—Provide for your children a college education and send them to Ashland. There is no greater opportunities than these for Ashland College.

S. S. C. E. Session.

The program for the rest of the afternoon was given over to the ladies and they rendered a program wtih the vim and decision that foretells success. The program follows,—

After the rendition of this program a short time was devoted to the conclusion of the conferense business.

Report of the Mission Board. Sec'y E. F. Miller.

The report was in three parts and each part received the approval of the conference. The separate items follow,—

1.—That the apportionments be payable quarterly, the first payment to be made June 30, 1918, and that each church's apportionment be increased 10 per cent over last year, and that the sum be distributed as follows: Columbus, $300; Canton, $250; Mansfield, $250; Rittman, $100; Fremont, $100.

2.—That the conferense invest the Mission Board with discretionary power to purchase a portable building suitable for holding meetings in Mission points, the same to be the property of the Mission Board and to be purchased from the Church Extenson fund. J. A. Miller, J. A. Garber and E. F. Miller were named to compose the committee to purchase such building.

3.—That the Board communicate with Rittman, Camden and Fostoria relative to holding evangelistic services and giving such assistance as the Board may deem advisable.

Report of the Committee on Conference Rules.

The report was read by Dyoll Belote and was adopted as follows,—

Preamble,—The Manual of Procedure approved by General Conference, so far as it relates to the District Conference, having been adopted by the Ohio Conference shall be the constitution of this conference. In addition thereto the following By-laws are adopted,—

I.—TIME AND PLACE OF MEETING

The Ohio Conference of Brethren Churches shall meet annually at such time and place as may be determined at the last preceding meeting.

II.—REPRESENTATION

The basis of representation shall be as follows:

1.—All duly accredited elders of Brethren churches of Ohio shall be delegates by virtue of their office.

2.—The several churches shall be represented by lay delegates on the basis of one delegate for every 25 members or fraction thereof above 15.

3.—The following auxiliary organizations of any Brethren Church of Ohio shall be represented by one delegate. The Sunday school, S. S. C. E. and C. E. society.

4.—Ministerial delegates shall present to the conference properly certified credentials. The credential presented shall be in the form adopted by the conference. Until otherwise determined, the forms now in use shall obtain.

OFFICERS

The officers of the conference shall be Moderator, Vice-Moderator and Secretary-Treasurer. They shall be elected by ballot by the delegates before the adjournment of conference and shall assume their respective duties at adjournment and hold office through the next succeeding conference. The duties of those elected shall be the same as usually performed by such officers. In addition to these officers, the conference shall elect such other officers and members of the several boards or departmental secretaries in a manner determined at the time of election.

III.—THE MISSION BOARD

The Ohio Mission Board shall consist of a President, Secretary and Treasurer elected by the conference for a period of three years and the members or the Board of evangelists elected annually by the conference. The missionary work of the church shall be intrusted to this Board under the direction of the conference.

IV.—COMMITTEES

The conference shall create the following standing committees:

(1) A Credential Committee to be composed of two ministerial and two lay delegates and the Vice-Moderator as chairman. This committee shall receive credentials at a suitable hour prior to the evening of conference and report immediately after devotions.

(2). An Executive committee composed of the officers of the conference and the pastor of the church where the conference is to be held, whose duty is the arrangement of the conference program.

(3). Conference shall also create from time to time such other committees as may be required.

PROGRAM AND DEPARTMENTAL WORK

The Executive Committee in arranging the program shall give recognition to all the interests of the church and the several departments of church activity.

V.—DELEGATE FEES

Each congregation shall pay a fee of 25 cents for each delegate to which it may be entitled to the Credential Committee when the credential is presentd. Such fees shall be used to defray the necessary conference expenses.

Signed, DYOLL BELOTE,
J. ALLEN MILLER,
E. G. MASON.

By a vote of the conference the above report was ordered printed in pamphlet form for distribution.

Report of the Committee on Resolutions.

Whereas, it has pleased God to bless so richly the Brethren church throughout the state, to bring us together again in Annual Conference:—

Be it resolved, we return to him grateful praise and pledge him more implicit and loving obedience and more unswerving loyalty to a whole gospel.

That, this conference express its appreciation to the Fremont church for the generous hospitality and everything that has been done to make our stay here enjoyable.

Whereas, the Brethren church has come to recognize the importance of the Four-Year Program,

Be it resolved, that this conference recommend to the local congregations, a more serious consideration to be given to, and greater effort put forth for the accomplishment of this great work which means a larger spiritual uplift to every member of the church.

Recognizing the faithful service of all our officials and committeemen who have helped to make this conference year a success.

Be it resolved that we express to them our hearty appreciation for their work.

Whereas, the State of Ohio is entering upon another campaign against intoxicating liquors, and

Whereas, the Brethren church true to her mission of saving souls, and bettering conditions of home and state, we do hereby resolve that we as a church will do everything in our power to put Ohio "over the top" into dry territory.

Believing without doubt that Ashland College is the key to a larger growth and greater efficiency of our ministry, and otherwise very vital to the growth of our church, be it resolved, that this conference recommend that all local churches recognize it to be their duty to support the College by their prayers, money, sons and daughters. Respectfully submitted,

W. R. DEETER,
ALVIN BYERS,
G. L. MAUS.

Statistical Report.—No statistical report was read at this conference because the report blanks were being revised at that time and there were none in stock except some very old ones. The Secretary sent these out to the churches but so few responded and the information was so meager that it was deemed advisable to withhold a report until the new blanks were out and then a detailed report be made to the national statistician and printed in the Brethren Evangelist.

Final Report of the Credential Committee.

The credential committee reported that a total of 70 delegates were present at this conference, distributed as follows,—

Sunday School—Savilla Holmes, Fair Haven; Ida Ware, Washington C. H.

Thursday Evening Session

The devotions were conducted by W. S. Bell and it was turned into an old-fashioned testimony meeting. This service was much enjoyed by all.

Rev. A. J. McLain sang a very beautiful solo at this time.

The Brethren in the Large City. S. E. Christiansen.

The speaker outlined the great amount of work waiting to be done in a large city like Columbus. He spoke of the great need of a change of heart in that city and the chance to impress upon our soldier boys the need of Jesus Christ. City mission work is either very encouraging or very discouraging. It means trying over and over again. The mission worker must be perfectly clean to carry the message of Jesus Christ. He must be willing to talk to and influence all. No church has a better doctrine than the Brethren church and no church has a better right to succeed than the Brethren church.

The special music for the evening was furnished by the Fremont Choir.

The closing sermon was preached by C. E. Beekley. Although a native Ohioan, Brother Beekley is a newcomer as a pastor in this state. Having recently removed from Cerro Gordo, Ill. He chose as his text Acts 26: 19, "Wherefore, O King Agrippa, I was not disobedient to the heavenly vision."

He reviewed the historical setting of the text. The lesson he drew was the fearlessness of Paul's Christianity. The Light that Paul saw was the Light of Jesus. Paul's change of mission was a change of vision. It changed the world. If you have not yet had the vision of Christ you have not entered upon the Christian life. Paul was a moral man but only a moral man until he saw Jesus on the road to Damascus. The cause of Paul's success was due to his paying heed to the call.

This sermon very fittingly closed a most inspiring and enjoyable Conference.

R. R. TEETER, Moderator,
E. G. MASON, Secretary.

TO THE CHURCHES OF MD. AND VA.

A very few of the churches of this district have responded to the appeal of the Board of Benevolences, July 7th was set aside as the time for a special offering from the churches of the district. Will you kindly remember this matter and lift an offering as near this date as possible? The Four-Year Program calls for $1500 annually or six cents per member, this ought to be an easy Goal to attain. Let us not be slackers in this matter. Remember the date. All money is to be sent to Rev. H. H. Wolford, Elkhart, Ind.

WILLIS E. RONK,
District Director.

A BRETHREN SUNDAY SCHOOL IN BALTIMORE

At the suggestion of the Mission Board of the Brethren church and upon the invitation of the members of the Brethren church living in Baltimore three ministers, Brethren Tombaugh, Riddle and Witter went to Baltimore on Sunday, June 23, to assist in the preliminary organization looking to the founding of a Brethren church in that city. Sister Vianna Detwiler also came across the bay from Ridgeley to be in the meeting and rendered most valuable assistance.

A group of twenty-one assembled in the home of Brother Wm. H. Bearinger. All were enthusiastic in their desire to see a Brethren work started in this city. They did not overlook the fact that such an undertaking means real work and great sacrifices but that did not cool the ardor of those present. A Sunday school was organized and a committee appointed to secure a suitable place for the meetings. Until the committee has found such a place the Sunday school will hold its sessions in the home of Brother Bearinger the superintendent.

There are over thirty members living in Baltimore whose names are now in the hands of the workers. Perhaps there are many more in the city. If you know any member of the church living in Baltimore will you please send his name and address to Mr. Wm. Bearinger, 151 St. Charles Ave., Arlington, Md. It is most earnestly requested of pastors that you will not fail to send the address of any member of your flock that has moved to this city.

One feature that gave encouragement to the newly-organized Sunday school was the fact that Sister Detwiler will be able to give them some splendid help until she returns to the work at Spokane which will probably not be before General Conference time. The outlook judged from the spirit of this first meeting is very promising. There should be a Brethren church in this great city for it is a center toward which many are moving and without a church we lose many members who come to make their home here.

M. A. WITTER.

SISTERHOODS, TAKE NOTE!

Apportionment time is near. Begin now to collect your dues if you have not done so already. Lest you wonder just how much you should send, remember this:

If you sent your January apportionment, send the remainder before July 31st, which should be forty cents per capita.

But if your society has sent no apportionment yet, send the amount of eighty cents per member.

Conference reports must be made before long and books must be completed. If you can send your money in during the early part of July it will be greatly appreciated.

Send all Sisterhood money to

Mt. Olive, Virginia

The Mt. Olive church enjoyed a season of refreshing during the month of May. On the evening of May 6th, the church began an evangelistic campaign with Brother L. G. Wood of Roanoke as evangelist. The first week was a very busy one for the farmers, but the attendance was encouraging and by the beginning of the second week visible results of the Spirit's presence were in evidence. Brother Wood proved to be a zealous personal worker, and with a car kindly furnished by an earnest family, he and the pastor made some ninety calls in the interest of the campaign. At the end of three weeks our united effort had been blessed with twenty-two accessions. Eighteen were received into the fellowship of the church by baptism, one by relation and one by renewal. On the following Lord's Day another was received into the church's fellowship making twenty-one additions to the church, both of young people and adults, as a very inspiring result of the campaign.

The writer shall not soon forget the warm fellowship with Brother Wood enjoyed during these weeks, and his prayer, with that of the congregation, is that God's choicest blessings may continue to crown Brother Wood's ministry and his efforts for the upbuilding of the church in his present field and elsewhere, wherever he may be called.

Immediately after the close of the campaign the Maryland-Virginia District Conference convened at Mt. Olive. This conference was the largest in the district for years, and was characterized by many delegates as one of the best the district has held. The splendid spirit and constructive work of the conference proved an additional encouragement to the congregation, and we feel that the Mt. Olive church is not only on the map, but that she will go "over the top" in the Four-Year Program campaign.

May the favor of God continually abide with the earnest workers here, and may the Holy Spirit guide those who have lately taken a definite stand for Christ and his church, that in his name greater progress may be made.

W. S. CRICK, Pastor.

The response by the schools to this fund has been most gratifying and quite encouraging to the officers of our Association; it indicates that the majority of our schools are awake to our missionary interests and appreciate the necessity of supporting our educational institutions in the preparation of Christian leadership for the future.

The next important job for us, as Superintendents, is the forwarding of the report of our schools for the Conference year ending with June. These reports ought all to be in the hands of Brother Wolford, Conference Statistician, by July 15th; so, that he can tabulate his report and forward the school reports to the writer by August 1st.

This is absolutely necessary in order that the report may be ready by Conference Time.

National Conference has placed the responsibility of seeing that these reports are forwarded to the statistician or the pastors. However, every live, loyal superintendent will assist his pastor in pushing these reports through promptly.

ALBERT TRENT,
Secretary-Treasurer.

Masontown, Pennsylvania

Since the last report from this place, four persons have been baptized, and received into the church. This evidence satisfies us that the Lord is still with us, and we are expecting further evidence of his saving power.

Brother H. F. E. O'Neil was with us for an address on the Y. M. C. A. in the army camps, and gave the splendid audience which greeted him a message which all will long remember.

We had our spring communion on Sunday evening, May 26, and it was one of the largest ever held in this church. It need scarcely be said that the pastor was much pleased, for on account of the very busy season, and the hot weather we were having then, he did not expect such an outpouring of his people.

We have just begun the fifth year of our service here, as pastor of the congregation, and are facing the future with hope. Each year has grown heavier in its demands than its predecessor, but that is to be expected. The war has added greatly to the burdens of us all, and few are deserving the charge of being a slacker.

The work of the congregation is going on smoothly, thanks to the faithfulness of the workers. Brother Kratz is making good in a splendid way, as the superintendent of the Sunday school, and the school itself continues to be a source of gratification to us all.

We are expecting Brother Beachler next month, and he will not go away empty. We are for the College and every other institution which the church supports.

MARTIN SHIVELY.

Report of Michigan State Conference held at the Campbell Church May 28th and 29th, 1918

At 2 P. M. the Conference was opened with scripture reading and prayer by J. H. English.

In the absence of the secretary, Hazel Roush was elected secretary pro tem.

The following committees were appointed:

Program Committee, W. O. Bowers, Ella Harris, Ida Phillips.

Credential Committee, Phoebe Mote, Dessie Lepard.

Executive Committee, J. D. Solomon, C. L. Henney.

An address of welcome was given by W. F. Johnson, who read the 13th chapter of 1 Corinthians.

Responses were made by J. H. English and Ida Phillips.

An invitation to take part in the conference work was extended to Brother and Sister Johnson.

The Credential Committee reported the following delegates present at the opening session—Troy, Mrs. Ida Philips and J. H. English.

Campbell—Hazel Roush, Charles Darby, Warren Miller and Ernest Cunningham.

Almena—J. D. Solomon.

The conference then adjourned.

The evening session was opened by Brother Johnson. A special song was sung by the choir. The evening sermon was preached by J. H. English, and was followed by a consecration service.

Wednesday Morning

Conference opened with a scripture reading by Ernest Cunningham. A talk on our part in the Four-Year Program was given by Lester Miller, followed with a discussion by Ernest Cunningham, Rev. Haladay and W. F. Johnson.

In the absence of T. F. Howell Rev. Smith talked on the subject of how to preach missions. This was discussed by W. O. Bowers.

Adjourned for noon hour.

Afternoon session opened with devotionals by Brother Bowers. The subject of the needs of the churches in Michigan was discussed by Rev. Johnson and several others.

Consecration services followed, led by Brethren Johnson and English, at which time one member was reclaimed and eleven were received into the church by baptism.

Officers for the year 1919 were elected as follows: Chairman, J. H. English; Vice-Chairman, C. L. Henney; Secretary and Treasurer, Walter Clark.

The conference closed with communion services at which time ninety were seated at the Lord's Table.

WALTER CLARK, Secretary.

Roanoke, Virginia

After an absence of about one month, during which time the writer was engaged in asisting Brother Crick in an evangelistic campaign at Mt. Olive church near Harrisonburg, Virginia, and continued until the district conference convened at the same place, I am now at work at the old stand. The local ministers filling the pulpit in my absence did their work well and to the appreciation of the congregation.

The work in all departments is moving forward and we are planning and praying, to avoid any "summer slump." The recent conference was said to be the best ever held in the district, and we were glad to have seven delegates in attendance, each of which came home inspired to undertake greater things.

The Mt. Olive Brethren with their pastor certainly did "go over the top" in a splendid co-operation in the revival campaign, followed by a royal entertainment of the conference, which was a fitting climax.

The children of our Sunday school rendered a splendid Children's Day Program, Sunday evening, June 16th, to a large attendance—many were heard to say "the best ever." We ask an interest in your prayers, that with an increasing vision we may have strength equal to our task.

Where to Place the Emphasis

A winning church will be characterized by at least three things. First, it will earnestly seek the truth. A fad will run for a season, and attract some. There yet remain thousands of people just like the ancient Athenians who "spent their time in nothing else, but either to tell, or to hear some new thing" (Acts 17: 21). A hit for the times will win for that time, and flourish until the times change. This is the history of all isms. Christian Science—a so-called religion—has reached its zenith. Like many another parasite, it has constantly lived off the orthodox churches, thriving among the "smart set," who rate themselves as "A 1 in society." The truth is always at home. It fits all times and seasons because it satisfies souls of stable qualities. God's word is truth. The church that takes the word of God, and nothing else, preaches it, and at the same time makes an honest effort to live up to it, has scored one winning point. When our fathers were guided by God's good Spirit to discard all of the creeds of men, and took the Bible, and the Bible alone, they took high and unassailable ground. Time may come and go, the age may advance as learning fills the land, but that foundation will remain as permanent as God himself. If we would win, put the emphasis here.

Second, a winning church will be religious. The world will never be converted by a worldly church, even if that church, by a Paul preached the truth. The truth preached and the truth lived is God's power unto salvation. It is pitiable to see a godly preacher with God's truth trying to convert the community to Christ and his standards, while his church people are devoted to their card parties and dances and theaters, attending the horse-race, the Sunday ball game and conspicuous members of such orders as have their buffet filled with wine, beer and whiskey. What can such a preacher do, backed by an influence like that? Let us hope that the sight of the beer wagon delivering its goods at such clubs, while the names of two preachers and a dance appeared on a program, will be a thing of the past.

But to my mind, the most sickening failure is with the church whose preacher seeks to make himself and his church popular by having it understood that he and the church are "liberal" about such things. Why, almost anybody with any kind of character can belong to the average church, if they have money or social standing. But the brave church and its brave preacher will see that the line will be drawn so close that God's people, clean and pure, will be arrayed on one side, and the wicked will be arrayed on the other side, and, each mighty army will be in battle royal to decide which shall possess the land—a battle in which no quarter will be asked, and none granted. The church that is religious prays and prays much. It prays in its families. It nurses its sick. It clothes, feeds and decently buries its poor. It keeps itself unspotted from the world by planting its footsteps squarely in the tracks of the Master. If we would win, put the emphasis here.

Third, a winning church must have the missionary spirit. To have a church that takes every offering, and then gets an offering from every member, would be the proudest record any preacher could make. With the decline in revival power comes a decline in almost every church activity. A real missionary people are soul winners at home. Business men are content to write their checks, but God is calling for men, men who will take time to press religion on the heart of his associates. "In the last days," says Paul, we shall have "a form of godliness, but deny the power." Meetings held on Bible lines, demanding repentance, prayer, and a conversion that means witnessing for Christ except when we happen to be in prayer meeting, are among the rare happenings of this formal age. Now we have our campaigns for members. People are urged to to join the church by signing cards. The process is as formal as joining a club, or political organziation. "The rugged old doctrines of sin, hell, holiness, judgment, and eternal punishment play little or no part." In fact, a modern union meeting carries little more conviction with it than the average summer chautauqua. The cheap evangelism of today is about all many churches know. "There is a dullness and lethargy among the people; it is next to impossible to make them feel the sinfulness of sin. Somehow the Spirit has been rejected and grieved until he can no longer get access to do his office work." Men want a genteel Christianity without too much Christ, a church membership without being "born again," creed without the Spirit, and a heaven without a hell. A great writer, and preacher recently said, "The greatest war now being waged in the world is not in the bloody trenches of Europe; the real battle is to determine whether our Bible shall stand as God's revealed word, or shall be cast into the religious junk heap by the influence of science (so-called) and New Thought philosophy. The trend is to discountenance the Bible by ignoring its standards, rejecting its authority, and ridiculing its doctrines." And it will require a battle royal to keep our own church true and steadfast to its time honored principles.

"Lift up your eyes," says Jesus, "and look on the fields, for they are white already unto the harvest." And just before his ascension he informed his apostles that that vision embraced the world. Its sweep covered the ages. Like other commandments of Christ, it knew no qualifications of sex or color. Neither oceans nor mountains were to be considered barriers. It was given through the chosen of the Lord to the chosen of all time. Responsive to this call came the heroes and the martyrs of the early church. In the Master's name they throttled pagan institutions, any they toppled from their age-long foundations. In his strength they cast out demons. Mighty triumphs crowned their efforts. On the illumated scroll of the ages, in imperishable splendor, shines the record of their lives. Their names are inscribed in the Lamb's Book of Life. If we would win, put the emphasis here.

Christian Arithmetic

An English journal has compiled the following rules for Christian arithmetic from God's Word:

Notation: "I will put my laws into their hearts, and on their minds will I write them."

Numeration: "So teach us to number our days that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom."

Addition: "Add to your faith virtue, and to virtue, knowledge; and to knowledge temperance; and to temperance patience; and to patience, godliness; and to godliness, brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness, charity."

Subtraction: "Let us put off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armor of light."

Multiplication: "Mercy unto you, and peace and love be multiplied."

Division: "Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and I will receive you."

From the Editor's View-Point

The Silversmiths of Ephesus

One of the striking experiences of the apostle Paul was that at Ephesus when the success of the gospel of Jesus Christ succeeded in arousing the opposition of certain craftsmen who had been making great gain through the ignorance and idolatry of the worshipers of Diana. When the demand for silver shrines they had been offering for sale fell off as the result of the people becoming Christians, then the opposition became marked indeed and one Demetrious called together others of his fellow craftsmen and voiced their opposition of Paul and the gospel to the rulers and asked that the teaching of the Apostle be discontinued immediately because it was hurting their business.

Only a few days ago the Central Federated Union of Greater New York sent a telegram to President Wilson asking him to oppose and to veto all prohibition legislation because over 1,000,000 wage earners would suffer severely should the manufacture of beer be discontinued, and that many more who are only indirectly connected with the liquor business would also be thrown out of employment. Realizing that the temper of the American people is such that they are no longer willing to be limited to two pounds in their purchase of sugar while the breweries consume many train loads of it constantly and that the doom of the liquor business is sealed unless some unusual method can be found to stop the onward rush of the "water wagon" these people have appealed to President Wilson to put his foot before the wheels in an attempt to stop its course. But the folly of it all! With 2,500,000 men already taken from the industries and professions and trades of America to make up the great American selective service army, and with the "help wanted" columns of every daily paper in every American city crowded with appeals for help in factories and field, and with the strong appeals that are constantly being made for more women to enter the factories to produce goods that the needs of the country demand, how foolish it is, and how frail the argument for the wets to contend that it would bring hardship or poverty to 1,000,000 wage earners to stop the manufactrue of the one thing in America that is a greater enemy to the welfare of our people than is Germany herself.

The Christian people of America have nobly stood by our President and they will stand by him yet, but they have not yet been made to understand why he has not used the authority Congress placed in his hands to stop the use of any or all foodstuffs in the manufacture of that which is not bread, at least for the period during the war. This lack of action seems all the more strange in the light of the testimony of the managers of big business as to the increased efficiency of all workers in the leading industries necessary to the success of the war where prohibition has been established.

While there is division in the Presidential family and some of the members of the Cabinet do not agree on this matter we hope this family jar may be adjusted in the interests of the whole American people and that the wets in the cabinet be quietly asked to seek other employment.

Having Eyes They See Not

It is not alone of the nations of the days of the prophets that the above words may be appropriately spoken, and neither may their application be made alone to what we term the heathen people of today. As there were people who were faithful to God during the worst periods of the history of Israel so there are those who are untrue to him during the very best periods of the most enlightened Christian civilization.

While Christianity has been the most beneficent influence the world has known for a perod of nearly two thousand years there have always been those who have committed the greatest of transgressions against all moral or spiritual law in the name of Christianity. Though Christianity is in no way to blame for this it has had to bear the burden of it because there always have been and there are now those who, in spite of what they must know Christianity has done for mankind, always bitterly oppose its teachings and its claims.

It may well be said that one of the reasons for this is the fact that some, if not many, will blindly make claims to virtues they do not possess and to a holiness of life that is denied by their living. It is said that the Kaiser has said of his own life, "Lookng upo myself as the instrument of the Lord, without regard for daily opinions and intentions, I go my way." Such an attitude can be but one of two things—the egotistical opinion of one who has eyes but sees not or the wilful attempt to lead a blind people by a moral pervert. If any one can see any indications that the Kaiser has done one thing during the last four years that is in harmony with the teaching of the Lord, or, in the light of revelations that have been made, for the past twenty-five years in the plans of the Prussian government any consideration of the Lord's will has been given can see more than can be seen by the most enlightened and active Christian minds of the present century. That the Kaiser is under the directing influence of any powers other than the powers of darkness is inconceivable to any right thinking person. The Kaiser has eyes to see, but they are wonderfully clouded over with spiritual darkness.

Perfection

We have no quarrel with the man who has a desire to "go on unto perfection," but we do question the perfect sanity of the one who claims to have attained it. Perfection is ever desirable, but one of the features that adds to its desirability is that it is ever just beyond and above one and is ever holding out an enticing goal that may lead one on and on to the most worthy and the greatest efforts of life.

But there seem to be those who think they have reached the acme of perfection and that there is room for no further improvement. Of such individuals the Hon. Meyer London has said, "Any individual who starts out with the proposition that he cannot improve and has nothing to learn is universally regarded as a hopeless fool." These are strong words but they state a mighty truth. The human race seems to have been made for improvement, and we cannot imagine any other form of animal life that has progressed, even under human direction, as has the human family, and any general claim to perfection would spell calamity to the race because it would mean the cessation of all attempts at self-improvement and world betterment. The thought that it matters not how much one has done or how great improvement one has made in his own life there are still better and greater things yet to be achieved is one of the mightiest spurs to worthy effort that can influence a human life. Yes, perfection is good, it is greatly to be desired, and is one of the most to be desired attainments of the human race, but we repeat that one of the things that make it so desirable is the fact that it is something that one may always look forward to as a possibility to be achieved in the future, if not in this life, then in the life to come, and this forward look is one of the most wholesome influences in the life of any man or woman. We would not have the progress of any individual nor of any group of individuals stopped by the thought that there is no more room for improvement while life lasts.

Women in Industry

One of the greatest changes in American life wrought by America's entrance into the great war is that of the relation of women to the industries of the country. The American women have always had exceptional opportunities to enter upon most any avocation they chose, but never before have so many taken advantage of their opportunities. We are told that there are now 3,378,998 women registered for service according to their specialized talents under the Woman's Committee of the Council of National Defense. The majority of them are registered for industries and agriculture.

To meet these new conditions thirty women are in training as Industrial Secretaries at Bryn Mawr College. The Young Women's Christian Association has appropriated $15,000 for the purpose and the work has the approval of the Department of Labor. While the circumstances that have brought about this great revolution in the industrial status of women are most regrettable, yet the greatest advanages afforded them as a result are a part of compensation the world gets in return for the great price paid.

REPORT OF CHURCH EXTENSION DEPARTMENT

Section I.—Prospects

Introductory.

For greater publicity, the report which would regularly be given at the coming General Conference will be given in sections on the Program page of the Evangelist at intervals during the intervening eight weeks. We trust that mission board secretaries, members of the General Missionary Board and interested pastors and conference officers will clip these articles and lay them away to bring to the conference as we cannot bear the expense of a pamphlet report. Moreover, since this department is not connected directly with the various agencies of church extension, its activities must consist of investigation, advice and education; therefore, this report assumes place of chief importance in this most serious problem that faces the church and its future. It represents the results culled from the reports of scores of investigators and reporters, covers the most remote corner of our territory, and has taken hours of valuable time as well as great personal expense. Some of the investigators have traveled long distances by rail and done most painstaking work in order that we might really know. Now we do know and know thoroughly, our problem. Hence our anxiety that these results may not be lost, that the activities of most serious minded men might not be slighted, in this first serious survey ever undertaken in the church.

The survey is complete. While all pastors in every district did not report, enough did report that with the supplemental information held by district keymen, mission board officers, evangelists, and volunteers generally, we know our possibilities well enough for at least five years ahead. The survey will not need to be repeated for some time to come. It is only fitting that here we should express our gratitude toward the men who have done their work so well; and especially the district keymen who have patiently performed a great labor of love.

Results by Districts

Experience is a ready teacher and experience has shown that it will not do to publish the names of these places nor describe the local situation. We are now facing a situation where too much publicity enabled another church to jump in with the result that it is spending hundreds of dollars a year to defeat our ends and making the work go hard. So all needed information will be in the hands of the district board secretaries, available to those who care to know. The possible fields reported are as follows:

Maryland-Virginia	10
Pennsylvania	7
Ohio	5
Indiana	7
Illiokota	7
Kanemorado	2
Southern California	1
Northern California	1
North West	3
Total	43

Three Classes of Fields

The above fields fall naturally under three heads. First, we note the rural fields, needy, sparsely populated, often poverty-stricken, where the continuance of the work will depend on the permanence of residence of the people. Under this head fall at least half of those reported from Virginia but not so from other districts. They exist in other districts, especially west of Indiana, but are not included in the tabulation above. Under this head fall many of the so-called dying churches and pastorless churches which give some of our good Brethren so much worry. Churches which never consisted of more than a score of members meeting in a school house till death and migration did their deadly work. We will call these prospective places Class I Prospects. They need attention and sympathy but their problem is comparatively simple as will be seen later.

Class II Prospects: Under this head we put villages, permanent centers of rural population which occasionally still exist, industrial towns and county seats where we already have a small nucleus and the opportunity is urgent.

Class III Prospects: This class includes mostly strategically located towns and county seats near some existing country or village church whose future is precarious apart from the life of the population center. The work at Leon which has been such a notable success was of this class. It had practically no nucleus but was opened up as a piece of Christian strategy. The life of the precarious country churches has been guaranteed, a separate town church has grown up larger than both country churches and the doctrine has an assured future in the county. The prospects of this class should be especially looked after as a conservation measure as well as an extension policy.

Revising Goal V.

Goal V of our standard calls for 40 new churches. The Director General is my witness that from the very beginning I have considered this goal at least twice too high. Having nothing tangible to base an objection upon, it was allowed to stand at last conference. Now that our full opportunity is lying before me, not only as to quantity, but also as to immediacy, I shall ask the next conference to put the goal at 10 churches, where it belongs, or to raise the figures for Goal X to $60,000. There is that much disparity between them.

Let us consider what 40 churches would mean. It would mean, first of all, forty capable preachers withdrawn from the regular pastorates to man the work. One thing is certain: this work cannot be done by inexperienced theologues as their first charge, preferably not as their second. Nor can it be done by men whose personality requires a peculiarly adapted field or who find it difficult to meet conditions in the ordinary established church. No man should be suffered to take up this work who has not been tried out and proven in some established church. It is not fair to the man and it is not fair to those who must furnish the funds. The one great qualification must be adaptability. Therefore, this work must be done by the normal, successful pastors. Such should consider it the crowning opportunity of their life and their manifest duty, once they have demonstrated their ability to handle any ordinary church, to leave the established churches to get along, as they surely will, and put at least one new church on the map. I cannot help consider the thoroughly capable man a slacker to the cause of Christ who all his life switches from one prosperous church to another equally selfish, possibly under the impression that his superior ability demands this reward. I prophecy that in the years to come the men of superior ability will be found among the builders or have their ability very much questioned. But to take out 40 such men at once. We cannot expect it.

In this connection it is hardly necessary to speak of the obvious financial problem of the support of this number of men, places to worship, oversight, etc. But there is a reason why the number should be placed at 10 above these obvious ones. A careful survey of the report and the present situation reveals that there are no more than ten of these places which can be taken before 1920. Some of these prospects are not strategically open now. In fact, this list includes our prosects for the next ten years. It is questionable if many new ones open in that time as this report is very thorough in its perspective and covers most of our logical centers. Of course migration has great possibilities, especially in the west and northwest. The continual stream of good Brethren going that way will surely, some day, make that the great Brethren center.

General Observatons

The two districts of most immediate opportunity, considering local conditions surrounding the prospective points, are Indiana and Illiokota. The situation in Pennsylvania is not quite so clear though promising to be fruitful. One situation in the North West clamors for attention.

Some of the pastors reporting seemed fearful that this department might lead to ill-advised and top-heavy expansion. Such fear is groundless. Rather this work we are doing will lead in the opposite direction. As we said last fall on assuming these duties, "our first word must be caution, our second word caution and our last word caution." No one is more aware than ther director of this department that we are on a long, long trail. He has been traveling that trail for seven weary years with no end in sight. All we do and plan in this departmnet must be for the single purpose of organizing all the experience of the past, its success and its failures, that many weary steps shall not be taken in vain.

G. T. RONK, Director.

Love or Hate? BY J. S. C. SPICKERMAN

"Before I went to France and saw and heard for myself, I had a feeling that we should not hate the Hun, but rather his ideals and the things he stood for; but I have come back hating him with a bitter hatred—that means that our business is to kill Germans—kill them as fast as we can until they are beaten into submission, before we can make the world safe to live in."

Such was the statement of a clergyman, now a captain in the American Red Cross. Is that what Jesus taught? This war has made necessary many changes in our ways of thinking and acting, but has it repealed Jesus' teachings?

Certainly the Germans are wicked—unspeakably so; their acts and their ideals are hateful to us, and we believe they are to God; but they themselves are human beings for whom Christ died. "Our business is to kill the Germans." Jesus gave his disciples a very different commission. Was he mistaken, or have we failed to give his plan a fair trial? The Romans, who ruled the world at that time, were wicked, cruel, tyrannical. The atrocities that the Germans commit in war, they did even in time of peace; but he did not teach his disciples to hate them, or that their business was to kill Romans.

"Go ye therefore, and make disciples of all the nations, baptizing them into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit; teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I commanded you. Matthew 28: 19, 20. Have we done so with Germany? Some may say, "They have the gospel already." They have the words and forms of Christianity. They have been made disciples nominally; they have been baptized—as they define baptism; but they have not been taught to observe all things that Jesus commanded. They have been taught, in the name of religion, to observe many things that Jesus forbade; and hating enemies is one of those things. This preacher said it was no use to talk brotherhood and love to the Germans. Probably not now, while the passion of war is upon them; but there is abundant evidence that Germans can become real Christians.

The Gospel that conquered the cannibals of the South Sea Islands could have conquered them, too. It would have cost something. The missionaries would have been persecuted, for the German government would not have consented to the preaching of doctrines so contrary to its ambitions. It would probably have cost many lives, as it has in heathen and Moslem countries; but it is God's command. Instead of giving them the Gospel, we have allowed their infidelity to corrupt us. The materialism that has made Germany what it is, is being taught in many colleges and churches in America. We have been at ease in Zion, and looked on the Great Commission as a mere side show. Then, when the false teachings which we should have overcome with the gospel, have ripened into horrible deeds men tell us that we are justified in both fighting and hating them.

I am not arguing against this war. It is no longer a subject for argument. Whatever we think about it, it will be fought out until Germany is decisively beaten, and the world made safe for democracy, as far as force can accomplish that end. But I do protest against advocating the spirit of the world—the spirit of Germany—instead of the spirit of Christ.

Business Is Business. BY E. M. COBB

No sane man, especially a business man, would attempt to deny that business is governed by laws which are just as inexorable as the law of gravity or the refraction of light.

To introduce sentiment or romance into business, ignoring the economic laws that govern trade, and paying no attention to supply and demand, would be but to fail. No man can hope to do such things and succeed. There can be no question about one's fidelity to debit or credit if he would succeed; for it is an established fact that absolute fidelity and adherence to this principle is necessary in order to know the business, and not to know the business means failure.

The man who is at the head of the business, that is a successful business, is a man who has wound his way to the top through a successful performance of all the duties assigned him while in the different departments as he was promoted from one to the other. All elements in a business which do not pay should be eliminated. Business in which the service of machinery is employed demands that the wheels be kept in motion in order to make the business pay. Idle machinery is a dead expense. A man cannot afford to let machinery rust out, yet he can well afford to let it wear out, if it be carefully done. In the same relation a man is not justified in keeping a larger clerical force than can be utilized to the benefit of the business, and yet every clerk should be employed which will add system, expedition and hustle to the business. There is nothing in the world so valuable to business as system, and yet a business may be systematized to death. If the system is not curtailed to brevity, each order that the firm receives causes a heavier expense in the receiving, filing, receipting, recording, etc., than the manager, at first recognizes.

Again, the time has come in the mercantile sphere when promptness is indispensable. The business firm today, which does not reply immediately to their correspondence, does not receive the proper amount of respect and credit from their constituency. Although the system of a business may require it to take the form of rigidity, yet there is no business on earth that can afford to be perpetrated in any other than a friendly attitude, a sympathetic spirit and a continual respect for the rights, privileges and necessities of other people.

There can be no gain, temporary or permanent, monetary or otherwise, derived by harshness, indifference, or overbearing methods toward employees. Such an attitude makes no money, develops no man's business and gives no assistance to a financial enterprise. It is an inherent weakness in any business where the best of feeling does not exist between all parties concerned, and more especially between the employer and employe.

The growth and development of no business is really healthy and strong until it is a demonstrated fact that every person connected with it is made to feel that he is justly remunerated and justly treated and has an interest in the rise and progress of the business. Sometmes it is possible for employees to have financial interest in the business; in other cases this is impossible. In such cases the interest should be provided for in another way. Nothing short of this gives real strength to any business. The proverb, "In union there is strength," applies here as well as anywhere else.

Another feature which business men cannot afford to overlook is entertainment. Busy people are not supposed to be bothered In business houses time is counted by minutes and seconds, which is absolutely right, and yet what business is there, which is desirous of the public becoming acquainted with it, can afford to spend money on advertising on printed pages and at the same time not allow visitors to pass through the institution? When the public comes in contact with a man who has visited a great factory, it becomes a great deal better acquainted with the functions of that business, in its relation to the world, than it would have been had it seen placards, posters and reading notices by the thousands, almost times without number. In this manner many a business has made may a friend. On the other hand, discretion must be used in this relation, as well as all others. Anything can be overdone, and yet there is no reason in the world why any honorable business cannot be conducted according to the most severe business management, and yet with a spirit of kindness and philanthropy pervading the whole institution.

Now, so much for the introduction—here is the sermon. Why not apply business methods and horse sense in our church work? In my travels I see so much carelessness that is almost criminal. No departmental managers. No co-operation; No system; No cordiality; No invoicing; No checking up. How many pastors answer reports and correspondence? How many report in percentages? How many KNOW the goods you are selling as well as the goods displayed by your competition? I think its time we demand real systematic work done in the local church, the same as we do at Conference. Don't you?

General Conference

By E. L. MILLER, Chairman Executive Committee

Since Brother Garber, Secretary of the Executive Committee of General Conference, has spoken, it might now be in order for some of the rest of us to express ourselves. Relative to making the conference a "Top-notcher," Brother Garber surely gives us the proper inspiration. Not only have other churches put on "full steam ahead" this year, but they have done it in answer to the urging of our president that we let not the church programs suffer or be decreased. Rather we should increase them, and meet to plan for the years to follow the present world conflagration. If we would do even our patriotic bit, leaving the religions out of it altogether, we must get together, confer, and carry on the work of our beloved church. And then when you add the Master's, "Go ye," I am sure you can not conscientiously add, "except in times of war or stress." The first draft of the program for the conference, as drawn up by Brother Garber, has been through the hands of the executive committee, and I will say that it promises big things. You who can get to Winona cannot afford to miss the treatment of religious and national questions that the leading men of our own church and some from outside are going to give us. Don't cut your expenses at the expense of your soul and its development. Let every church plan to send its pastor and at least one other delegate, and a renewed zeal for all manner of religious work will be noted in your midst. Loyalty to the principles of Brethrenism is going to be shown by our standing in with all the efforts to propagate our plea. No influence for such propagation is greater than that of General Conference. Many young men in our ministry got their first real vision of the things to be done when at this assembly. Besides, if we would make our Four-Year Program a reality, we must get together for inspiration and planning. So then do it.

CONFERENCE ON PROPHECY

A Conference on Prophecy will be held at Winona Lake, August 7-15. The widespread interest which is manifest in the relation of the world crisis to prophecy and the Lord's return is being shown in many assemblies. Even our secular papers have contained accounts of great gatherings in the British Isles during the past year or two. The recent Conference at Philadelphia, so largely attended, was an indication that America is also interested in these same great questions.

The speakers who have been invited to come to Winona are: Dr. James M. Gray of Moody, Dr. A. C. Zenos of McCormick, Dr. P. Y. Pendleton of Iowa, Bishop E. C. Hughes, Prof. A. F. Wesley of South America, Pres. C. M. Blanchard of Wheaton College. Dr. W. B. Riley, Dr. J. C. Massee, Dr. D. Heagle and others. Most of the speakers have indicated their intention to be present. Pres. Geo. W. Taft, D. D., of Chicago will preside at most of the sessions.

Those named belong to many schools of thought, and many denominations. There is no attempt on the part of the management to force any particular views upon their auditors. The only limitation that has been placed upon the speakers is that those in charge have endeavored to secure those who believe the Bible and consequently believe in the personal, visible return of the Lord Jesus. Each speaker is alone responsible for his message. The thought of debate and controversy will be avoided, although the addresses will usually be followed by written questionnaires. The attempt is being made to have outstanding Bible students, who are in touch with the mighty current of modern events furnish instruction along the line of these vital questions.

This Conference on Prophecy will precede the great Bible Conference which has been the outstanding event of its kind in the Central States for many years.

"For thus saith the Lord God of Israel, there is an accursed thing in the midst of thee, O Isarel; thou canst not stand before thine enemies until ye take away the accursed thing from among you."

In contradistinction to the weak charge of skeptics that the war of the world has caused faith in the Holy Spirit to falter, millions of men and women of all creeds, strong in the belief that right is might, have entered the lists against the common enemy—drink.

This concentration of the forces of righteousness against those evil, is in the form of an organization of church establishments, their subordinate bodies and of civic, industrial and temperance assocations throughout the United States. This, the National Dry Federation, has opened a campaign to continue 60 days, to obtain the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicants for the duration of the war.

Led by William Jennings Bryan, more than 18,000,000 persons have gone forth, girded by the guerdon of God, to give battle. Their campain headquarters are in Chicago where W. G. Calderwood, of Minneapolis, Minn., directs the movement. Aligned in the campaign are the Federal Council of Churches, United Society of Christian Endeavor, General Baptist convention of North America, Northern Baptists' convention, Methodist Episcopal church, Methodist Protestant church, Disciples of Christ, Presbyterian church of the United States, United Presbyterian church, Reformed church in the United States, Reformed Church in America, Church of God, Universalist church, Seventh Day Adventists, International Reform Bureau, National Reform Association, International Prohibition confederation, Intercollegiate Prohibition association, National Prohibition Committee, Catholic Priests' Prohibition league, Women's Prohibition league, Independent Order of Good Templars, Sons of Temperance, National Trades Union Dry league, Dry Federation of Pennsylvania, Union League club of Cincinnati and the state W. C. T. U. of Indiana, Pennsylvania and Kentucky.

The most forceful, most vital phase of the fight is declared by its leaders to be a national conservation of the enormous quantities of grain now wasted in the manufacture of liquor and the application of the men, money, labor and other elements of the vicous traffic to the successful prosecution of the war.

It is planned to send into each of the 2,993 counties in the United States an organizer who will bring to the church and to the mart and to the fields and to all others in the vineyard of the the Lord the clarion call from on high.

Each herald and marshal of the battle is aligning his forces so that there shall go to the halls of congress more than 250,000 telerams, urging, pleading, demanding interdiction of intoxicants while men die and women are in agony for an ideal.

To the people, awed yet not afraid, the National Dry federation sends this message:

That victory will come to this land not so much by bullets but by bread. That the cataclysmic conflict overseas will be won not alone by the sword but by the sheaf. That each side, worn, in the grip of death, having tried but failed to blot the other, sees the end. That that which is now wasted in drink will make the world safe for democracy. That the war will not be won by a whim of fate but by the side which saves most.

In substantiation the National Dry federation presents these facts:

While babes die and frail mothers and valiant men cry feebly for bread on the ensanguined fields of Europe, more than 52,000,000 bushels of grain are wasted annually in the United States in the manufacture of liquor.

While the earth cries aloud for surcease and the light if life is denied myriads of men, millions of bushels of grain are sent to distillers and brewers in Europe to form the dregs of the cup of sorrow that runneth over.

More than 70,000 soldiers recently were recalled from the British front to take the places in munition works of men made drunk.

Brewers in the United States use enough grain annually to make 5,000,000 loaves of bread daily.

Reports by the Interstate Commerce Commission for 1914 show that more than 500,000 freight cars were used to haul almost 8,000,000 tons of liquor. Later reports show almost similar conditions. This when the world looks to the United States for the salvation of humanity.

In 1917 the liquor traffic wasted the work of 300,000 men. In 1917 the liquor traffic wasted millions in money while millions of men sweated and became weary for all that life held dear.

More than $2,000,000,000 are spent annually in the saloons of the United States and more than $2,000,000,000 additional are lost by inefficiency due to drink.

In 1917 brewers of the United States wasted more than 3,000,000 tons of coal. And then came heatless Mondays.

Almost 66,000 persons die in the United States yearly from the direct effects of liquor; several times as many die from disease indirectly due to drink.

In all the world last year more persons died because of drink than were slain in battle on the English and French lines. This is proved by data of insurance companies of Britain and the United States.

Uless the government in Washington heeds the whelming cry for prohibition during the war it doubtless will endure more heatless days, lightless nights, wheatless days, meatless days, short bread rations, food and fuel riots, idleness and crime.

Of those in the ministry it is asked that from the pulpit they instruct each member of their flock to send three telegraph messages to Washington—one to each of the United States senators and one to the representative of the congressional district demanding prohibition during the war. Every organization, religious, social, civic, philanthropic, industrial, commercial, fraternal, educational, every co-ordinated activity of life will be urged to send similar telegrams.

And in answer to this mighty cry a day is seen a day in which of the fruits of the field there shall be naught but bread, when there shall flower in the hearts of men the love that passeth understanding.

A League of Nations

In a letter to the Archbishop of Canterbury, made public today, Secretary Henry A. Atkinson of the National Committee on the Churches and the Moral Aims of the War expresses the opinion that the ministers of the United States overwhelmingly favor the organization of a League of Nations. Dr. Atkinson bases his belief on replies to a letter addressed by the National Committee to church leaders throughout the country. Out of 400 answers representing virtually all denominations and states, only six were unfavorable to the League of Nations proposition. Four of these opposed any discussion of the problem during the war. The other two are Quakers, who wrote that they could not conscientiously favor any league that would sanction the use of armed force.

The National Committee undertook this canvass as the result of an apepal for support of a League of Nations issued by the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of Winchester, Oxford, Southwark and Peterborough, the Moderator of the Established Church of Scotland and other prominent British clergymen and addressed to the Christian Nations of the World.

"There is no doubt," says Dt. Atkinson in his letter, "that on this fundamental question of both war and peace the churches of America and Great Britain are in close accord."

Copy of his letter to the Archbishop follows:

"It is my privilege to present to you, and through you, to the Christian Communions of Great Britain, the results of an inquiry addressed to a representative list of ministers of the United States of America, seeking their opinion of the proposed League of Nations.

"This inquiry was prompted by the appeal for support of such a League, addressed to the Christian nations of the world by the distinguished representatives of the British churches including Your Grace, the Bishops of Winchester, Oxford, Southwark and Peterborough, the Moderator of the Established Church of Scotland and others of various denominations.

"The National Committee on the Churches and the Moral Aims of the War sent copies of this appeal to ministers throughout the United States, with a letter declaring our belief that a great majority of church people in America agree with the principles there expressed and that determination to win this war against Prussian Autocracy will be strengthened by the Universal hope of such a new world order as the chief compensation for these days of sacrifice and sorrow.

"This belief has been overwhelmingly confirmed. Of four hundred answers to our letter, representing virtually every Protestant denomination in every part of the country, all but six are in harmony with the general principles set forth in your appeal. Of these six, four without passing on the merits of the League of Nations' plan, declared the writer's opinion that discussion of the project is out of place at the present time.

Two members of the Friends' church wrote that they could not consicentiously subscribe to the principles of a League of Nations which contemplated the use of armed force.

"Such a response is especially gratifying to this Committee, since all the speakers we are sending through the country to address gatherings of ministers and prominent laymen are spreading the doctrine of a League of Nations as one of the highest and most unselfish of the war aims to which the United States has been committed through the utterances of President Wilson.

There is no doubt that on this fundamental question of both war and peace, the churches of America and Great Britain are in close accord."

American Church Official Honored in Paris

For the first time in its history, the Divinity School of Paris has overstepped its traditions and has conferred the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity on Rev. Charles S. Macfarland, General Secretary of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, now in Paris as the Federal Council's special commissioner to aid the French Protestant churches.

That Dr. Macfarland brings more than spiritual sympathy anl aid was shown at a recent meeting of the French United Protestant Committee for War Relief in France and Belgium, held in the church of the Oratoire, Paris, when he formally presented to the Committee 100,000 francs which had been raised in this country by the American United Committee on Christian Service for Relief in France and Belgium.

In speaking before the Committee, Dr. Macfarland said, "If, in this hour, we should falter and should fail, it would turn the world back for generations. It would mean that international morality would perish from the earth and its renaissance would wait for the future to develop a new nation upon earth. Democracy would be a specious pretence. Liberty would find its way to the nomenclature of satire and derision. Equality would be the merest cant. Fraternity would cease to be even the semblance of an affectation. All of our long cultivated ideals of international benevolence our conceptions of international morality, our apprehensions of brotherhood, our whole moral universe, all that has been the cargo of what we in America have loved to call the Ship of State, should we today accept unholy compromise, would all, to use a term now classic, be spurlos versenkt?"

The messages presented by Dr. Macfarland "To the French People" and "To the French and Allied Armies" have made a deep impression and have been given wide publicity in the French press, with appreciative editorial comment. Maurice Barres, of the French Academy, says in Echo de Paris, "France has never in the course of centuries received more beautiful messages than these." Dr. Macfarland, who during his stay in France is the guest of the French Government, has been received by President Poincare and Premier Clemenceau. The latter expressed great satisfaction with American progress in the war and greeted Dr. Macfarland as "the first of the second million men."

The Sunday School

The World's Greatest Book--How We Got It

BY A. D. GNAGEY

The Rev. John Thomson Faris, formerly associate editor, and since the death of the Rev. J. R. Miller, of blessed memory, editor of the Sunday school literature of the Presbyterian Board of Sunday School Work, a few years ago wrote a book entitled, "The Romance of the English Bible," which in some three-score pages tells the journey of the Word through manuscript and language to a version our day knows and understands. It is a long journey, but not a tedious one, though the process of development by which we came in possession of the Bible in its present form, involved years of toil and studious labors.

Many have always accepted the King James Version of the Scriptures as though it had suddenly appeared, just as we have it, with no thought of the long years of toil and struggle that made its appearance possible. Like the good old preacher who refused to learn to read the Greek Testament because, said he, "If English was good enough for Paul it's good enough for me," We accept grandfather's version of the Word of God without knowing what battles and prayers gave it to our worthy ancestors.

The days from the papyrus scroll to the Bible printed on a Hoe press are many, and in their slow passing have been full of gradual developments, not only in historical and political movements, but also in those movements of mind and heart that have to do with religious truth. The discovery, copying, and comparing of Hebrew manuscripts, the translating into Greek and Latin, the interpretation of the text according to bias and prejudice, all took time, and, too often, filled the years with a flow from a turbid stream instead of the River of Life.

The work of the revisers of 1611, who were the best Hebrew and Greek scholars of the time, their method of procedure, the influence of the diction of the King James Version upon the language and literature of English speaking peoples, and the influence of the truth it carries upon individuals, society and governments, is as interesting as any novel. The story of the Revised Version of 1881-1885 and the American Standard Version, is also alive with the patient toil of earnest scholars, who performed their labors in a better light and surrounded by the accumulated collateral knowledge of the years, making the results of exploration parties, the new shades of meaning acquired by the efforts through the years to translate the Bible into foreign languages, and the centuries of new human experience, serve them as assistants.

The whole story is told in the little booklet by Dr. Faris, containing 63 pages and may be had for the small sum of 25 cents. I have asked myself a score of times during these months while engaged in preparing the series of Studies in the Christian Life, which are now being studied by approximately thirty millions of people, old and young, do we fully appreciate what it has meant to in patient toil and sacrifice to give us the Bible in our own tongue. Gratitude beyond measure should be ours this day who, looking back over the years that gave occasion for its intense expression, are able, in quietude and peace, to say:

The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want.
He maketh me to lie down in green pastures;
He leadeth me beside the still waters.
He restoreth my soul:
He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for his name's sake.
Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death,
I will fear no evil; for thou art with me;
Thy rod and thy staff, they comfort me.
Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies;
Thou anointest my head with oil;
My cup runneth over.
Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life;
And I will dwell in the house of the lord forever.

THE BIBLE AND THE GIDEONS

Everybody has heard of the Gideons, the 15,000 traveling men who hold religious meetings in hotel lobbies, promote clean speech and temperance among their fellows, and speak of Christian work in the churches. Most people know of them by their work of putting Bibles into every guest-room in every hotel in the land. Thus far they have succeeded in putting 175,000 Bibles into hotels of all grades, and are still placing 5,000 a month in city and country.

A good many people have been skeptical about the plan and ask quizzically, "What's the use?"

In the first place a million people sleep in hotels every night either temporarily or as a home. At the best it is a poor substitute for home. Tired, weary, lonesome, often homesick, the traveler or wanderer wonders, "What shall I do with myself?" If then the eye catches the Gideons' Bible in its attractive cover on the table, with suggestions inside for Bible reading—either from curiosity or in sheer desperation the man will open the book and begin to read.

Not only is this good psychology, but it is good in practise and results. Many a romantic and thrilling story has come to the Gideon headquarters of the good that has been accomplished.

In San Francisco a man went to his room in the hotel with the intention of committing suicide. He placed the bottle of poison on the table preparatory to swallowing it, but noticed the Bible. He opened it and read, "If discouraged or in trouble read Psalm 126 and John 14." He did and threw the bottle out of the window. Today he is an active Christian and a power in the church.

Another man had an appointment to elope with a woman, leaving wife and children in the lurch. Waiting in his room he cynically took up the Bible. Soon he became interested and time fled He looked at his watch. The train and the woman were gone. His home, his reputation, his honor were saved. He went home.

A woman fighting the fight of her life picked up the Bible for a joke and found the seventieth Psalm. It gripped and saved her from ruin.

An actress sent money to the Gideons for a Bible of her own; a fugitive from justice read the message and gave himself up. The wayfarer, the discouraged, the prodigal have all sent messages to the Gideons of the help they have received. Thousands have read and silently resolved to return to their mother's Bible and her God. It is a silent but potent reminder to every man who enters the room of God's word and God's way with men.

Does this answer the question, "What's the use?"

THE BIBLE CLASS HELPING THE GIDEONS

A young man, a member of an organized men's class, hailed his pastor, the teacher of the class, on the street the other day and proposed a new line of work for the class.

He said, "I was in Buffalo last week attending a convention of men engaged in the same line of work with myself. When evening came the rest of the men went in a body to the theatre. I did not care to go, and went back to my room at the hotel, alone. I was feeling pretty lonesome and heavy hearted. (He has recently lost a father to whom he was devotedly attached.) When I walked over to the dresser, there was a Bible, presented to the hotel by the Gideons, a society of Christian traveling men. You don't know how good the sight of that book there in a strange place made me feel. It warmed my heart. I felt as if I had found an old friend."

After he had in words something like these told how he had been cheered and helped by the Gideons' Bible he continued, "Why cannot our class put Bibles into the hotels in our own town?" His pastor replied, "Splendid idea. That will be a fine service for the class to undertake. Now you go ahead, won't you, and put it through?"

Does not this young man's suggestion offer an entirely feasible line of work for a multitude of other Bible classes? The Gideons can care for the larger hotels in the larger cities, but at least for some time to come, they are not likely to be able to turn their attention to the smaller cities and large towns and villages. It is in such localities that the Organized Class has its chance to supplement the work of the Gideons. It can see that there is not a guest room in a hotel unsupplied with a Bible.

Where the class is sufficiently large and strong it may undertake this service alone. Each Bible should in this case have a printed slip pasted on the cover telling the class by whom it is given, and inviting the reader if he spends Sunday in town to attend the class meeting.

In other cases it may be more practicable to have the organized classes in a community unite in supplying the hotels with Bibles; and in this case, of course, the notice on the cover should say that the Bible is presented by the Organized Bible classes of the town for the use of guests at the hotel.

Some returns to the class may come in the form of transient visits. But the best results of this service will be the hearts cheered and encouraged in the right way like that of this young man who proposes to Adult classes the new task of assisting the Gideons.

REVIEW OF
The Thought and Work of the Church

Only six weeks remain until the meeting of the General Conference at Winona Lake, Indiana. We are expecting to be able to publish the complete program next week. The time is now short and all churches and pastors should be making arrangements to do their part toward making this the very best Conference ever held by the church. Things worth while have happened since the meeting of the last Conference and unless our plans miscarry still greater things will happen in the future of the church, and the yearly Conference will have much to do with the success of the general work.

The report of the work in Washington by Brother Lyon should have appeared two weeks ago and comment upon it was made in this column at that time, but when the paper was made up there was no room for the report, and because of the complete report of the Ohio conference last week it was again crowded out, so we are glad to give it first place in the News from the Field in this issue.

H. H. Wolford's report of the receipts of the Board of Benevolences which appears elsewhere shows fairly good returns for the months of May and June, but though the offerings have been good from the churches that have responded they have not come from more than about one-fourth of the churches that ought to contribute to this fund. In fact EVERY congregation should make an annual contribution to this fund. The Brethren churches are slack along this line.

M. A. Witter reports that in the early summer he had a most enjoyable time assisting M. L. Sands in an evangelistic effort at Calvary, New Jersey. He also preached on two occasions at Sergeantsville. As a result of the few meetings held four members were added to the church, and Brother Witter found that the Brethren at both Calvary and Sergeantsville hold their pastor in the highest esteem.

On another page appears a clipping from the Martinsburg Herald which tells of the work of Brother Beachler for the College Endowment Fund in Morrison's Cove and of the assistance given him by L. G. Smith of Conemaugh.

H. L. Goughnour makes a most earnest call to the pastors and congregations to get their reports in so that the Four-Year Program Committee may get its report ready for the Conference at Winona. Only as the churches respond to these calls can the work of this committee be made effective.

G. C. Carpenter reports the offerings for May and June for the Kentucky work. An improvement is noticed in these offerings, but a still more marked improvement must be noticed before the missionary board can come to Conference and report all Kentucky bills paid.

As president of the General Mission Board Brother Carpenter makes an appeal to the brotherhood to come to their assistance in lifting the mortgage that has been held against the church in Washington, D. C. for many years. The members in Washington will raise a large part of the amount of the indebtedness if the general brotherhood will contribute the balance. This is a worthy cause and as the American people are being trained by the exigencies of war to contribute liberally to many causes there ought to be no difficulty in raising the small sum of fifteen hundred dollars.

The corresponding secretary of the Conemaugh, Pennsylvania church reports the leading events of the work of that congregation since the coming of their new pastor upon the field. This is one of the most active congregations of the brotherhood and its members seem to know how to go about doing big things for God and humanity.

O. E. Oxley, pastor at Tiosa, Indiana reports that the Tiosa church has reached Goal Two of the Four-Year Program by having more than seventy-five per cent of the membership present at their communion service this summer. Nine members have been added to this church recently, which was good work for a small rural village.

C. C. Grisso was recently called to spend a week among the Brethren in Michigan to whom he had ministered in spiritual things a few years ago. It was an enjoyable week to both the former pastor and to the people. Brother Grisso reports an unusual opportunity for rural church work at this place and a fruitful field if a willing worker can be found to enter upon the work.

The La Verne, California church has recently had a most blessed privilege of listening to the teaching and to the experiences of two missionaries that have been giving many years of their lives to the work in China. The Sunday school, Endeavor societies and the church at La Verne are making an effort to overcome the usual slackness brought on by summer vacations and they seem to be successful in doing so. This church seems to be especially wide awake to the possibilities of using the young life of the congregation to the good of all. The state Christian Endeavor convention appeals to them as a worth while meeting to attend and plans are being laid to that end.

Campaign Secretary Beachler reports the progress of his work for the College among several of the churches in Pennsylvania. His work has been interrupted somewhat but success still follows in his path. In the Pike congregation a little more than six hundred dollars was received. A more complete report will be made later.

Read Dr. Miller's call for missionary workers for South America and Africa as it appeals elsewhere in this issue. The call is urgent.

After a silence of some months Miss Detwiler again lets our readers know what she has been doing and what she still hopes to do in the work of the Master that always lies near to her heart. It is easy to see that the one thing that apepals most to her at this time is the need of more substantial support of the work in the great city of Spokane.

The work at Sunnyside, Washington is kept active and energetic even through the busy season of the year. Seventy members were added to this church during the last year. The pastor, C. H. Ashman is planning to attend the General Conference at Winona.

While the Brethren church at Dutchtown, Indiana, is one of our smaller churches, Homer Anderson, the pastor, reports that the workers are pressing forward and that the spiritual life of the church is improving. This church had suffered from lack of spiritual leadership for a number of years, but Brother Anderson will do what he can in the strength of the Master to lead them in the way of the higher life.

Around the Editor's Table

Doctrine and Life

Once again we think we are justified in using the word "never before." We know that these words have been brought into more common use during the last three years than in a whole decade previous to this time, but the times and the occasion demand it. They may be used thoughtlessly sometimes, but things are now and things are becoming as they never before were in the world and one may as well face the fact and make the best of it.

But what we started out to say is never before in the history of the Christian church, at least since the Reformation, have such great efforts been made to remove or cover up and ignore the differences that have held and that are holding the different bodies of the Christian church apart.

For some years there has been a growing demand for more unity among the churches and among all Christians. Church federations have multiplied and have reached into every nook and crannie of the church until today, unless one is identified with some kind of a federation he is regarded as an oddity.

That churches have separated and held aloof from one another on unjustifiable grounds can not be denied, and that there should be a greater effort made to get together on common Christian grounds must be admitted, but that there is no doctrinal difference among the churches to hold some of them apart so far as organic union is concerned must be denied.

The very life of the church is wrapped up in its doctrine, and a church without great fundamental doctrines which it feels called of God to emphasize and to give to the world has very little grounds for existence. That there are doctrines of men taught as commandments of God is certainly as true in some instances today as it was true in the days of Jesus Christ upon the earth, but there are great fundamental truths that must be taught as the distinctive doctrines of Christ, and unless these doctrines are taught by some church that has caught the vision of their significance they will remain forever untaught; and it is as a church gets this vision and proceeds to make it a part of its great mission to the world that it really gets life.

Doctrinal Preaching Unpopular

We know that within the last twenty years doctrinal preaching has become more and more unpopular, until today in many places, to insure a small attendance at a preaching service all that it is necessary to do is to announce that on next Sunday morning a doctrinal sermon will be preached, whereas only a few years ago such an announcement was sure to pack a church to the very doors. We know for we have experienced it in our own ministry. About twenty years ago we were holding an evangelistic meeting in one of our churches, but were doing no specially doctrinal preaching, when one of the good members of the church in talking about it said that should a preacher come to that church and announce that he was going to preach a sermon on baptism he would remain away from the service. Just a little more than one month later we went into another section of the same state to hold evangelistic services and preached a series of doctrinal sermons, perhaps three on baptism, and here we secured the greatest results in the way of accessions to the church that we experienced in all our ministry. So we feel that there is still a place for doctrinal preaching, and as the Brethren church has been built up on the emphasis of doctrines that seem to have been overlooked or neglected by some of the other church bodies, it would seem that there is still a mission for it to perform along this line, but in its efforts to teach a whole gospel it should include the whole world in its field, but it should be judicious and should use common sense in its teaching.

That some of our younger members, including some of our ministers are just a little weak along doctrinal lines must be admitted, and this weakness should be overcome in order to insure the growth and progress of the Brethren church that we feel it is entitled to.

We have had requests from different parts of the brotherhood for more doctrinal contributions in the Brethren Evangelist and we have requested some of the brethren to write such articles, but there seems to be a hesitancy among them to do so. Is it because they feel their efforts would not be appreciated? There should be no such feeling, for while we know many of our readers would pass such contributions by as they look through the church paper, yet on the other hand we know there are many other readers who not only need such contributions but who would read them with great satisfaction and enjoyment. It is true there is no place in the present generation for the old spirit of contention and intoleration of a generation or more ago, but there is a place and there always will be such a place, for a contention for the "faith once delivered unto the saints," and unless we make that contention ours we have very little to justify us in maintaining a separate church body among the many church bodies of the modern Christian world.

Doctrine has been the life of the church in the past and it will be the life of the church in the future, but it is not my purpose to make a dogmatic statement as to just what that doctrine may include. It is a broad term and may be given a broad interpretation or a narrow one as one may choose.

Lost in the Mails

When one thinks of the millions of pieces of mail that are handled and transported to almost every part of the world every day it is not to be considered a strange thing that an occasional letter or package goes astray. But it may seem strange to some of us that anything of ours should become lost, and we cannot understand why we have been singled out to become the recipients of these misfortunes. Sometimes a Sunday school fails to receive a package of supplies and they they immediately berate the Publishing House, or some subscriber to the church paper fails to receive his paper on time and then he wants to know why he has been slighted and why the employes in the Publishing House are so careless. Last week we received notice from the best customer we have in the entire church for Sunday school supplies telling us that his school had failed to receive over two hundred of the more than six hundred quarterlies ordered. But this superintendent is a business man and he knows the difficulties under which business is conducted in these busy days, so not a single word of complaint was offered, only a request to look into the matter. We looked up the carbon copy of the labels that had been written and found there were four packages and got them off with the next mail. It was more than ten dollars worth of supplies that we duplicated, but we want our schools to feel that we are doing all that we can to help them in the work they are trying to do and we are glad to help in any way that we can. But we do want the people to feel also that these are disturbing times through which the whole country is passing and that much of the cause for delay and for loss is to be found in the times as they are and as they will continue to be until the great struggle in Europe has been brought to a close and the world once more gets back to a normal manner of life.

A Word from the Christian Advocate

There recently appeared an editorial in The Christian Advocate which treated of matters in the official household of our President and especially of the difference of opinion of two members of the cabinet as they appeared before the Senate Agricultural Committee to make a plea for and against prohibition in America during the war. As the editor of the Advocate compares the character of the two men, Daniels and Burleson, the latter does not show up in a very good light. But more than what he has to say in support of prohibition we wish to call attention to what the editor has to say about the delay in the United States mails that publishers must tolerate and it is to be noted that this editor lays the blame at the door of the Postmaster-General who seems not to be equal to his task. We quote the following:

The Secretary of the Navy had nothing to say about politics, and his personal opinion was solidly based on the facts of his administrative experience. He said: "When Congress says that 2,000,000 soldiers and 500,000 sailors shall be denied intoxicants, I do not see either injustice or harm in making the same rule apply to private citizens. In the navy yards great improvement was wrought by the introduction of prohibition. Workers in the shipyards are as patriotic as men in the army and navy, and they are quite as ready to make any sacrifices needed to win the war. Prohibition was opposed in the Navy by a large oumber of officers, who feared its effect on the men, but there are mighty few today who would go back to the old order of things."

Who has the better right to speak for efficiency, the Secretary, whose department has discharged every war duty with amazing promptitude and thoroughness, or the Postmaster-General under whom the mail service has gone back to the stake-coach and post-chaise period? It is a fact that when The Christian Advocate commenced publication in 1826, the New Jersey mail-coach used to deliver the papers in Philadelphia before Sunday of the week of publication, a thing which now seems to be beyond the power of the postal service, though the edition is mailed on Wednesday.

If Congress wants testimony on the political expediency of proposed legislation, Mr. Burleson is undoubtedly its man. But the best witness as to efficiency and morale is the man who put the Yankee destroyers in Queenstown ready to fight the hour they arrived, who has guarded with sleepless vigilance the bridge of boats on which a million of our sons have crossed to France, and who has demonstrated to the satisfaction of nearly every one, except the liquor profiteers and their political attorneys, that the best way, the only safe way, for a nation to conduct its affairs in time of war is the dry way.

Mr. Burleson's way may win congressional elections—though we may be permitted to predict the opposite result—but Mr. Daniels' works, even more than his words, have brought even the reluctant to the belief that prohibition will help win the war.

Kentucky Mission News

Brother Cook writes: "A mining camp is going in at Chavies and I was talking to the president yesterday, and he said he would give us an old two-story boarding house and is going to rebuild it into a chapel. He will also send us an organ and furnish things we need and at Christmas time will furnish Bibles for all the people. We are looking forward to great things."

That sounds fine. Brother Cook has been conducting a Sunday school and has been preaching at Chavies for some time and there promises to be a large fruitage from his planting. We can well rejoice with Brother Cook when the work at Krypton is in the best shape ever and two promising nearby points are opening up. This news is encouraging to those who have been helping to support our Kentucky mission work during these years. May the Lord bless the work largely.

A New Worker

Miss Ruby H. Brewbaker is now at Krypton and writes: "Yesterday (Dedication Sunday) was a day of great blessing to all of us. Dr. Miller was here and we enjoyed the three services to the fullest extent. This work is very effective and the people are most deserving. I shall endeavor to do my best. I am liking it better than at first appearance. I took the teacher's examination at Hazard last Friday and Saturday."

The host of friends of our mountain work will be anxious for a full report of the dedication.

The S. O. S. Call

Recently we sent to the giver of every unpaid pledge an S. O. S. call for quick payment to supply a treasury of which we were scraping the bottom. Our Kentucky treasury is usually like the widow's barrel of meal, but now we can see the bottom. A word to real friends is sufficient. Societies and individuals that gave no pledges for the year will do a real service by sending their gifts anyhow and at this time. Friends of the Lord's work, let us go "Over the Top" to Conference with a clear record. Do your best and do it now.

Sympathy

The heartfelt sympathy of our mission workers and all the friends of the mission goes out to Sisters Ethel and Estella Myers in this hour of bereavement. A true and faithful Christian father has gone on before. The parting is but for a little while. May the Lord comfort the bereaved family, and help all of us to be as ready as was Brother Myers to meet the King.

Christian Endeavor's Record in Thirty-Seven Years

February 2, 1918, rounded out thirty-seven years of Christian Endeavor history. It is well to take account of stock, to count our many blessings, and from them draw encouragement and inspiration for the future. Even dry statistics are eloquent on such an anniversary. To many results of these thirty-seven years arithmetic cannot apply. Here are some that can be numbered:

1. More than one hundred thousand societies built on the Christian Endeavor plan, in thirty-seven years, nearly four-fifths of which bear our interdenominational name.

2. Fifteen millions of members trained in some degree for Christian service and in the practise of Christian fellowship.

3. One hundred million prayer-meetings held, each of which has exerted some influence for good, and given opportunity for the expression of the religious life.

4. Hundreds of thousands of committees formed, which have committed some form of definite, voluntary welfare work to these millions of young Christians.

5. Tens of thousands of union meetings and conventions held, varying in size from a few score to fifty thousand in attendance, thus vastly promoting the fellowship of the denominations.

6. Societies formed in practically every land and every evangelical denomination; over one hundred countries and their colonies and over one hundred distinct denominations in this list.

7. Uplift and rescue work undertaken for and by soldiers, sailors, and in hospitals, prisons, fresh-air camps, in engine-houses, on street corners, and in every conceivable place of opportunity.

8. Some forty weekly or monthly Christian Endeavor publications, in a dozen languages, and a large library of helpful literature published.

9. An eager response, since the war began, to the country's call for food production and economy, for Red Cross, Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. work, etc.

10. A hundred thousand Endeavorers in training camps or at the front, and societies formed in cantonments, regiments, and naval quarters.

11. This last year the best of all the thirty-seven, in increase and efficiency, in most of the countries from which the war allows us to obtain reports.

Endeavor Far and Near

G. C. C.

St. Paul, Minn., has an Expert Endeavor club to promote the study of "Expert Endeavor" and to organize study classes. In all 265 experts were graduated.

The Bronx, N. Y., union recently held a missionary "Trip Around the World," the entrance fee being a magazine to be sent to the boys at a naval station.

An Allentown, Pa., society recently collected clothing for a destitute family that the members had found in their work.

The Danville, Ind., Friends' society has bought a Liberty bond and also material to make clothing for a French relief agency.

At a great Christian Endeavor rally in Boston Dr. William Shaw, general secretary of the United Society of Christian Endeavor, unfurled a huge service flag dotted with stars, and with the figures "140,000" in the center. These figures represent a conservative estimate, based on reports, of the number of American Endeavorers with the colors.

Years ago the Rutland, Vt., County union secured two lady evangelists to do work in rural communities. At North Shrewsbury they revived a defunct church. Later another lady was employed and some thirty persons were converted. Of these, two young men became ministers of the gospel. Last year one of these men received more than one hundred persons into church membership.

At a Christian Endeavor convention in Dacca, India, sixteen different languages were represented. Many of the delegates traveled two days to reach the convention city, and one at least traveled five days. The favorite hymn used in the meeting was,

"Take my life and let it be Consecrated, Lord, to Thee."

The first soldiers' Christian Endeavor society in Great Britain was formed in the fall of 1916 in the military camp on Salisbury Plain. There were nine members. In spite of constant changes this society has never missed a meeting since that time. It is inter-denominational, inter-regimental, and inter-empire. It has a hospitality committee which has provided a rest room for soldiers.

The Old Grind

Yes, brother, it's the same old grind,
Monotonous and long;
A day of toil, of fret and broil,
Devoid of cheer and song.
But work is work, and time is time,
No matter where or when;
And you, my son, you are but one
Of countless toiling men.

The world outside looks good to you
Through window-glass each day;
Confinement seems to cloud your dreams,
And turns your skies to gray.
But work is work, and must be done,
No matter what your mind;
And every day you sigh, and say,
"It is the same old grind!"

Ah! yes, it is the same old grind—
Not much of joy in view;
But, brother, what would be our lot
If we'd no work to do?
Take heart, and let us do our part,
And bless the toil we find;
If work we'd not to help our lot,
'Twould be a worse old grind.

News From the Field

Washington, D. C.

Since my last report five more have been added to the church by baptism; two of this number, a young man and his wife, who have recently come from Ireland. But while new ones are being added to the field from time to time thus encouraging our hearts, we are also sustaining losses by yielding up our young men whose services are demanded by reason of the draft. We are beginning to feel this loss most keenly and the end is not yet. Then, too, many of our men employed in the various departments are required to work on Sunday, which, of course causes vacancies we can not help but notice. Surely these are days that are indeed perilous. We are made to realize as never before the need of prayer, I mean REAL PRAYER.

I'm constrained to believe, too that if it were possible to have all that is supposed to be prayer, changed into real prayer, surprising and marvelous changes would soon follow. Again let me remind you, (I now speak definitely to those who have been praying for us personally) that we realize perhaps as never before, the need of special prayer.

Permit me, please, to mention very definitely just a few things: First, the pastor has commenced a house-to-house canvass in the vicinity of the church for the purpose of reaching others who so far have no interest in spiritual things. Our city is being crowded more and more with people coming from all parts of the world, and we feel that we should put forth very special effort at this time in order that we may not fail to accomplish that which God requires of us. Will you not all therefore, remember your unworthy servant in the gospel, remember him daily at the mercy seat.

We are also praying that God may be pleased to open the way so that the loan of twenty-five hundred dollars on our church property may be lifted. The membership here is quite willing to do a liberal part, and we are persuaded that there are many others scattered over the Brotherhood who would enjoy having a share in thus helping to cancel the debt, if opportunity should come. Will you not also pray that our heavenly Father's will in this matter be clearly revealed. He can "touch hearts" so that this obstruction may be removed.

And just now I am constrained to speak of a certain experience which may prove of interest to some. Yes, I believe that it is pleasing to God to relate our experiences perhaps more frequently than we do, just so, we do it to please him! Even in the old dispensation God said, "Let the redeemed of the Lord say so!" Well, no doubt some of you still have in mind how that Brother Lyon praised God sometime ago by making special mention of the liberal giving of the members in Washington in connection with our Easter offering. Yes, I believed then and still believe that it is actually pleasing to God to speak of these things, as we may have occasion, and thus cause others to do more.

And yet, don't you know that I also believe that sometimes Satan seeks to retard God's work by making a wrong application in such matters. Just here my illustration may be applied. At the time I wrote the letter, (boasting in the Lord of course) and referring to the liberal response of my people at Easter, several of our members said, "Don't you think you've made a mistake?" They felt that it might have a tendency perhaps to cause some who had been liberal and regular supporters hitherto, to lessen their interest and contributions etc. Well, if I were to judge by actual figures and conditions as shown since that time, I would almost have to conclude that the results predicted have been realized. At any rate since the publication of that letter our needs have multiplied, and our receipts have diminished to an astonishing extent. Perhaps this is to try our faith. Friends scattered here and there over the Brotherhood, who have been led off the spirit to contribute to our needs, with more or less regularity for years, have suddenly ceased. But our heavenly Father, in his own good time and way will meet every need. At present the price of obtaining even the actual necessities is simply appalling, and increasingly so. May God help us all in these days of awful testing to wait only upon him! "Be still and know that I am God!" In this time of world-wide upheaval and conflict, let us all, as never before, implore his definite leading and keeping power! Will you not every one who really knows the secret of his presence, will you not remember us daily at the throne of grace?

Please pray for the fulfillment of Philippians 4: 19.

Sincerely
In His Name,
W. M. LYON.

Since the day for the offering all the district goal directors have not been heard from. So it may be that your offering is still in the hands of your district goal director. These will be reported as soon as received. If you have not sent your offering to the secretary or to your goal director send it to your goal director at once.

From these reports it will be observed that out of twelve churches in California and Pacific Coast five are reported. From Illiokota six out of sixteen; from Indiana nineteen out of thirty-eight, from Kanemorado five out of eighteen; from Ohio seven out of thirty-four; from Pennsylvania and New Jersey fifteen out of fifty-two. This count is taken from churches listed in the annual.

All together there has been contributed a little more than nine hundred dollars, leaving us still a little less than six hundred dollars short of our goal of $1500 or six cents per member. Shall we go over the top? It is up to the churches that have not yet reported and to those that have not yet reached their six cents per member. Your goal director has reminded you of this offering and asked you to reach the goal if your earlier contribution did not do so. It is now time to make good if you desire to reach the goals of the Four-Year Prgram. The account will soon close.

Sec. Board of Benevolences.

With Brother Sands at Calvary

On the 21st of May it was the privilege of the writer to go to Calvary, N. J., to help Brother Sands in a meeting. Brother Sands had the work going nicely, having started the meeting on the 12th. The attendance on Sunday nights and when the weather permitted was good. On three nights of the meeting heavy rains just at service time made attendance for those who drive autos almost impossible.

We found Brother Sands a splendid brother with whom to work. He has the love and the confidence of his people and while the meeting was in progress the church at a business meeting gave him a unanimous call to remain with them as pastor for another year.

The field cannot be said to be an easy one. The community is not over-churched for there were within a mile and a half of the church about a dozen men who make no profession of serving the Lord. These were like so many over the world trying to hide behind the imperfections of the weakest church member they know. When will men learn that every man must give an account of himself to God? Unfortunately there are always some who profess to serve the Lord who give occasion to the enemy to speak evil of God's people by living ungodly lives.

But at Calvary there are some good loyal Christians who were really praying for souls. And in spite of all of the hindering causes there was answer to these prayers in the confession of four brave souls. There is much more to be accomplished in this field. And under the able leadership of Pastor Sands we can expect to hear of more additions to the church here.

During the meeting it was a pleasure to visit Sargeantsville and to preach for them on two Sunday mornings. Here we found a band of faithful Brethren. They are much attached to their faithful pastor and were hoping that his decision might be to remain with them for the next year's work.

The memory of the weeks spent in this field and of the pleasant associations and splendid hospitality accorded us will be a most pleasing recollection.

M. A. WITTER.

Secretary's Notice

Brother Bame has called for the second report of the congregations upon the Four-Year Program to be in his hands by July 31.

This will be a quick, snappy, canvass—just the kind of an undertaking in which red-blooded persons like to engage.

The congregations will report to the District Director of the Four Year Program in their respective districts, and they will send the reports to Brother Bame. Please let no congregation, or district, fail to send a report.

The District Directors of the Four-Year Program will send the report blanks to the congregations.

If there are isolated congregations that do not receive report blanks from some other person by July 15, write directly to me, and I will send a blank at once.

Everybody remember: Upon this report will depend the standings of the congregations, Districts and the Brethren Church as a whole for the year 1918.

At the Brethren Church

Rev. W. H. Beachler, Ashland, Ohio, Campaign Secretary for Permanent Endowment of Ashland College, Ohio, came to Martinsburg Tuesday evening to begin his campaign in the Cove for Permaennt Endowment for Ashland College.

Rev. Beachler preached in the Martinsburg Brethren church Wednesday and Thursday evenings and will preach this, Friday, eevning and Saturday evening. Sunday he will go to Altoona and remain there one week. He will then return to the Cove and visit McKee and New Enterprise churches.

Rev. Beachler is an eloquent speaker and a good singer. Those who have so far heard him are well pleased with what they have heard. This campaign has met with unusual success. At Conemaugh, Pa., Mr. Beachler raised $5133.50. This is the high water mark and leads all churches so far canvassed.

Rev. L. Garvin Smith, a former Martinsburg boy, now pastor of the Conemaugh church, came here with Rev. Beachler to assist him in the opening of the campaign. Since leaving here in 1905, Rev. L. Garvin Smith was graduated with the A. B. degree from Depauw University, Greencastle. Indiana, 1911; B. D. from Drew Theological Seminary, Madison, N. J., 1916; B. D. Union Theological Seminary, New York City, 1917, and M. A., Columbia University, 1917.

The people of Martinsburg and vicinity are cordially invited to attend these services and enjoy Rev. Beachler's great sermons and sweet baritone solos.

The policy of the campaign is to preach at night and canvass the people in their homes during the day. No public appeal is made for money from the pulpit.—Martinsburg, Herald.

"OVER THE TOP" For Washington, D. C. Before Conference

"Over the Top" has become a slogan for every good movement and it fits for the one at hand. For a number of years your home mission board has held a mortgage on the First Brethren church property of Washington, D. C. to the amount of $2500 which made it necessary to use a goodly amount of mission funds each year to pay interest on that debt. From this the church and your board have been seeking escape.

Now there comes from the church at Washington, D. C., by her pastor, Brother Wm. Lyon, a generous proposition. They offer to shoulder $1,000 of the amount of indebtedness if the whole brotherhood will shoulder the balance of $1500. Your mission board has weighed the proposition pro and con and have decided that it can be done and ought to be done and now it is up to the Brethren church. How all will rejoice at the coming Winona Conference if the mission board can bring this burdensome mortgage along and make one bright and shining number of the conference program "The Burning of the Washington, D. C. Church Mortgage."

Here are the conditions. We will take your agreement to shoulder any portion of the $1500, the same to be payable when the whole amount is provided. And we hereby ask every church in the brotherhood to help nual interest on this mortgage. It ought to be done for the future success of the Brethren cause in Washington, D. C. The church there is in a splendid condition, the faithful and untiring pastor, Brother W. M. Lyon, is leading the church forward and he is praying us to stand by the church in the removal of this long-time mortgage.

Please do this: Let every one who reads this be a helper. Write the undersigned a card at once stating how much of the amount you will get under. Let every pastor or church official present this call to the church and then forward the writer the result. Let every Sisters' Society or Christian Endeavor official do the same and report. Everybody in line and we will go "Over the Top." More than a thousand readers ought to respond by return mail. The task of raising $1500 is a small one if there be no slackers. Your home mission board is your servant but they can serve only as the whole brotherhood co-operates.

remove the mortgage from the First Brethren church in the Capital of the United States. Every Sunday school and Endeavor Society and Sister's Society, every organized class and hundreds of individuals ought to help and thus the task will not be hard.

The Washington church has a heavy load at present to keep their local work going but they have bravely agreed to get under two fifths of this load. At first they thought one-fifth was all they could handle, but in response to an appeal from the writer to make their proposal one hundred per cent better there came the above generous offer.

This ought to be done for the sake of the local church located in our National Capital and for the sake of the whole Brethren church and for the sake of the larger work that your mission board will be enabled to do when they are relieved of paying out this amount of good mission money for an-

Report of the Conemaugh, Pennsylvania, Brethren Church

It has been some time since anything has been reported from our church through the Evangelist, but that does not mean we have not been doing anything. While nothing extraordinary has happened, yet we have been making progress.

First: Our church changed pastors, October 1st. Brother Hubbard brought his ministry to a close here, and the church chose L. Garvin Smith as his successor.

Second: On the evening of December 23, our church choir gave a musical program, "The Star of Bethlehem," which was well rendered and highly appreciated. On Easter Sunday the choir gave a cantata, "Our Risen Lord," which proved to be as great a success as, if not more so than the one at Christmas.

Third: Our Sunday school used the "White Gift" service at Christmas time again this year. Last year we used it for the first time and it was so successful that we decided to use it again this year. The church was beautifully decorated with white bunting and American flags. Back of the platform was a large canvas picture of the City of Bethlehem, and the light for the church was furnished by one very brilliant star and a white cross brightly lighted wtih many small bulbs. The Sunday school furnished a splendid program and all the way through it seemed like a "Holy Night." After the literary and musical program, the "White Gift" for missions was taken and when counted it amounted to $160.00—$57.00 more than last year, despite the war conditions. After the offering was received, an opportunity was given for anyone to offer his life as a gift to Christ. One young man made the supreme gift of his life to Christ. Then the entire audience stood for re-consecration to Christ and the church.

Fourth:—A revival for the church and community was held for about there weeks in March. Our territory has been well worked, but we hope to enter new fields and thus extend the borders and influence of our church. Since October first two have been granted letters, seven have died, and five added to the church.

Fifth: We were very glad to have Brother Beachler with us for about a week. We all enjoyed his presence and his sermons and tried to help him all we could in his campaign. The entire amount raised for Ashland College was $5133.50. Of this sum the Dorcas Circles pledged $1,000, and the Sunday school $500. The remainder was raised by individual subscriptions.

Sixth: The Children's Day service was held June 30th and everybody was well pleased with the efforts of the Sunday school boys and girls.

Another fact very worthy of mention is our Service Flag. This flag is made of the very best material and contains seventeen stars, representing the boys who have gone from this church. The flag always reminds us of the great sacrifice the boys are making, and of our duty to pray for them and help them in every way we can. May God bless the boys and the church from which they have gone.

Tiosa, Indiana

We are glad to say that we are still trying to do the will of him that sent us to this old sinful world. We can say that the church at Tiosa is leading out into green pastures and doing fine. We held a two-weeks' meeting, beginning the 19th of May. There were nine taken into the church. The Lord blessed us with his greatest blessings. Of course there are a lot more that we are praying for, that we feel will come later. We had good crowds all through the meeting. While the farmers were busy at their work, but they took time to worship their Christ. We observed communion services the 15th of June. There were about 70 that took communion. We are looking forward to better times, for we know the Lord has better things in store if we only prove ourselves faithful. We go over the top with Goal No. 2. As we had over 75% at the communion services. The Sunday school gave us a fine entertainment on the 16th of June. It was one of the best ever given at this place. May God bless the churches of the brotherhood.

"News From the North"

The writer was privileged to spend a week in the bounds of the Campbell Brethren church, visiting our friends and parishioners of other years. It was a source of pleasure to note the continued progress of the work, even though they have been pastorless for a long while. We preached three sermons to large, appreciative audiences.

On Sunday there was over one hudred present at Sunday school which I think is splendid for a rural church. During the past eight months they have added almost a score to their membership. A large part of this is due to the faithful superintendent of the Sunday school, Brother Lester Miller.

The church is at perfect peace and is working harmoniously in every way which adds in no small way to their continued success. The thing that puzzles me is that they do not have some applications for the pastorate. They have the field with possibilities for the making of a great rural church, if some one will answer the call to come and lead them forth. Upwards of a hundred souls have been added since the writer began work here five years ago, and as I see it the work is just begun. The church is the demand of the community and fills a large place. If some preacher wanting to take up rural work, and do a little farming as a side-line to pay expenses would investigate here I think he would do well. Anyone interested can get full particulars by writing C. L. Henney, Freeport, Michigan.

Church activities are progressing at a good steady pace. Audiences are not yet lessened by the approach of vacation days. The prayer meetings of late have been in charge of different departments of work and the interest seems high. The board is not satisfied with a ten per cent tenth legion membership, so we are planning a campaign for recruits.

Instead of a service flag the church has posted a prayer roll for our boys away—which would number eight now.

We have had the joy and inspiration of listening to both Mr. and Mrs. Saunders for so long missionaries to China. They gave miraculous, touching and soul-stirring pages from their experience. Oh that more of us had the faith coupled with the zeal that these two dear elderly people have!

Our Sunday school, which now has 172 scholars enrolled, has challenged the First church of Los Angeles to an attendance contest for the summer.

We have also entered the Sunday School Times contest for a sixty per cent attendance throughout the summer months. A Children's Day program was prepared and given before a large and appreciative audience June 9.

The Junior C. E. is as active as ever. Recently, under the training of their two able superintendents they gave a missionary pageant "The Open Door." It was well rendered and couldn't help but make an appeal for missions to the many present.

The Intermediate C. E.'s are another live lot. Their plans are now complete for sending delegates to the C. E. Convention which is to be held at our capital, Sacramento. This week the Ladies' Aid has an all-day meeting to sew for the Kentucky mission.

May God ever find us faithful!

DETWILER NOTES

A kindly letter from a member of the Mission Board, awakened me to the possibility that others with him, may fear I am "hiding my talent under a bushel," as he put it. I deeply appreciate the concern of friends, but since friendship is reciprocal, I felt it a good change to have their names appear in these columns rather than mine. Though it wasn't easy to keep from passing on some of the many good things I was finding in Dr. White's Bible school in New York. Lack of time controlled that for every hour was good and full, then so much more dished out than could be taken. And now that I am home for a short time, I find a pastorless church with its crying need.

It is a matter of serious regret, that a church with so wonderful a teaching as that of the Brethren, has never extended itself to New York, the largest city in the world. Paul, in the face of the most opposing circumstances, dared not die till he had planted his feet in the center of civilization,—Rome, and where his feet touched, there were left gospel footprints. "My Gospel," as Paul was wont to put it, was so big, such a tremendous force for righteousness that he could not rest till he saw it well established in the biggest city. Do we not quite have the full gospel, or have we no Paul that dares a similar venture? My endeavor to have trine immersion administered, though by a people who practise it, would make interesting reading elsewhere. No Brethren church in which to expend the overflow, and to direct the converts that always result from real Bible teaching, was the one unsatisfactory feature of my winter's study in New York. Why not do the starting myself, someone asked? That is exactly what I am doing, not in New York, but at the opposite side of the Union,—Spokane, Washington, which is still my field, and shall continue to be my first interest, at least until our headquarters are well established. Last fall I came away to attend Conference, when sickness at home and death changed plans. My own health did not permit me to go back to the same line of work,—house-to-house visiting—, for be it known to those who are interested in starting a city church, that it cannot be done, without much "feet-work," as also "knee-work." I soon found that I had made no mistake in securing the necessary change by entering the Bible Teachers' Training School in New York. The expense was the chief difficulty, for the school is of a high order in more ways than one. As usual the solution came from an unexpected direction. I was not long there till they offered me a scholarship, for the rest of the school year. That meant no expense, besides receiving pay from one of the Bible classes I was sent out to teach.

Were it not for being counted disloyal to our own, I would say much in favor of Dr. White's school in New York. But I noticed in the last paper that his brother, Dr. Campbell White was the Commencement speaker at Ashland. Their attitude towards the Bible is very much like ours. Yet there is a strong feature in real Bible teaching that is peculiar to the New York school, and can only be appreciated fully by attendance. Their work is meant to be adapted to college graduates, and the girls going out from there, get their $100 a month even as pastor's assistants. Any one intending to supplement their college work, will find the school centrally located at 541 Lexington Avenue. A summer course is given also. To get the student next to the context of the Scripture, is their aim, and in these unsettled days there is no more important work than to do actual Bible teaching, that will inspire others to study for themselves.

Sunnyside, Washigton

The Lord continues gracious toward the Brethren here. We are passing through one of the busiest seasons of the year. Everyone is worn out. But in spite of all this, the work of the church is receiving attention.

A most important business meeting was recently conducted. Two deacons and deaconesses were elected. Scriptural requirements were consulted and a wise selection made. A call was extended to the pastor to serve for the second year with a substantial increase in salary. The call has been accepted. Also, the church decided to send her pastor to National Conference to represent her. For this we are grateful.

The reports revealed an addition of 70 to the membership during the year past. The financial part of the year was good. Other items revealed the prosperity of the Spirit.

Dutchtown, Indiana

The work of the Lord at Dutchtown is prospering slowly. Three have been added to our number by baptism and one is to be baptized. We are having a good Sunday school and the prospects look good. We held our communion service June sixth, Brother Grisso in charge. We had a glorious meeting considering the weather which was against us. A storm came up about four o'clock, and it rained until after six, causing a number to stay at home. Still we had 27 out of 52 at the Lord's table. That is a small number, but Dutchtown has not had a service of this kind for three years and we were pleased with the service. We find plenty to do and did not come to Dutchtown to lie on flowery beds of ease and eat chicken. We came here to work, to lift up the fallen and to build up the church, and we have nothing to boast of. When we came here we felt our inability. We were afraid to start and would rather have stayed out of the work. But since on the field with those that called us here holding us up, and with their co-operation in the work with us, we feel the very presence of Jesus all the time, and we are not ashamed of this report.

Burlington, Indiana

We will finish our work at this place October 1st. We have had a very pleasant two years with the Burlington and Darwin people, and we can recommend them to any man who may be looking for a place. Our prayers are that the next man can do a greater work than we have done, although we have not done very much, yet we do not feel our work has been in vain.

We do not know where we will go or what we will do, we hope to get a place where we can do some evangelistic work that is if we are wanted. We are sure the Lord will take care of that part. If we are his servants he will use us.

Any one wanting to correspond with this church should write W. V. Polk, Burlington, Indiana, or Pearl Clingenpeel, Bringhurst, Indiana for Darwin. We hope to give a full report of our work here soon and welcome the new man on the field.

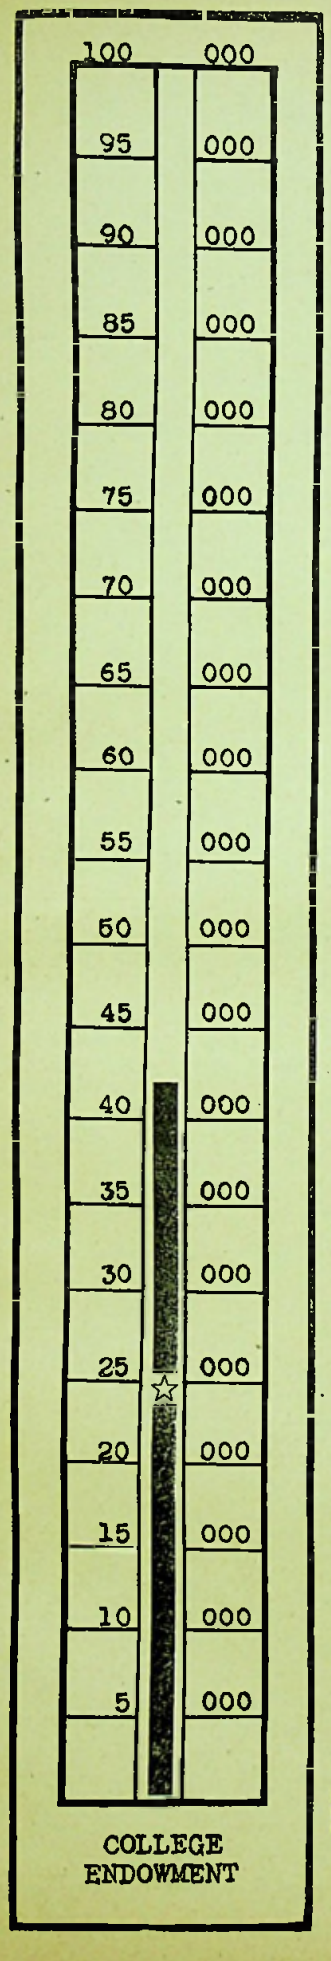
Shall the Mortgage be Burned?

G. C. Carpenter

The answer to this question will depend upon the readers of the Evangelist and the churches of which they are members.

The Washington, D. C. church upon which the mortgage rests says that it ought to be and must be burned and they will get under $1,000 of the $2,500. With the other churches and Sunday schools and a multitude of individuals get under the remaining $1,500. Next week we hope to report a number of pledges. Decide on the most you can give, then write us the amount, but send no money until the whole amount is pledged and such notice is sent out.



The time is short and we must act quickly if the mortgage is to be burned at the coming conference at Winona Lake. How humiliated we ought to feel that we have permitted this mortgage to rest on our church in the National Capital so many years. A strong pull all together will remove the burden and open the way for larger service. Your home mission board asks your co-operation now.

The Mormons are now dedicating a church, their first building in the east, in Brooklyn. It is costing $40,000 and is being dedicated free of debt. The Mormons are tithers and they have plenty of money in the Lord's treasury. Let the Brethren church with a whole Gospel do as well as these people who are distributing a false teaching.

Come on, hurry up, and "Over the Top" we will go for the First Brethren church in Washington, D. C. Send the writer your pledge by return mail so it can be reported at once, and the mortgage burned at Winona Lake.

CAMPAIGN NOTES

After completing the canvass of the Conemaugh church we went to the Pike church. Pike and Vinco are rural churches six or eight miles out from Conemaugh and they form a circuit. They are among the oldest congregations in the brotherhood, and from their membership during the year there have gone forth many who have cast their lot with other Brethren churches, mainly Conemaugh, Johnstown and vicinity. Brother Earl Flora, the pastor of these churches, is rendering very acceptable service. He is one of the younger men of our ministry and is enlisted heart and soul in his work.

During our canvass at Pike we preached to fine audiences. We assisted in the communion at one service; and in our last meeting there was one conversion. Indeed our work at Pike seemed more like the beginning of a revival meeting than a campaign to raise money. I am indebted to Brother J. F. Watson, who kindly obliged me by preaching two nights at Pike. I had not planned enough time for Conemaugh and consequently reached Pike two nights behind schedule. But Brother Watson relieved the situation.

In this church we raised a little more than $600 for endowment—the exact figure is $630. This is a good record for Pike. There will still be a few more to enlist here, so that the final result will be $700 or near about. In our work Brother Flora gave me splendid assistance.

Among the many good people I shall remember at Pike will be the Kerrs, and Burkharts, and Teeters and Brackens and Gillins and Roses.

When we got to Vinco we found this church in the midst of repairing their building. While Vinco fully expects to do its part in raising Permanent Endowment, I readily saw that it will be the part of wisdom to return to Vinco later for the canvass and this I decided to do.

From Vinco I went to Moxham and had the work nicely under way. But the serious illness of Brother Nowag's little daughter made it necessary for us to suspend work at Moxham for the present. However, when I go back to Moxham in a few weeks I am sure I shall do well for the College. The good people of Moxham have fully resolved to do their part in the campaign for endowment.

I suddenly moved from Moxam to Morrison's Cove. My next report will be from here and Altoona. My goal is $50,000 by National Conference, and we simply must have it.

Indian Missions in the War

"The help which Indian missions has given to the Allies is greater than is commonly supposed," says the C. M. S. Review. "Hundreds of Indian Christians have joined the labor corps, and ten or fifteen missionaries are with them as supervisors or assistant commandants. Much of the recruiting of Indian Christian labor has been through mission agency. Many Indian Christians, chiefly form the Punjab, have enlisted in the army. No fewer than a hundred missoinaries are engaged on active service as soldiers, chaplains, doctors or nurses, and many other doctors and nurses have offered themselves to the Government for local service, thus enabling others to go to the front. Missionary institutions have aided war funds liberally. Women missionaries have given time to Red Cross work; hundreds have started and maintained sewing meetings for medical or war purposes. Missionaries have lectured on war themes in most of the principal languages of the country; they have provided entertainments for the wounded; they have shown hospitality to soldiers from all lands. The Indian Sunday School Union has raised Rs 25,000 for the Belgian Children's Relief Fund. Besides the help given in these and other ways there have been the magnificent efforts of the Y. M. C. A. in its war work department."

Japan has enacted a law going into effect April 1st, 1919, prohibiting the sale or giving of liquor to minors.

Canada became practically dry throughout the Dominion on April first.

Rhode Island refused to ratify the National Prihobition Amendment, but appropriated $760,000 to enlarge its penitentiary.

So Massachusetts has joined the nefarious conspiracy of the South to force prohibition on the North. Well! Well! Well!

Senator Wesley L. Jones, of Washington, has introduced a bill to conscript idle men for farm labor. It should become a law.

The Virgin Islands, the newest addition to the territory of the United States, is discussing prohibition and will probably soon go dry.

The alcoholic content of beer is fixed by government regulation at the present time at 2.75%, by weight, which is 3.44% by volume, the usually accepted measurement.

Texas, which recently ratified the National Constitutional Amendment and enacted a state prohibition law is the largest state in the Union in area and is fifth in population.

The American beertrade is quite willing for the country to wade through rivers of blood and climb mountains of bones rather than see war-time prohibition.

Our Dead

TICHY—Lilly Annie, was born January 31, 1901, Died April 26, 1918. She was a member of the Brethren Sunday school, and had been a faithful attendant when her health permitted. She is survived by her mother and two brothers of the home, one sister of Cedar Rapids and many friends. Lily as she was called by all who knew her spent her short life in the community where she was born. It was her pleasure to carry flowers and mementoes to all of those who were her friends and companions. May the bereaved family be sustained in their affliction. Services by the writer. FREEMAN ANKRUM,
Garwin, Iowa.

RODABAUGH—Mary Elizabeth Rodabaugh was born in Washington County, Pa., and died at her home in Kenton, Ohio on April 19th, 1918. She was aged 75 years, 6 months and 22 days. While yet a child her parents moved to Ohio. On January 10th, 1867, she was united in marriage with Enos Rodabaugh. To this union were born five children. In early life she became a Christian and when the Brethren church of Williamstown, O., was organized she became a charter member. She was a student and teacher. She was a constant student of the Bible and higher and better things of life. She was a sincere and devout Christian. After an extended period of suffering she was translated to be with her Lord. Funeral services were held at the M. E. church of Kenton, O. Services by the writer assisted by the pastor of the church, Dr. Brackney.
J. ALLEN MILLER.

RIDDLE—Kenneth Andrew, son of Mr. and Mrs. Raymond Riddle, was born near Tiosa, Indiana, May 1st, 1918 and was taken home with Jesus May 13th, 1918 at the age of 12 days. He leaves to mourn their loss a father, mother, four grandparents and a host of relatives. Funeral services were conducted by Ora E. Oxley of Rochester, Indiana, at the home.

NEWCOMER—Jacob Newcomer born February 25, 1843, died May 4, 1918, aged 75 years, 2 months and 9 days. Mr. Newcomer was married to Sarah M. Simmons, Noverber 19, 1866. To this union six children were born, five surviving. One daughter, Mrs. Nancy Seefong is a faithful member of the Louisvilel church. He and his wife who survive him, celebrated their golden wedding anniversary, November 19, 1916. He had been for years a member of the Church of the Brethren. Funeral at Liberty church, 10 miles southeast of Louisville by the writer.
GEORGE S. BAER.

LAMPTON—William S., second son of Benjamin F. and Annie Lampton, departed this life April 6, 1918 at the age of 18 years, 5 months and 16 days. He was a hearty, promising young man, but unable to resist successfully a severe attack of pneumonia. In his twelfth year he was received into the Brethren church, and passed out of this life with an unfaltering trust in his Savior. While death seems to exact a heavy toll of this family, having claimed a beautiful daughter about three years ago, the members thereof seek to acquiesce in the will of God. May the grief stricken parents, two sisters, three brothers and all the relatives continue to know his comforting and sustaining grace. Funeral from the Brownsville, Ohio, M. P. church in the presence of a large, sympathetic congregation.
J. A. GARBER.

MILLER—Earl Ernest, only son of George W. and Rose E. Miller, died March 29th, aged 14 years, 10 months and 12 days. Cerebro spinal meningitis having caused his death added to the sadness of the occasion and the grief of the parents, because of the absolute quarantine and the extreme brevity of his illness. Just last winter during our evangelistic effort Earl made the great confession and was duly baptized and received into the church, and was one of our promising boys. Funeral services were held several weeks after the burial by order of the health officer, by the writer. May the God of all grace comfort and sustain the bereft parents.
GEO W. KINZIE.

Marriages

GARBER-TOMS—At the home of the writer, Ashland, Ohio, Mr. John L. Garber, of Belleville, Ohio, and Miss Anna Pearl Toms, of Ankenytown, Ohio, were united in the bonds of sacred matrimony. Both the bride and groom are estimable young people and active members of the Brethren church in Ankenytown. We covet for them a happy and prosperous life together.
A. L. LYNN.

LA BARRE-MILLER—At the bride's home, on April 18, 1918, Mr. Francis R. La Barre and Miss M. Grace Miller, both highly respected and talented members of the Waterloo congregation, were united in marriage. The groom is a son of John N. Le Barre, the assistant postmaster of Waterlo, and is teller in a local bank. The bride is a daughter of Brother Lewis Miller, and was a primary teacher before her marriage. Both the bride and groom are products of West High school, and the former is a graduate of the Iowa State Teacher's College, while the latter is a graduate of the Waterloo Business College. A host of friends wish them the best life can contain.
H. L. GOUGHNOUR.

PORTER-LAMPTON—On May 20th at the home of Mr. and Mrs. B. F. Lampton, near Glenford, Ohio, their daughter, Miss Mary R. was united in marriage with Mr. Bertram S. Porter. He is a progressive farmer of near Zanesville, where they will make their future home. The bride is a graduate of the local High school. These estimable young people have many well-wishing friends.

Does the Angelus Ring in Your Church?

Is your church and are you endeavoring to use prayer as an instrument in the present world crisis? Is the bell of your church ringing at a certain hour each day, calling its members and all Christian people to prayer? Have you heard the call that the nations in distress are issuing to all sympathizing Christian hearts to prayer that the terrible war may soon cease and peace be restored in the earth? It is a call spoken by their needs that is more urgent and impressive than any voice or vote of the peoples' representatives could make it. Some earnest souls have heard it and have made an effort to lay it upon the hearts of praying people everywhere. It is suggested that every churchbell shall ring each evening at six o'clock or at twelve noon if that is more convenient, calling all Christian people to pause a moment, wherever they may be, to pray that the struggle for world freedom may soon be victorious, that lasting peace may be restored, and that while the fight yet continues the boys who are in their country's service may feel the support of the prayers of Godly people. The plan has been adopted by the churches of a number of cities and is growing in favor. Why is not such a war measure both effective and proper for the churches?

That it might be made effective as a means of hastening the victorious end of the war no one can doubt who believes both in the accomplishing power of prayer and in the righteousness of our cause. I believe prayer is an instrument which Christians may use to good account in the present world crisis. God can hear and answer prayer to day as ever. His arm is not shortened and he is just as willing to aid his people in their conflicts against wrong as he ever was. He has placed within our hands prayer as a means of laying hold on Almighty Power and wielding it not only for our personal enrichment, but also for the moulding of our environment. And human experience has proven it to be a real force in effecting changes, an actual factor in transforming lives and conditions. Such effectiveness of prayer is no fancy of an over-wrought brain. It is no superstition of an over credulous and ignorant devotee. It is no idle dream of a visionary, nor an easy method of an indolent. It is God's way of making possible for man what has been withheld or has seemed impossible. It is his method of enlisting man's co-operation and inducing him to conform to divine purposes. And when God and man work in harmony all things are possible, and that which man was unable to bring to pass working independently is easily effected. True prayer for victory and peace will bring God's aid to the forces for righteousness and they and God working together will soon accomplish the desired end.

There is accomplishing power in prayer not only because it enlists man's co-operation with divine efforts and plans, but also because it is God's way of bestowing upon man blessings which he would not have the courage to ask for, or the unselfishness to seek, or the spiritual understanding to desire for himself. Sometimes the divine Father must cross the purposes of man and "turn the tables" on him, but if he sincerely prays, asking for that which is best, desiring not his own will but God's, the beneficient Father will answer his prayer in the very best way and great things will be brought to pass. Wonderful accomplishments and changes beyond what he asks or thinks will be wrought, though man may not understand how, nor concieve the full nature nor far-reaching effects of his requests when he has made them. He may not even desire all that such an answer to his prayers may involve, but if he pays as Christ prayed he will accept the answer without murmuring. If we pray for the end of the war God may answer our prayer in a far grander way than we could even hope for; and he may bring upon us blessing of cleansing through chastening, which we have not even dared to ask for. He will answer our prayers according to our needs and beyond what we even know to ask, if we pray aright.

Moreover, the angelus should ring in order to enlist the prayers of the largest possible number of Christian people in behalf of a cause that is vital to the welfare of the church, the nation and the world. I say the largest possible number, because, if we seek to pile up names on a petition to the state officials that they may know it represents not our self-exalted judgments, nor the interests of our own individual selfishness, ought we not to show the same respect to the Ruler of heaven and earth? I believe every additional individual who unites in this petition for victory and peace lends re-enforcement to it before the throne of heaven, proves the greatness and sincerity of our desire and brings increased pleasure to the heart of God in granting it. If all Christian people would unitedly, earnestly, believingly and definitely pray, what could they not do? They could change the mind of the German empire and move the whole world Godward.

"Such an undertaking seems as forbidding as the removal of a mountain," it is complained; "we must not tempt God by asking the impossible." Ah, nothing is impossible with God, nor is it tempting God to ask the seemingly impossible if we fulfil the conditions as we ask. First, we must have great faith to produce great results. Mountain-moving faith is required to accomplish mountain-moving operations. Secondly, we must pray "not my will but thine be done." That spirit is essential to powerful prayer. Thus Jesus prayed and thus we must pray. And thirdly, we must be willing to carry the cross and march unflinchingly up Calvary if God's answer to our prayer should lead us there. That crowns the conditions of powerful prayer. If we should thus complete the "asking," "seeking," "knocking," might it not be that we would then already have received our desire?

If we have faith in prayer as an instrument for accomplishing things why not use it in the present crisis? Why not unite in a great petition for victory and peace, and the safe-guarding of our boys? Is not our cause such that we can use prayer in its behalf? If we cannot pray for it, then it is wrong for us to be engaged in it. Anything that is right for us to do is right for us to pray about. Prayer should accompany everything we undertake. It should prepare the way for, and aid in everythig we do. And if it is not right for us to work and pray for the cause to which our countary is giving her life, then our country is in the wrong and Germany is in the right, and over-reaching, grasping, fraud, brute force, bestiality and cruelty should be made the governing principles of the individuals and the nation. But if honesty, unselfishness, sympathy for the weak, freedom, purity, the protection of women and children, and the sacredness of life itself—if these are worthy and right, then it is not only proper, but a Christian duty to pray that the Allied cause may triumph, and triumph soon.

If the angelus bell by its call to prayer will make possible the wielding of such a power by the Christian forces of America why not have it rung? Why not have the angelus rung in Brethren churches and put forth strong efforts to induce all praying people to use prayer as a mighty instrument in the terrible world crisis? Does the angelus ring in your church? Or will it?

From the Editor's View-Point

Waste Not, Want Not

Some few people may be in a position where they are able to say, "Who cares for expenses anyway?" but they are not many, and even if one is in such a position personally there is a debt that every man owes to the community or to society at large that should prove a wholesome check to all extravagances of living.

Just now a systematic effort is being made to teach the American people economy and thrift, and this should be a fruitful teaching for scarcely anywhere else in all the world can such extravagant habits be found as in our own wonderful America. We are taught that it is now a patriotic duty to consume nothing that is not actually necessary to our well being as a means for winning the war. Recently the president of one of the greatest mail order companies in America said, "No one should buy anything he does not actually need because that takes labor away from the industries that are necessary to the winning of the war." A few people will heed this teaching or this advice and actually refrain from buying that which is not really necessary to their wellbeing, but we fear a large majority of the people will do as they always have been doing, buy what they want so long as they have the money to pay for it.

The people throughout the country districts have been urged to burn wood as fuel in their homes wherever it can be obtained as a means for conserving coal which is so greatly needed in the industries of the country and some of them are doing so; but for many years we have observed a wanton waste of fuel as we have traveled back and forth across the country. Only a few days ago while riding on a railway train we noticed that for quite a distance we seemed to be passing through an exceptionally warm section of the country and as we glanced out of the windows we learned the reason. Old railway ties had been replaced by new ones in the track and the old were piled systematically along the right-of-way and had had fire set to them and were burning with intense heat. Now it is a well known fact that while the most of the railroad companies will not prosecute any one who carries off a supply of old ties, yet they will not sell them at any price, but burn them instead and thus hundreds of thousands of cords of very good wood are wasted annually. This wasteful practice of the railroad companies has been criticized on different occasions, but no change in the practice has been observed. However since the American government has taken over the operation of the railroad lines for the period of the war, and since the government is preaching economy on every hand, it seems to us we are justified in looking to the government to set the example of thrift and frugality by stopping all wasteful practices that come under its direct control that do not in any way impede the progress of the war, and we feel that millions of dollars might be saved the country if the government would see to it that the wasteful practice of burning up old railroad ties as a means of getting rid of them were stopped. There may be a few sections of the country where they would not find a ready sale, but we do not believe such sections are many.

O Wonderful Man

With all his superior advantages there are some ways in which man is not so very far in advance of the dumb creatures of the animal kingdom, but in his intelligence he is supposed to surpass everything else that has ever been created, and yet with all our human intelligence we are sometimes found guilty of doing some very foolish things and of making some very unwise remarks. And one of the strange things about it is that often when we think we are wisest we find that we have done the most foolish thing or have made the most unwise remark.

Self-confidence seems to be one of the virtues essential to success among mankind as the whole world counts success, but the degree of self confidence manifested by some people is startling in the extreme. Recently a man of considrable note said, "I see things as they are. I have never let myself be duped." Most people think they see things as they are, though they sometimes try to see them as they think they ought to be, but not many people can say they have never been duped. If they can truthfully say that they can say a great deal more than many of the greatest men in the world have been able to say, for it is well known that many kings on their thrones have been wonderfully duped. Julius Caesar himself was easily duped, and by a woman at that, and we sometimes thinq the wisdom of Solomon was not able to keep this king of Israel from being "taken in" at times and led to do some wonderfully foolish things. And it is a well known fact that numbers of the keenest business men the world has known, men who have amassed great fortunes in their lifetime, have sometimes been duped by others. It may be that in their sympathies they have been permitted to sway them against their real hard judgment, but they have sometimes been deceived and have made their mistakes as common men have done. But it is not always some one else that dupes a man, sometimes he is duped by himself and is led to do some extremely foolish things. Most of the mistakes of life are undoubtedly made because men have been fooled or "duped" into the wrong way of thinking and the man who has never been duped is a man who has never made a mistake. Again we say, O wonderful man!

Moral Education

One of the things emphasized in the system of modern education is the influence for moral good that emanates from their observance, and any system of education or any course of study that does not include principles that are for the moral good of those who come under its influence is lacqing in one of the real essentials of education.

But great as is the moral good that results from a proper system of education there is no system that can of itself make any human life what it ought to be. For a number of years past we were taught that the most highly developed educational system in the world was that in operation in the German empire, and we frequently heard our own system unfavorably compared to that of Germany. Efficiency was the one word that described the workings of the German system, but what kind of efficiency did it mean? From what we have been able to learn during the last four years we may be justified in saying it was efficiency as a machine is efficient, but that the system leaves the individual void of initiative must also be admitted, while the effect upon his moral nature is such that he has lost practically all sense of personal moral responsibility and is a fit machine to carry out any of the diabolical plans of his superiors.

There may be some who think that all the world needs to do is to reach a state of moral perfection is to discover and follow some carefully worked out system of education and the result will be what Germany claimed for her own people—a race of supermen. But the futility of such hopes is clearly expressed in the short but forceful sentence from the pen of Dr. W. T. McElveen who said, "You can no more educate a bad man into a good man than you can educate a buttercup into a butterfly." All this goes to show that the man who hopes to have the world through a system of education is doomed to bitter disappointment. Something more than education is needed to improve the human race. The Psalmist had a remarkably clear conception of the human need when he said, "Create in me a clean heart O Lord, and renew a right spirit within me."

What the World Craves

There may not be any one thing that can be singled out as the world's greatest craving, but there are a great many things for which the world seems to have an inordinate desire. Some of these desires are legitimate while others lead only to harm.

One of the natural cravings of man seems to be that which seeks expression in some form of religious worship. The pagan red man of the American continent is possessed with an element of this same craving just as much as his white brethren are.

Apparently the various religions of the world have been developed to meet this great human craving and while all other systems have failed to satisfy we may yet look for the time when the Christian religion shall encircle the globe. But what kind of Christianity will it be? John D. Rockefeller, Jr., said recently, "What the world craves today is a more spiritual and a less formal religion," and we believe he spoke an important truth.

FOUR-YEAR PROGRAM PAGE

NOW THEN DO IT.—II Samuel 3:18

The Four Year Program

In every field of activity history will substantiate the assertion that every thing worth while has been done at high tension. In such a time the poet sings his best, the preacher preaches most eloquently. The orator sways his crowd, the astronomer catches the transit of a star, the farmer sows or reaps, and great battles are won and victory is the great reward. The Four-Year Program better than we knew was drafted in such a time and is having its fulfillment in the psychological hour when the whole world is at high tension. Unconsciously we are like a piano that has been tuned from international to concert pitch until every wire has become a sensitive nerve. The "summation of stimuli" has been added by the bold typed lines of the morning paper until we eat, sleep, work and think under this strain.

The Effect Upon the Program

The effect to my mind is twofold, both for and against it. There is danger of not thinking clearly or soberly on the matter and more insidious is the false patriotism that is abroad in the land. Genuine patriotism is well stated in Henry Van Dyke's "Life's Compass:"

"Four things a man must learn to do
If he would keep his record true.
To think without confusion clearly
To love his fellowman sincerely
To act from honest motives purely.
To trust in God and Heaven securely."

Nothing will clear the mind like waiting on the Lord in these troublous times and the false patriotism that knows no more than to shoot fire crackers and yell like a Commanche Indian on the 4th of July is the kind that would lessen Christian activities, like closing church doors to conserve fuel and do necessary things to conserve food. These patriots have never read nor learned man cannot live by bread alone and that this Government was founded upon the very principles the church strives to perpetuate. So with drives for bonds, stamps, "Ys" and Red Cross, some that are for these have forgotten that the church is the mother of them all. It is the home base and the source of their inspiration. Verily the heathen rage and the people imagine a vain thing, to save fuel close the churches while that same man and his wife live in and heat a twelve room house. Because there are so many calls for money rob God to pay Uncle Sam which would be the modern version of "robbing Peter to pay Paul." When the church is the institution that has inspired all generosity and proof of it is that Christian people have given 82% of all benevolent monies in this crisis.

In favor of the Program is that we are all working at high tension and will accomplish much more than usual for under so called normal conditions we are too indifferent. Pentecost was normal, a church that has just one fit or spasm of soul saving a year is abnormal. We have not only been taught to be generous but with Uncle Sam as tutor we have been shown our ability to give and this must be felt by our mission and benevolent boards. If under this truth the leader has his feet upon the rock and is teaching sound doctrine his church will grow, glow and go on to victory.

The Program and Leadership

"Like Priest Like People" is a proverb whose wisdom is apparent. In last week's report on the program we note that Goal 3 seemed the easiest to reach. Look and you will find it is the goal that the preacher alone is responsibel for. So the 3rd Goal is ahead of all the rest because it depends upon the ministers. That's fine and augurs well for the rest of the Program when the leaders are awake. Much depends upon the leader and I assume that the pastor is the leader if not "mores the pity." Goal 1 and 2 are to quicken and deepen the spiritual life through the prayer meeting and communion service. I know I am away over the top with the communion service and the preacher has much to do with that whether it is a quiet, strengthening, spiritual, but the prayer meeting has driven many a pastor to Gethsemane. Why the people will not attend this service "to pray" is not wholly the leader's fault. The call to pray and nothing else should be enough to insure the attendance without serving refreshments. Goal 4 is increase in membership and again depends upon leadership for it is seldom that you will have a half dozen personal workers to help win souls. But after all this is the acid test of our fine preaching, architecture, music and organization. Does it get you results does it save souls? When my church ceases to grow even numerically then I quit and the chances are that I have quit first.

This is not true with the Evangelist in the homes, nor Ashland Endowment, nor recruiting the ministry. Leadership won't solve these without a lot of co-operation. The Budget System of Finance should be up to the Official Board, composed of the best business men in the church and they should not worry the pastor with financial burdens, he is a preacher not a banker. In recruiting the ministry when the pastor has presented it as a life's work he leaves the responsibility with the candidate and the parents. If you teach your children to despise the sacrificial life of Christ and not worthy of emulation but marry your daughter to the banker and settle John on the home farm where will the recruits come from? It may be a blessing in disguise that the recruits have ever been poor boys but it surely is a travesty on our rich homes.

Which Goals Should Be Reached?

I do not say any of them are not important but which are paramount now? You can put me on record of having said that Goal 8 is most important now. Ashland College must be endowed now, not in 1920. It is a pity that Beachler can't cover the entire field this year. It is important because a river can't rise higher than its source. Our source for ministerial recruits must be largely the College and because it takes that brand of leadership these days. City churches, college towns and in most unsuspected places you find advanced students and the untrained can't lead them. In a former charge I preached to a host of school teachers, County Superintendent, College and High school graduates and it was a country church. We must endow Ashland or lose her, if we do we will lose our soul, for imagine if you can, Brethren preachers coming from our state universities.

The Goal We Won't Reach

It is goal 5. The first two parts. The last concerning the missionary apportionment we should reach. But for the District like Illiokota or Kanemorado to increase her number of churches 20% and as a whole establish or re-establish 44 ought not be reached. The word re-establishment explains why. It is too much like having a meeting of 100 confessions and 25 additions to the church. To say re-establish where we did not let the opportunity merely pass but killed it, is the use of the wrong word. Should say resurrect. To establish that many churches, past history proves the fallacy of it for it means that we would increase not the number of churches but the number of establishments. Personally I am more in favor of 5 churches than 44 re-establishments. The soundest discussion of conference was when they thought to cut the number in two. Let's nurse 5 churches to maturity where they can assume their own responsibility rather than have born unto us 40 orphans whose mother has deserted them. Every church should have the right of being well born as we now know a child has.

Conclusion

After all it is a fine program, a big objective and I will work for it with all my might, for like John Hancock when signing the Declaration of Independence said, "We must all hang together." "Ay, said Benjamin Franklin, if we don't we'll all hand separately."

So let's keep on with the big offensive. Let's plan for more than we can do then do it. Bite off more than you can chew then chew it. Hitch your wagon to a star, climb in the seat and you'll get thar.

False Highways to the Golden Age

Sermon Preached by Louis S. Bauman, Long Beach, California, July 7, 1918

We are hearing much said these days about the "collapse of Christianity;" "the failure of the church;" "The fallibility of the Bible;" etc. etc. Yet, to the man who really knows his Bible, and the plan of God as set forth therein, the old Book is being confirmed as never before in the history of men; and, to him it is clear that neither has Christianity collapsed, nor the church failed.

However, some things are collapsing. What? Human structures built by men, even though they have been given Christian names, are collapsing; human theories and human theological systems are collapsing; and, especially is that system of theological teaching known as post-millenialism, and all that goes with it, collapsing. As never before, men are searching the scriptures to find out if possible just what the meaning may be of the tremendous upheaval through which the world is passing. And in searching, they are being astounded at the accuracy of the scriptures in describing the day in which we live, and declaring that such a day as this will mark the closing of the dispensation of the church.

Contend against it as some do, thousands upon thousands are fast coming to believe that Jeremiah's wonderful prophecy is on the verge of its fulfilment: "I will call for a sword upon all the inhabitants of the earth, saith the Lord of hosts.* * * For the Lord hath a controversy with the nations, He will plead with all flesh: He will give them that are wicked to the sword, saith the Lord. Thus saith the Lord of hosts. Behold, evil shall go forth from nation to nation, and a great whirlwind shall be raised up from the coasts of the earth." (Jer. 25: 29, 31, 32).

The "Golden Age," or, The Millenium, as is described by the Word of God, is a period of time when God's people "shall be priests of God and Christ, and shall reign with him a thousand years." (Rev. 20: 6) "on the earth." (Rev. 5: 10). Then, Jesus Christ shall sit on "the throne of his father David (Luke 1: 32), and "Many people shall go and say, Come ye, let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us of his ways, and we shall walk in his paths; for out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem. And he shall judge among the nations, and shall rebuke many people; and they shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruninghooks: nation shall not lift sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more" (Isa. 2: 3, 4). How far we are from that day! Even now, though some declare that this war will be the death of war, and therefore lead into the millenium, yet as we say it, the powers that be in our natoin are planning for universal military training at the close of this war, and military training is becoming a regular part of our public high school training. That does not look like "learning war no more."

Let us read all the scriptures, such as Isaiah 11: 1-9; Isaiah 65: 19-25; Psalm 81; and scores of others, and we can see that God's unfailing Word has promised this world a glorious day that has not yet arrived. The world has been struggling for centuries to reach that age, and seems just as far from it as ever. The trouble with this old world is, it has followed false trails, and still persists in doing so.

Without hesitation, we declare that what men call civilization. has proven to be a false trail to the millenium. We have long been told, "When man has been sufficiently civilized, his brutish instincts will disappear, and he will enter his age of gold." Now, civlization is a condition of the human race produced by education, culture, science, literature, art, and, what the world may call "religion." Strange to say, right when these things seemed to have almost reached their zenith, and man was everywhere beginning to boast his triumphs, and believing that his new tower was reaching, indeed, into heaven, the whole proud structure in one short hour tottered to its fall.

Moreover, the weak place in this structure was not found in the darkness of African fetishism, or India's pagan philosophy, or China's spiritual night. The weak place was found, strange to say, right at that point where it was universally admitted civilization had reached its greatest perfection,—in Germany! Yes, in Germany! There the world went to "top off" in science, art, music, and, I am sorry to say, in theology! "Made in Germany" was the prize-mark of our boasted civilization! We are ashamed of it now. Ah! the present world-agony is teaching those who have ears to hear and eyes to see that civilization, instead of putting an end to war and human folly, has merely made the instruments of war and human folly more deadly than ever. In spite of all human attainments, the nations are still, just what the old Book has for twenty-five centuries represented them to be,—"BEASTS." (Dan. 7: 1-7), "stamping and devouring" each other!

Franklin K. Lane, Secretary of Interior, in an address made some time ago, said: "There can be no living for us in a world where the state has no conscience, no reverence for the things of the spirit, no respect for international law, no mercy for those who fall before its force. WHAT AN UNORDERED WORLD! ANARCHY! THE ANARCHY OF RIVAL WOLF PACKS!" There you have it, in spite of thousands of years of civilization, boasted progress, and adored evolution, your nations are pronounced by a member of the cabinet of the President of the United States,—"rival wolf packs!" And he is right! Wherein has Germany, with all her boasted progress, gotten beyond the measure God made of the old Roman Empire two thousand years ago, as set forth in Daniel 7: 7?

We are ready to admit that in Germany you have culture without Christ. You have an emasculated Christianity that has repudiated the virgin-born Christ, mocked at the inspiration of the scriptures, and sneered at blood atonement. But as you ask us to admit that, you must acknowledge in your very request that civilization built up by unregenerate men can never lead the human race to its Golden Age. And while we are saying this, it may be well to remark, that any other civilization that shall repudiate the old time faith, and build the character of her rising generations on the foundation of German theology, will plunge to the same end toward which German civilization is plunging. America need not be half so fearful of German guns as of German theology. And the worst pro-Germanism in this nation today is to be found in the pulpits that are preaching German theology. It is a common spectacle to see some preacher stand in his pulpit and hurl his anathemas at everything pro-German, and then stand and belch forth the most deadly gas that ever escaped from Germany,—German theology!

In spite of the awful facts that stare us in the face, would-be optimists, pinning their faith still to the arm of flesh, declare that this war is the gateway to the Golden Age! that, man's course is ever upward; that, he will yet work out his own salvation. They are determined to lull themselves to sleep on the same old pillows, refusing to open their eyes to the fact that the springs of war lie deep in the hearts of men, and that just so long as the hearts of men remain unregenerate, the world will not be free from the terrors of war. I do not know very much, and some folks may think I know less, but I'll place the wisdom of this Book (the Bible) against all the vain fancies and theories of men. You must discover the source of war, and change that, before war shall perish from the earth. Listen! "From whence come wars and fightings among you? Come they not hence, even of your lusts that war in your members?" (Jas. 4: 1). Carnal "lust" is the source of war. Regeneration alone can change that. The nations will remain "beasts" until the "beast" in the human heart dies out. And, civilization does not slay the beast.

Once again, and without hesitation, we affirm that what men call "church" is no highway to a Golden Age. "The church has been with us two thousand years, and surely, we are yet far from the millenium, so far as a millenium that is to come by gradual growth is concerned. And, it is believed by many that "the church" was never so weak as she is today. Certain it is that she did not even prove to be a slight resistance to the present bursting forth of rivers of blood. Men on every side, thinking men, do not hesitate to tell you that they think "the church" is a failure. And can we wholly blame them? We see "the church" on every hand passing over to the world almost soul and body. Her resistance against the sins of the flesh weakens,—her voice is scarcely heard protesting against them, save in isolated cases. She vies with the world in entertaining the crowd. She carelessly casts great vital size of the crowd and its applause, and the money she is able to "raise." And, just now, she seems to have turned a large part of her attention to the job of destroying the German "Beast," and in the meantime the Devil does not take a vacation. Doubtless, the German "Beast" must be caged or destroyed. But let us not fortruths aside as non-essentials. She measures her success by the get that in the meantime souls are passing unsaved by the tens of thousands into a Christless eternity.

Ah! Did we say the church has failed? Not so! The true church has not failed,—cannot fail,—for it is builded on the "Rock." The popular "church" has failed. "The church" of the German-made theology has failed. The true church lives on to do her work until her Lord shall come!

But, even the true church of Jesus Christ is not the highway into the millenium, for the very good and sufficient reason that that is not her mission. The mission of the church is set forth by God himself, and that settles it. It is the mission of the church to "visit the Gentiles, to take out of them a people for his name" (Acts 15: 14). The evangelization of the nations is her divinely appointed task. She will accomplish that,—no more! That done, God will take her unto himself. Beyond that, he has his own program, and it is not hidden from us.

Again, many now believe a new road into the Golden Age has been found. They have named the new highway, "A League of Nations." They will try it out. It is the pet hobby of those who seek a man-produced millenium. This new idea is born of the best of intentions. I say it frankly, where I a post-millenialist, it would be my "one best bet," as men of the world would say. But a "League of Nations,, has been tried out time and time again in human history. It is no new thing, this centralization of power to keep the peace of the earth. The very idea of "A League of Nations" is built upon the centralization of force. And might that rests on force will become weak. Our own United States is a "League of Nations," and yet it did not spare us from the horrors of the Civil War. But think of the "League" proposed. Our own fair America would league herself into an alliance with revolutionary Latin America, atheistic Russia, infidel Frence, Bible-denying militaristic Germany, Moslem Turkey, pagan China and Japan, Catholic Austria, etc., etc. Frankly, I am not possessed with the idea that such an alliance of the unregenerate is going to bring about the regeneration of the world. If the God of Israel ever sounded one warning louder than another, it was the warning against his people forming unholy alliances with the unregenerate. As it happens, the prophets have much to say about this very thing,—a "League of Nations" that shall yet be. The great Revelator saw in his visions "ten kings which have received no kingdom as yet * * * These have one mind, and shall give their power and strength unto the beast. These shall make war with the Lamb, and the Lamb shall overcome them"(Rev. 17: 12-14). I am afraid of your proposed alliance! Beware lest you give your power unto the last great antagonist of Jesus Christ,—the "beast of "revelation,—the Anti-Christ of Scripture.

Let those who look with favor upon "A League of Nations" to pave the way to the world's Golden Age when "the sword shall be beaten into the plowshare," meditate carefully upon these words of the prophet of God's sure Word:

"Associate yourselves, O ye people, and ye shall be broken in pieces; and give ear, all ye far countries; gird yourselves, and ye shall be broken in pieces. Take counsel together, and it shall come to naught; speak the word, and it shall not stand: for—IMMANUEL! For the Lord spake thus to me with a strong hand, and instructed me that I should not walk in the way of this people, saying, Say ye not, A confederacy. * * * And I will wait upon the Lord that hideth his face from the house of Jacob, and I WILL LOOK FOR HIM." (Isa. 8: 8, 9, 12, 17).

Yet, there is one more false trail that men fain would believe will lead them to their Age of Gold, and that is named "Democracy." Our great and good President has declared that it is the great aim of the United States in the present world-struggle to "make the world safe for democracy." Let us hope that, if our Lord shall tarry, he may realize his desire. But, let us not enter into the vain hope that that means the attainment of the world's dream,—its millenial blessedness. Our nation was cradled a century and a half ago in the cradle of democracy, but the blood of our sons is reddening the soil of France today. Democracy calls for the rule of the majority. Perhaps it will not help the lovers of "democracy" to remind them that the word "Bolsheviki" means "majority." As much as we love American "democracy," God save us from Russian "bolsheviki-ism!" And wherein is the difference? Only here, American democracy has been permeated with the Spirit of Christ, while Russian Bolsheviki-ism is permeated by the spirit of atheism. The rule of the majority is glorious when it is permeated with the Spirit of Jesus Christ. It becomes terrible when permeated with the spirit of unbelief. There is nothing more terrible than the rule of the passions of a godless mass. And he is a fool who expects to better this sadly smitten world today by democratizing it, unless it is at the same time in some way permeated by the Spirit of the Christ of God.

Does the sure word of prophecy have anything to say of democracy? In the divine interpretation of the wonderful image seen by Nebuchadnezzar in his dream, we have the history of Gentile dominion from the days of Babylon to the close. Here it is: Babylon,—the head of gold; Medo-Persia,—the breast and arms of silver; Greece,—the belly and thighs of brass; Rome,—the legs of iron; the feet and toes, part of iron and part of clay, the final form of Gentile dominion. But, what is the meaning of this "miry clay?" (Dan. 2: 43). We are not left without an answer: "And whereas thou sawest iron mixed with miry clay, they shall mingle themselves with the seed of men; but they shall not cleave one to another." There you have God's picture and God's thought of democracy as a saving power for the nations of the earth. The trouble with your "clay" is that it lacks adhesion. If the masses could be permeated with the adhesive power of the Spirit of Christ, then might democracy be the world's hope, indeed. Otherwise it must fail as autocracy has failed. Form your "League of Nations," but do not forget that God has told you beforehand that "they shall not cleave one to another."

Verily, then, do the "ambassadors of peace weep bitterly," for their "highways lie waste" and useless. (Isa. 33: 7, 8). But thank God! the world is not without hope, even though the arm of flesh has failed it. The hour has struck. We need again to heed "The voice of him that crieth in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make straight in the desert a highway for our God. * * * And the glory of the Lord shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together; for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it." (Isa. 40: 3, 5). God's highway alone leads to the Golden Age; and, God's highway is Jesus Christ, the son of David, the coming King of Kings. When he shall come, "He shall speak peace to the nations." (Zech. 9: 10). When "his feet shall stand in that day upon the mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem on the east, * * * and the Lord shall be King over all the earth, * * * and it shall come to pass that every one that is left of all the nations which came against Jerusalem shall even go up from year to year to worship the King." (Zech. 14: 4. 9, 16), then, and not before, will the human race return to its Eden, the nations learn war no more, and sorrow and sighing flee away. Come, Lord Jesus, come!

A great American and a great Englishman were sailing together on the same boat from New York to London. The Englishman was extolling the greatness of America. The American replied, "Yes, my country is wonderful and great. But there is something my country sadly needs, great as she is." "And what may that be?" asked the Englishman. "An Emperor!" replied the American. The Englishman was thunderstruck. "What?" he exclaimed; "Do you, a citizen of the Great Republic, mean to tell me that you believe your country is in need of an Emperor?" "Yes," calmly replied the American, "We sadly need an Emperor,—Jesus Christ, the coming King!" Even so. Amen! "FOR YET A LITTLE WHILE, AND HE THAT SHALL COME WILL COME AND WILL NOT TARRY." (Heb. 10-37).

O Earth, strife-torn and old,
Thy God can renew,—
Bring thee thy age of gold,
Give thee sweet peace!

Riding the clouds, he descends,
Every warrior of Heaven attends!
Sons of hell cry in terror as he lifts his sword,—
Realize at last that Christ the King is Lord!
Sheathe, O Sword! Peace restored!
Hallelujah! Christ is Lord!

Observations and Suggestions

The foregoing represents the program for General Conference. It lacks completeness at certain points, but the details wanting will be supplied in the official folder. When the detailed departmental programs are presented almost every active minister, and many laymen, will have been assigned some part.

And no appointment is to be regarded as being unimportant, not even the reading of a scripture lesson or the offering of a prayer. In fact, it is incumbent upon each appointee to observe carefully the entire program and to give particular attention to the session in which he shares. While they may not appear in print there are invisible threads of unity and continuity running through the etire program. If faithfully followed we will come to a fine climax on Sunday.

Should any one receiving an assignment find himself unable now or later to be present for the presentation of his part, he should notify the secretary of the Executive Committee at the earliest possible moment. There are always a few absences and disappointments, but these should be the result of unavoidable causes and not the product of inattention and carelessness. Play fair, Brethren, you would not want to take the part of another at the last minute without time for preparation.

Let every one prepare as if everything depended upon him and let all pray as if everything depended upon God, and we will have a record-breaking conference.

REVIEW OF
The Thought and Work of the Church

P. P. P. are to us the most important letters in the alphabet just now and a few words will explain. To us they stand for PLEASE PAY PROMPTLY. On the tenth of the month we sent out statements to the churches, Sunday schools and individuals who are indebted to us and we trust that every one will make an effort to meet their bills before the last month of our financial year closes July thirty-first and we want to have our books make as good a showing as possible under present trying conditions as we make our annual report to General Conference.

As we went over our books recently we learned that more than one-third of all the business for the past year was credit business and on July tenth one-third of this business was still on the books and unpaid by our customers. Now the Brethren Publishing Company exists to serve, but it is not a Loan and Trust Company, and it is an imposition upon its good nature to ask it to carry so large a part of its yearly business upon its books. While the Brethren churches and Sunday schools have made more liberal contributions to missions and various benevolent purposes during the past year than ever before, and for which we all rejoice, yet the Publishing House should not be left "to hold the sack." A Sunday school or a church may feel, "O, well our bill is only $25.00 or $50.00 and a small amount like that will not interfere with the work of the Publishing House," but when that amount or more is multiplied by a hundred or more it amounts to considerable. So will you not PLEASE PAY PROMPTLY the bills we recently mailed to you?

In this week's paper appear the announcements of both Dr Furry and Dr. Miller for the opening of Ashland College and also of the Seminary neyt September. A wonderful change has been wrought among the colleges and seminaries because of the war, and there will still be a tendency upon the part of many to interrupt or even never to begin their higher education in order to get into the "thick" of the world's business and the world's demands, but it has been pointed out by innumerable leaders of the country that no interruption of the education of our youth should take place that can possibly be avoided. So we urge all Brethren parents who had contemplated sending their children to college next year to continue their good plans and to not fail to send them to Ashland.

Secretary-Treasurer Orion S. Bowman's report of the General Missionary Board of the church shows that a little effort on the part of the churches between now and the time of the meeting of General Conference will enable it to reach the 1918 goal very nicely. We trust all delinquent churches may respond to this appeal.

W. C. Benshoff, district goal director for Pennsylvania makes an announcement and appeal in this issue of the Evangelist to the pastors and churches of Pennsylvania that they can not afford to overlook. Every report will count and the early reports will count most favorably.

Miss Nora Bracken gives to our readers a very interesting report of her work at Vandergrift, Pennsylvania for the past year. She has visited a number of the churches in the state and has many opportunities for doing good work in the kingdom.

E. M. Riddle rejoices in the advance that has been made by the Brethren at Linwood, Maryland during the year. One of the very worthy steps was the making of a Brethren Sunday school out of what had been a union school for a quarter of a cetury. Some time ago we gave due mention to the achievement of placing the Evangelist into all the Brethren homes by this church and we feel sure they will never regret this forward step.

The report from Uniontown, Pennsylvania as given by the pastor, Brother Miller, shows that this congregation is making a real and earnest effort to bring every department of its work up to a uniformly high standard, by requiring of them written statements and reports at the annual business meeting of the church. The report made by the pastor to this same meeting reveals that the past year has been a busy one to him, but the business has been done as unto the King.

The Sunday school and Christian Endeavor workers of the Southern Indiana district are directed to read the notice of their president, E. A. Myer as it appears on another page.

The Editor had the privilege of conducting an all-day meeting in the Bethel congregation of the Glenford church on July fourteenth. It was his first visit to this church and was greatly enjoyed, so much so that he has agreed to conduct a similar meeting at the Baraca church on the twenty-eighth.

The program of the sixth annual convention of the Brethren Sunday schools and Christian Endeavor societies of the Northern Indiana district appears this week. The meeting is called at New Paris which is easy of access to all parts of Northern Indiana and should draw a large attendance.

We have received a copy of a local paper from Flora, Indiana, which gives a brief account of the work of W. T. Lytle as pastor of the Brethren church of that place. It has been a pastorate of more than usual duration and of more than ordinary success. Brother Lytle will take up the work of the Burlington and Darwin charge in October. The work at the latter place was organized by the Editor more than twenty years ago and he feels sure Brother Lytle will accomplish a great good in the whole charge.

The children will certainly appreciate the letter from Africa which appears this week written for Marguerite Gribble by her mother. It is a long way to Africa and the dates shows that this letter was written more than three months ago.

The work at Dayton goes steadily forward in summer as well as in winter. One of the latest achievements of the church was the burning of a $9,000.00 note against the church at a recent service. This church is thoroughly organized for systematic work in the kingdom of our Lord.

Pennsylvania is still showing the character of her people in the College Endowment campaign as conducted by Secretary Beachler. Altoona has done splendidly and we anxiously await the reports of Brother Beachler from week to week. The mercury in the Endowment thermometer is trying to keep pace with the rising temperature of the summer season and it does not seem to be losing in the race.

In a private communication from A. P. Reed we learn of an unusual incident in the experience of the First Brethren church of Los Angeles and how one faithful Christian worker can make her life count for God though she may be far from the home base. Miss Frances Nofziger, a young school teacher brought an old man and a young girl from Portersville, 200 miles away, to Los Angeles to receive baptism by triune immersion.

The program for the General Conference appears in this number of the Evangelist. It is a strong program, and is full to the roof. Look it over and then determine whether it will be worth your while to attend.

Just before going to press we received a telegram from Brother Carpenter asking us to make an urgent appeal for a Matron for the Dormitory in Kentucky. This is real missionary work. Who will volunteer for the task? Write Brother Carpenter immediately.

Another telegram from Brother Cook states Thomas is at Krypton ready for a great evangelistic meeting. The prayers of the Brotherhood are solicited.

A number of items of personal interest that should have appeared in this column this week are crowded out for want of room. We beg the pardon of any who may seem to have been slighted.

Around the Editor's Table

Doing What We Can

One of the great features of the Christian religion is the reasonableness of its demands. Nothing impossible is required of any one. While some of the requirements may be impossible from a human standpoint alone, yet it is to be noted that the Christian religion is something more than human and what the natural man may lack in himself to make a good Christian God has provided in the help of the Holy Spirit that none may say, I can not meet the requirements of the Christian life, therefore I will make no attempt at it for to do so would be failure from the beginning.

While Christianity is first of all a system of faith yet in reality it is a faith that is exemplified in action and the real Christian is more than a believer, he is a doer. The faith that is not manifested in the activities of Christian life or in works may well be called a dead faith, for life and a living faith denote action.

It may be a little difficult to do some of the things the Christ religion requires of its followers, but it is not impossible. Perhaps one of the greatest obstacles in the way of the average man is he wants to choose his own work and sometimes his choice is not wise because he does not choose the things he can do, and frequently if he can not do the thing he wants to do rather than the thing he really can do he refuses to do anything.

It may be altogether impossible for some people to do what some others can, but there is yet something they can do to advantage even though they may be handicappel in many things. One of the things needed is the spirit of determination of the one-legged man who was determined to be a soldier, and who when rejected by the local board, appealed to the district board, and being rejected again he kept on applying for a place in the American service until he succeeded in spite of his missing leg and the opposition of the various boards. His plea was that he was an expert hoisting engineer and that though possessed of but one leg he could successfully operate two hoisting engines at one time. He was finally detailed to Vancouver, Washington, to assist in getting out spruce timber for airplanes.

The point has been made in one of our exchanges that as this man found something to do to help win the war so every man in America can find something he can do to help no matter what his circumstances may be. The point is well made, but the action and determination of this one-legged man to fight for his country also illustrates how one should be determined to serve in the ranks of Jesus Christ and to use his talents whatever they may be, whether great or small, in helping to win the world for Christ. Do what you can.

The Greatest Army Division in the World

There has long been a rivalry between some nations of the old world to develop the largest army or the largest navy of the entire world. Little consideration was given to the burdens that such ambitions might lay upon the shoulders of an already overburdened people. It was taken for granted that their backs were strong and that in spite of the poverty of the millions they would yet bear this extra burden which meant so much to the ambitious ones and which finally culminated in the conflagration in Europe.

Since the breaking out of the war some of the nations that originally were not exceptionally strong from a militray standpoint and in the size of their armies have developed large and effective armies in an almost incredibly short period of time, and now they count their soldiers by the millions; but mighty as the war machine of Germany may be, or brave and effective as the armies of France, England, America and little Belgium may be, yet none of these nor all of them combined constitute the greatest army in the world.

The greatest army division in the world, and the army that has the most wonderful future before it because of the nature of the work to be done and because of the age and character of those enlisted in its ranks is the Sunday school army. Marvellous changes in the training of this army, of its officers and its members in the ranks have taken place during the last ten years and it will not be long at the present rate of progress until it becomes one of the most efficiently trained organizations in all human society.

The greatness of this army may be understood better if it is known that it consists of 290,000 regiments, with a total enlistment of 28,587,000 members, divided up into companies (classes) of a size to secure the best results in the field of activities. While this is an army of volunteers, yet it seems that it is often necessary to draft men and women into the service of leaders, teachers and officers. The officers' and teachers' training camps have been located conveniently in practically every town and city and there is really no excuse for inefficiency in this line or in this departemnt of the service. The morale of the ranks depends largely upon the leadership and the efficiency shown by it. It is according to human nature to follow willing leaders that manifest a real competency in their leadership and that are able to give some evidence that they are really leading somewhere. The demands of the age require effective leadership. What is the Sunday school doing to develop this great need?

Saving the World from Destruction.

That the world is rapidly going to the "eternal bow-wows" is the settled conviction of a great many people, and most of the remainder of us are compelled to admit that we have to fan our optimism occasionally to keep its fires burning with any degree of fervor. Of course something is radically wrong with the world as it is and some of us may be free with our diagnosing of its ailments, though we may not then be sure we are able to prescribe an effective remedy.

Autocracy and militarism may be numbered among the rocks upon which civilization may meet destruction if the dangers are not removed and it may be that the great struggle to establish a democracy that will recognize the needs of the people of all the nations of the world is the very best thing that can be done from a human standpoint, but this world is not altogether under the control of human beings and it may be well to consider what some of the divine provisions for its welfare may be.

One of the oldest and most virile journalists in America is Henry Watterson of the Louisville Courier Journal. And while many of us have not held him in very high esteem because of his editorial attitude in regard to the question of the prohibition of the liquor traffic, yet we will have to give him credit for saying one of the most forceful things that has been said by any American editor since America's entrance into the war. In an editorial that has become famous the great editor declares that "demorcacy is but a side issue. The paramount issue is the religion of Christ. If the world is to be saved from destruction, it will be saved alone by the Christian religion." Will you observe that Mr. Watterson said ALONE by the Christian religion. There is nothing else that can do the work, there is no substitute. It is the same old story that the preachers of the gospel have been telling for many generations, though they may not have told it through such prominent pulpits as the Louisville Courier Journal. It has been quite awhile since Mr. Watterson wrote those words, but they should not be forgotten as they represent the most prominent recognition of modern times of the same truth uttered by the Apostle many centuries ago when he said, "For there is no other name given among men whereby they must be saved." It is Jesus Christ, in all and over all that assures salvation to a fallen world.

The Use of Tracts

In the current number of the Brethren Missionary appears an article upon the influence of a tract that is a strong argument in favor of a greater or more universal use of this method for preaching the gospel. While the preaching of the gospel by human voice will perhaps always be the most effective method for presenting the claims of Christ to the mass of humanity, yet there are times and occasions when a well written tract will accomplish what no serman can do as it is delivered from the pulpit, and it is for just such purposes as this that a more general use of tracts should be made.

Some time ago we called attention to the growing custom among churches and preachers to do less and less of the old fashioned doctrinal preaching. While we would not have a return of the days of controversy that were once the lot of the church, yet we feel that the church is the weaker because it has in a measure abandoned its strong doctrinal habits of thought and teaching.

In past years the Brethren used many strong doctrinal tracts in its work of building up a whole gospel church; but nothing new

A Missionary Confession of Faith

BY REV. HARMON H. McQUILKIN, D.D., ORANGE, NEW JERSEY
Pastor of the First Presbyterian Church

I believe in taking the Gospel of the Crucified One to the whole wide world. Every new and deeper insight into the character and purposes of Jesus, every fresh report from the mission fields, confirms and strengthens my belief in this program of evangelization for every race and nation.

First—I believe in this because God the Father believes in it. He created man in his own image (James 3: 9). That means resemblance to himself and solidarity among themselves (Acts 17: 26). In the restoration of God's image in men's spiritual natures (Ephesians 4: 24), there is an absolute community of need and right. Otherwise God's work of creation will be frustrated in its deepest intention.

God's love for men is bounded for us by the Son and includes the world (John 3: 16). How dare I change the boundary lines or alter the measurements of his affection?

In the Psalms we read this stupendous promise of the father to his Son: "I will give thee the nations for thine inheritance" (Psalms 2: 8). The divine transfer of the gift can never be made fully until those nations come to know him through the preaching of the Evangel. So I must do my share towards bringing his world-inheritance to Jesus Christ my Lord. I must go with God to "every creature" in my sympathy, my prayers, my gifts, or he will go and leave me behind.

Second—I believe in taking the Gospel to the whole world because the Lord Jesus Christ believes in it. He was the first foreign missionary. His Cross would, he declared, "draw all men" unto him (John 12: 32). He looked far beyond the Jewish fold to see his "other sheep" (John 10: 16). His parting command sent his disciples after "every creature" (Mark 16: 15), and "unto the utetrmost parts of the earth" (Acts 1: 8). "Christian" and "Missionary" are never forever joined in the vocabulary of heaven.

Third—I believe in taking the Gospel to the whole world because the Apostles and their successors believed in it. Peter, coming down from the housetop, fresh from his vision of the sheet let down from Heaven, was converted to Foreign Missions (Acts 10: 34, 35). Paul would build on no other man's foundation. John, in beatific vision, beheld a great throng around the throne, made up of "every kindred and nation and tongue and people" (Rev. 5: 9).

Fourth—I believe in taking the Gospel to the whole world because of the new life which it has created in the non-Christian lands. As the morning sun dissolves the mists and shadows of night and strikes to death the forces of decay, so the Gospel of the Cross dispels ignorance, superstition, despair, and destroys the destructive forces in the physical and moral life of men and women in the lands where before they held high carnival.

Fifth—I believe in taking the Gospel to the whole world because of the reflex influence of missionary activity in the lives of those who engage in it. The happiest Christians and most prosperous churches are those that are heart and soul in line with the program of Jesus Christ to give the Gospel to the whole world. They "keep his commandments" and so he "makes his abode with them" (John 14: 23). It is a simple proposition of cause and effect.

Only those who do the Lord's bidding and "go into all the world" to "make disciples of every creature" can claim his promise to "be with them always, even unto the end of the age."
(Matthew 28: 20).

THIS IS MY MISSIONARY CREED.

A Composite Deaconess

An Atlanta, Georgia, pastor has furnished us the following unusual story of his composite deaconess:

"To state our case in brief—we needed a parish deaconess and we had no money with which to employ one. I began to study the situation. There came to me a realization of the fact that right in our congregation were people who could do much of the work of a deaconess. Taking my text from the Bible and my illustration from the Korean church members, who gave not only of their money but of their time also, I preached a sermon on service and asked for pledges of time to do the Lord's work under the pastor's leadership. The result was a revelation. Different members volunteered so many hours a day or so many hours a week that we soon had a full time parish deaconess promised. Then I found myself up against the hardest work and the biggest opportunity I have ever had. My hands were full keeping my workers busy. I found a vast difference between trying to do all the work myself and in directing other people in doing it. Blue Monday vanished in the face of my calendar. I had no time for it. Here were dozens of people ready to work. Early Monday morning I had to get down to going over the reports of the preceding week and outlining the work for the new week. Every worker called at my study for an outline of work to be done. In my search for things to keep them busy I found some great new opportunities. There were women who pledged hours each day for visiting and for ministering to the sick and needy. That led to a systematizing of visitation and relief work. The cards of strangers who were at the services on Sunday went right into Monday's budget of work. Here were girls ready to read to "shut ins." We had to hunt up sick folks to be visited and read to, and we found some who had been woefully neglected. We began to work in various city institutions we had never considered a part of our parish. We found institutions entirely without any religious services. Here came mesenger boys ready to carry messages. Here were business men who pledged time more valuable than money. When certain influential men began to take time to go out to talk to other men about attendance at church services and their relation to the Kingdom of God, we soon reached the point at which we no longer loked cautiously around to see whether there were enough men present at the evening service to take up the collection. A young man who was cooped up in an office all day volunteered service there with his typewriter. One by one the pledges continued to come in until we had a deaconess of gifts so diversified that every department of the church work waked to a new and fuller life as our congregation became a congregation not only of hearers of the word but of doers also."

Soul Winning

The real objective of all missionary endeavor is the winning of souls, yet personal work for souls around us never enters into the plans of many of our missionary societies. We fancy that if we could stand by "Africa's sunny fountains" or on "India's coral strand," we would proclaim the love of Jesus to every passerby, yet our lips are dumb before those who are out of Christ all around us.

A missionary secretary makes this confession:

"I was helping to set up a big convention and was full of enthusiasm over making every session a success. On the opening day my aged fatheer, who came as a delegate to the convention, sat with me at luncheon in the hotel. He listened sympathetically to my glowing accounts of the great features that were to be. When I paused for breath he leaned towards me and said, while his eye followed the stately movements of the head waiter, 'Daughter, I think that big head waiter over there is going to accept Jesus Christ. I've been talking to him about his soul.' I almost gasped. I had been so busy planning for a great missionary convention, I had no time to think of the soul of the head waiter.

"When we went out to my apartment a negro man was washing the windows. Jim was honest and trustworthy and had been a most satisfactory helper in my home. Only a few moments passed before I heard my father talking earnestly with Jim about his personal salvation, and a swift accusation went to my heart as I realized that I had known Jim for years and had never said a word to him of salvation.

"A carpenter came in to repair a door,

I awaited his going with impatience to sign his work ticket, for my ardent soul longed to be back at my missionary task. Even as I waited I heard my father talking with the man about the door he had just fixed, and then simply and naturally leading the conversation to the only door into the Kingdom of God.

"A Jew lived across the street. I had thought that possibly I would call on the folks who lived in the neighborhood—some time, but I had my hands so full of my missionary work the calls had never been made, but, as they met on the street my father talked with my neighbor of the only Saviour of the world.

"A friend took us out to ride. I waited for my father to get into the car but in a moment he was up beside the chauffeur and in a few minutes I heard him talking earnestly with the man about the way of salvation. When we reached home he said: 'You know I was afraid I might never have another chance to speak to that man."

"The wife of a prominent railroad official took him out to ride in her elegant limousine. 'I am glad she asked me to go,' he said, 'for it gave me an opportunity of talking with her about her salvation. I think no one had ever talked with her about it before.'

"Yet these opportunities had come to me also and had passed by as ships that pass in the night while I strained my eyes to catch sight of a larger sail on a more distant horizon. I could but question my own heart whether my passion was souls, or success in setting up conventions."

The children of America should be taught, as are the children of Korea, to work for souls. Every Sunday school scholar should be a missionary to bring in other scholars. Every catechetical class should have, as one feature of its work, the gathering in and teaching in the way of salvation those who are outside the fold. A part of the missionary work of every man of the church should be the winning of other men. Our pastors should find their women's missionary societies dependable agencies in filling the pews of the church and in bringing under the preaching of the word souls that may be saved.

"He Is Counting on You"

"He is counting on you,"
On your silver and gold,
On that treasure you hold;
On that treasure still kept,
Though the doubt o'er you swept.
"Is this gold not all mine?
(Lord, I knew it was thine)"
He is counting on you,
If you fail Him—What then?

"He is counting on you,"
On a love that will share
In his burden of prayer,
For the soul he has bought
With his life-blood: and sought
Through his sorrow and pain
To win "Home" once again.
He is counting on you,
If you fail him—what then?

"He is counting on you,"
on life, money and prayer,;
And "the day shall declare"
If you let him have all
In response to his call;
Or if he in that day
To your sorrow must say
"I have counted on you,
But you failed me,"—What then?

"He is counting on you,"
Oh! the wonder and grace,
To look Christ in the face
And not be ashamed.
For you gave what he claimed,
And you laid down your all
For his sake,—at his call,
He had counted on you
And you failed not. What then?

A Letter from Marguerite Gribble

Brazzaville, French Equatorial Africa
April 20, 1918,

My dear little friends:

It has been six weeks since I wrote you and we are still here in Brazzaville. I am not big enough, nor old enough to understand all of the reasons why we are detained here, but I want to tell you about our life since we came here. When I wrote you last we were at what is known here in Brazzaville as "the English House." But we only stayed there four days, and then another gentleman come from Boma and our room was needed, and we moved to the house of a Frenchman named Monsieur gradwahl. This was a very strange place. Monsieur Gradwahl's wife was black, and his little children were dark too, although not quite so black as their mamma. Well, we stayed there only three days, Aunt Mae, Aunt Toddy, Mamma and I, and then we accepted an invitation from the Swedish Mission and went to live in some of their rooms. We had a little kitchen also, and so commenced housekeeping. That same day Daddy and Uncle William came. We stayed at the Mission for about nineteen days. There was a dear little boy whom I loved very much, although he was too young to play with me. His name was Tura, and he was the child of one of the missionary families there. While we were there, there were two wedding parties there also and every one was very crowded. We looked for a house to move into, but none could be found, so finally we moved into our tents.

Aunt Mae, Aunt Toddy and I had never lived in tents before, and many things seemed very strange to us. We got along very nicely, however, and we did not have to stay very long in the tents, as it was only a few days until we found a house. This house has three rooms and a "cook house" or kitchen. Mama calls it the "smoke house" as the only stove is a sort of brick stand on top of which the fire is built and there is no chimney or any other place for the smoke, except to fill the room and filter through the roof. Aunt Mae and Aunt Toddy have one room, Uncle William has another, and Daddy, Mamma and I have the other. We all like it so much better than the tents. We sleep on our little camp beds, under our mosquito nets that were made for us by the ladies of Dayton. We sit on the chairs that were given us at North Manchester. Daddy also uses the chairs for a work bench by putting a heavy plank over the backs of two. We eat from the tables that Daddy made in America. Daddy has made us a cupboard and a case for the kitchen utensils. Aunt Toddy, Aunt Mae and Mamma take turns keeping house. We have two boys who help us with the work. One is named Loubaki, and the other is Mompoyo. Aren't they funny names? They make the fire and keep it burning, carry the water, prepare the vegetables, wash the dishes and kettles, make the beds, sweep the floors, do the washing, ironing, etc. We are all studying French. Different ones of us have different teachers and we are all learning to talk more or less. Even I can say "S'il vous plait."

We have a man who brings us food every day which he buys in the villages with francs which we give him. These are some of the things which he brings: fish, chickens, eggs, nsafu, ikwa, turnips, cassava root, sweet potatoes, beans, lettuce, etc. We sometimes can get radishes, onions, water cress, etc. at the gardens. It is very hard to get chickens and eggs, and we seldom have them, but fish are very plentiful as we live right on the banks of the Congo River.

Nsafu is a strange food which is much the size and shape of a white walnut or butternut and grows on a tree and is prepared for eating by boiling a very short time in salt water. It is brown, has a stone and a strange taste like turpentine, but we all like it very much. Ikwa is a root which we grate up and make pancakes from the batter. Cassava root is the root from which the tapioca is made which you children eat in America. Aunt Toddy made some flour and some tapioca from the root. Yesterday she cooked some of the tapioca and I liked it so very much that I ate it nearly all.

We do not use lard or animal fat here, but an oil made from the nut of a palm tree.

Daddy, Mamma, Aunt Toddy and Aunt Mae are praying every day for permission to go into the great work into which God has called them. Until we get that permission we shall remain here in Brazzaville. We know that you dear children at home are praying for us too, and that your prayers will help us to win for Jesus many children who are waiting in the darkness of the French Sudan to hear for the first time of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.

Very lovingly yours,
MARGUERITE EDNA GRIBBLE.

Quiet Hour Talk

Lest we forget, permit me again a few words in behalf of the Quiet Hour. The world never was busier than it is now. Everyone that can must work. The whole country is in a feverish rush. There seems to be but little time or opportunity for composure and the inward and upward look of the soul. There seems to be much to prevent and hinder the proper observance of the Quiet Hour. But this only demonstrates the more forcibly the need of this precious season of refreshing. The heavier our burdens and the greater our temptations the more we need to draw nigh unto God. In the midst of these bewildering and exciting times let us hold steady and firm in our faith and devotion. We observe that when Jesus was the very busiest he would pause and go aside to be alone with God. Is our work then so important that we have no time to pray? Let us guard ourselves against the dangers of these strenuous times.

There are many needs for prayer just now. Our country needs our prayers, that she may be the real force for righteousness that she claims to be. The boys in the camps, upon the sea, and "over there" need our prayers. The church needs our prayers. Great doors of opportunity are opening to the church. Will she enter? Is she ready to enter? We also need to pray for ourselves, that we be not drawn from our moorings, but continue faithful. Hence the urgent need of the Quiet Hour.

Our General Conference is coming on apace. I wish that before conference I might hear from every Quiet Hour Superintendent, or president where there is no superintendent, as to the number of comrades of the Quiet Hour in the various societies. Some provision will likely be made on the Conference program for some sort of a Quiet Hour conference, of which I wish that many would avail themselves.

H. M. OBERHOLTZER,
Quiet Hour Supt. for the Brethren C. E. Union.

A BACK-YARD HUNTFR
By Joe Cone

I can't go hunting in the wood;
I wouldn't if I could;
And so I do the best I can,
As any hunter should.
I am a back-yard hunter now;
Large game does not abound;
But still I bag a goodly bit
From tree and vine and ground.

I spy the bluebird on the wing;
I hear the robin's cal!;
Bob White he greets me every morn
From on the garden wall;
And neighbor wren sings me his song,
While guarding well his mate;
And brother whipporwill at dusk
Usurps the garden gate.

I bag fine fruit upon the trees
And berries on the vine;
And all the fragrant flowers there
And butterflies are mine.
I lay rich trophies at the feet
Of her so sweet and kind;
I am a back-yard hunter now,
And O, what joy I find!

News From the Field

ASHLAND COLLEGE
Ashland, Ohio

The academic year 1918-19 will open on Tuesday, September 10. A well-organized school conducted under positive religious influences. Approved courses of study; well-equipped laboratories; competent instructors; abundant opportunities for partial self-support. Special provision for the training of teachers of religion in the department of Religious Education. Free tuition for students for the Christian Ministry of the Church. High grade instruction in Piano, Voice and Expression. New announcements ready for mailing. Write the President for your copy.

W. D. FURRY, President.

To the Pennsylvania Churches

The blanks for the final report are already in your hands. Your record for this year has been made. Splendid things have been accomplished. Goals have been reached. We have reason to feel proud of our achievement. You pastors, with the assistance of your good people, have done a big work this year in the district. There remains but one thing to do to put Pennsylvania "over the top." Kindly fill out the blanks and return to me at once. It is not enough that you have made the goals. In order to reecive credit, you must report. I will send to the National Director just what you send to me. I will send it promptly So please report. Report in full. You owe it to the church in general. You owe it to your congregation. You owe it to yourself. No one else can do this for you. Delay on your part means that the work of your people, however good it may be, is not reported —your congregation receives no credit. So all together, for a full report of the work from Pennsylvania.

W.C. BENSHOFF,
District Director.
Altoona, Pa.
3015 Maple Ave.

Linwood, Maryland

Our last report narrated a few encouraging facts concerning our work and we believe we have something else to say that will be interesting.

Just before the District Conference the church paper was placed in the homes of the church. This was no small achievement and a great deal of credit for this good piece of work belongs to Brother Charles Missler.

Those who have been here or have been otherwise informed, will recall that the Sunday school work in Linwood has been a union effort for nearly a quarter of a century, a number of years before the church was erected. This union school did a great work during those years, which came to a close on Easter Sunday, 1918.

After praying and planning for some time it was agreed to organize a Brethren Sunday school at the church. We agreed to have the first session July 7th. The organization was effected and teachers elected at a former meeting. By so doing, at our first coming together we were ready for the occasion.

After the lesson was studied, we heard the secretary's report for the day; we were greatly surprised to know that 88 were enrolled for the first session. We have a fine lot of children and young people in this community with unusual talent and it is our hope to enlist a large measure of it in our new work.

Dr. J. M. Tombaugh and family were invited to be present. Brother Tombaugh preached at the morning and evening hour. He knows this field and his messages were instructive, inspirational and tactful.

Brethren pray for us that this school may be a mighty force for righteousness in this community.

E. M. RIDDLE, Pastor.

Doings at Dayton

Believing that the readers of the Brethren Evangelist will appreciate a few items from the doings of the First Brethren church of Dayton, Ohio, we will proceed to give them briefly.

When the "Woman's Day" program was rendered on May 19th, the pastor made up his mind to honor the dads, and announced "Dads' Day," the next Sunday, May 26th. A special program was arranged for the morning service, and no one but dads were allowed to speak on that occasion in ten minute talks. Dr. J. M. Wine spoke on the topic, "Father's Responsibilities and Honor Due Him." Dr. W. D. Long discussed the "Father's Pleasures." Attorney Orion E. Bowman gave a "Tribute to Father." These talks were up to the minute. Songs and solos were rendered and the church calendar gave us this item on June 2nd: "Daddy" had his day last Sunday and was there with the bells. The program was interesting all through and all that took part did exceptionally well. Brother Charles Abbott's composition and solo on "Dad" captured the audience. Why not observe this day every year following "Mother's Day?"

From June 10th, for several weeks the pastor, William Spencer Bell and his family spent their usual summer vacation with his parents at Clifton Springs, N. Y. They made the trip by "Henry Ford" without a "puncture or blowout," found his parents well and had a splendid time at the old home. During his absence the pulpit was supplied on June 16th in the morning by M. M. Hoover an associate pastor,, and in the evening by Orion E. Bowman, who gave us a very interesting and entertaining Stereopticon Lecture on Missions in Kentucky, with views taken by himself. This lecture could be given in many of our churches to great advantage for interest in our missions. On June 23rd, the pulpit was supplied by Alva J. McClain, pastor of the Miami Valley circuit in a very acceptable way both morning and evening.

After his return Brother Bell occupied his own pulpit on June 30th, and was much refreshed from his vacation, and delivered his sermons in his characteristic way to appreciative audiences. He was delighted to see the Sunday school holding up so well with 405 in attendance with Brother Brumbaugh at the wheel.

July seventh was announced in advance as a Jubilee Service and I quote from the Sunday Calendar as follows: "This morning we all rejoice in this Jubilee Service, which represents the loyalty, sacrifice and faith of a people who believe in the Gospel of Christ and through whose patience and steadfastness we are able to destroy this $9,000.00 note. We are proud of the magnificent structure in which we worship and it shall remain the most sacred place on earth to us. The debt on the building has been a heavy burden and to some appeared an insurmountable task to accomplish; we have not yet reached the end of this financial obligation, but we are fast approaching the time when the last dollar will be paid. There was a time of rejoicing at the close of the service when Brethren Brumbaugh and Garver left nothing but ashes of that note after they were through with the operation, and we sang, "Praise God from Whom All Blessings Flow," and said Amen!

At the evening hour Brother Clarence E. Kolb, North Manchester, Indiana, while visiting his friends in this city favored us with a very timely sermon, and his servce was greatly appreciated. Thank you, Brother Kolb, come again.

Our pastor is now engaged in a revival effort with J. L. Kimmel, at Muncie, Indiana, holding their meeting in a tent for several weeks. Last Sunday, July 14th, C. E. Beekly, pastor of the church at Gratis, Ohio, conducted our services; coming to visit the church as one of those under his supervision as district evangelist, of a number in this part of the state. His visit and labors were very much appreciated by the congregation. Come again Brother Beekly. The pulpit will be supplied by Geo. Stibitz, Ph.D., of Central Theological Seminary next Sunday; and then we expect the pastor in his regular place until he goes to the Pacific Coast in September on his leave of absence for one year, during which time we trust he will be fully invigorated and able to return strong and robust to continue with us for a long term of service. E. M. Cobb of Los Angeles, has been secured to supply the congregation during his absence. We hope to have a good delegation from Dayton, at the National Conference at Winona Lake next month. Already twenty-two of our fine young men of the congregation have been called into the service of our country and we miss them everywhere in our work. May the Lord bless the Brethren everywhere and may we at Dayton share in your prayers for the extension of the Master's work in these troublous times, and hasten the coming of the King of Glory is our wish.

WILLIAM C. TEETER.
Publicity Agent.

Vandergrift, Pennsylvania

We can hardly realize that a year has gone into the past since we said good-bye to Ashland College and came to work with our brethren at Vandergrift, and again pass on into another field of activity.

Although we find difficulties and problems in all walks of life, we also find much joy and happiness; as the poet has said, "There is more sunshine than rain, more peasure than pain." So we found the past year in the Master's work well saturated with joy and happiness.

We find that those who are ambitious often set up ideals and aims that they do not always attain, and that was true of our work at Vandergrift. We did not attain all that we desired but the church reaped a small harvest, and seeds were sown for future fruitage. Some of the goals of our Four-Year Program were attained and our people are striving for the remainder.

Last December you read an acount of our protracted meeting which Brother I. D. Bowman held for us. Seven were then added to the church. On Mother's Day our hearts were again made to rejoice when another confessed the Christ. This young girl was also baptized and taken into the church.

Although the membership of this church is small, there is one out of this number who has become a life's work recruit. This young man, Brother Clark Cline, feels a call to the ministry. His aim is to enter Ashland College as soon as he can, to prepare for the great work in the Master's vineyard. He needs your prayers, as all our young recruits do. Surely there is no greater service than that for our heavenly Father. So let us assist our young people with our prayers and in whatever way we can to help them prepaer for this large field of activity.

In May our first Christian Endeavor Expert class graduated. There were only seven in the class, but a class of that number is worth while. The Christian Endeavor is not large, but it is not always the number that counts. It is often the faithful few to whom work is committed. May they always stand faithful and firm and God will surely prosper their loyal efforts.

Just preceding our spring communion we held a week of services. Brother Earl Flora of Vinco preached for us. Obstacles were in our way during this week but just the same much good was accomplished.

This should be one of our large churches but there are several things which have been standing in the way of its progress. Will you pray that these hindrances may be removed; that these good Brethren may receive light and wisdom from above and that the Holy Spirit may work mightily in this place?

We might add here that the writer had the opportunity of visiting two of Brother E. H. Smith's churches, Brush Valley and Kittaning, a few weeks ago. These appear to be promising fields. It will probably be of interest to our Christian Endeavors to know that our Brush Valley Brethren organizeda C. E. when we were with them.

We have also had the opportunity of visiting with some of the Brethren at Cherry Hill and in the vicinity of Indiana and Blairsville. These people are without a shepherd's care. Our hearts are moved with compassion and sympathy when we find those unshepherded. May the time soon come when we may be gathered into one large fold under our Good Shepherd's care.

Uniontown, Pa.

According to custom, the annual meeting of the Uniontown church was held during the first week of July. At this meeting the officers for the coming year were elected, and the business incident to such an occasion was transacted. One year ago we passed a ruling that all societies or auxiliaries of the church should have their matters so arranged that their fiscal year should end with June 30th; and each society was to make a short written report of work done to the annual church meeting. This was done and it surely added something inspiring to the activities of the evening. The reports all showed progress. The Sunday school increased from an average of 105 to an average of 121 in attendance, and from an average of a little over four dollars to something over six dollars in offering. The S. S. C. E. reported an increase in membership and over four hundred dollars in the treasury. They are working toward the church improvement planned some months ago. The pastor's and financial secretary's reports showed substantial gains both in membership and finances during the year. The church is also ably backed up by an active Sisterhood of M. & M., and by three Endeavor societies. The leaders of each of these made excellent reports, all denoting growth and progress durring the past year.

Among the things in the pastor's report were: sermons preached during the year, 165; prayer meetings conducted 55; additions 18; pastoral calls 486; weddings 4; funerals 7, and board and committee meetings attended 24. The pastor also teaches the Men's Bible class in the Sunday school and the Teacher Training class which meets each Tuesday evening. This is only a partial report and only hits the high places, yet it shows that we have our activities here at Uniontown that tend toward keeping an ordinary man quite busy. At present we are conducting cottage prayer meetings weekly in adidtion to our regular Wednesday prayer service. The Wednesday evening services are excepetionally well attended, I mean exceptionally well for Uniontown, but we are never satisfied, we want more. Now let us all pray for a great General Conference and for an ingathering next fall and winter such as we have never seen before. God will help us.

CAMPAIGN NOTES

Our report this time comes from Altoona. I am glad to say the "Weather Man" gave us delightful weather for our canvass at this place, and we preached to good sized audiences each night we were there. The Altoona congregation is quite similar to the Conemaugh congregation in that a very large part of the membership are men employed on the railroad and in the car shops. There is moreover this other similarity, that I found a warm hearted, loyal people, who were ready to respond to the call for Permanent Endowment.

Brother W. C. Benshoff is the pastor of the Altoona church. He was a former student of Ashland College back in the College days of the writer; and needless to say, he is in fullest sympathy with the present campaign, and he had his congregation in splendid shape for the canvass. This contributed much toward making my stay among the Altoona people both enjoyable and successful.

Altoona went $2200. This I regard as very good, considering that most of the membership are laboring folks and that there still remains $3,000 to be paid on the splendid, attractive new church building. But I must say that I did not hear a single person use this as an excuse for not helping in the cause of endowment. I am pleased to report that I found the different auxiliaries of this church ready to do their part in making a good showing for the congregation. The Sunday school, the S. S. C. E. and the Y. P. S. C. E., also the Junior Y. P. S. C. E. enlisted for very creditable amounts.

One of the gratifying features of our canvass here was the large number of people who enlisted. This is always encouraging inasmuch as it is a popular campaign we are executing which has as one of its aims the enlistment of the greatest number of people possible. The number of homes in the Altoona church in which we were unable to enlist our people for at least some amount is indeed away down at minimum. Our largest gift from an individual was $500. So Altoona places one more in the growing list of those who are enlisting in the larger sums for Permanent Endowment. We want to see this list continue to grow and I want the many friends of Ahsland College to feel assured that there is stiil plenty of room at the top. Cheer up, brethren, cheer up! It thrills my soul when I think of the many fine, big fat gifts I will yet enlist in this campaign for Ashland College.

Brother Benshoff's home was headquarters for me during the Altoona canvass, and it was a splendid home. And to Brother Benshoff and his many good people who took me into their homes during my stay I am greatly indebted. I shall carry with me happy recollections of the Altoona people. And I covet for them and their pastor a continuation of the fine success which has attended their efforts during the years they have labored together.

The Liberty Loans are coming in right along. It is surprising how our folks take to the idea of giving the College those Bonds. Of course now and then I find a man who pulls back in the halter when I ask him for his Bond; but it is remarkable what a little kindness and coaxing will sometimes do. Many of our people see that it is a real accommodation to them to make their money serve in two places. And that is just exactly what it means when a man gives his Bond to the College.

If our friends are watching the thermometer closely these days it must make them rejoice to note how old Pennsy. is making the mercury rise toward the top. Sure as you live, old Pennsy. means business. Think of it! The first 12 churches canvassed have gone nearly $22,000. Does anybody doubt that Pennsylvania means business?

Next week we report from Martinsburg and McKee. And I sure do have something mighty good to tell; but I must wait a whole week to tell it. Keep your eye on the indicator.

WM. H. BEACHLER,
Campaign Secretary.

Marriages

LEATHERMAN-ZIMMERMAN — Another College romance came to a pleasing climax on Sunday morning, June 9th, when at our home Rev. N. Victor Leatherman and Miss Hazel D. Zimmerman were united in holy wedlock. The impressive double ring ceremony was used. Launa Beechley and Paul Garber being the ring-bearers. Both of the contracting parties were members of Class of '18 the groom graduating from the Classical Divinity course and the bride from the course in Household Economics. After a brief visit with their parents near Dayton, Ohio and Salem, Oregon they will be at home to their numerous friends at Ripon, California where they have been called to serve the Brethren church.

May rich blessings rest with all these fine young people.

J. A. GARBER.

SEAGLE-HELWIG—At the home of the bride's parents in Warsaw, Indiana, June 4, 1918, Miss Olive Helwig of Warsaw and William W. Seagle of St. Louis, Mo., were united in marriage, the writer performing the ceremony. The bride has been a successful teacher in the Warsaw High School for three years, is a graduate of Winona College and an accomplished musician, being organist in the Warsaw Brethren church. The groom is graduating with honors from the Indiana University School of Law and will enter at once on the practice of law. Many friends predict for them a bright future.

G. C. CARPENTER.

HENNEY-WALTS—Mr. Homer Henney and Miss Hazel Walts were united in the bonds of matrimony near Lake Odessa, Mich., on the evening of June 20, in the presence of about 75 friends and relatives. Both are among the best of the young folks of the Campbell Brethren church. May their journey through life be filled with sunshine and song. Ceremony by the writer, who has ben a long-time friend of the groom.

C. C. GRISSO.

HOLMES-BROWN—On Wednesday June 5 occurred the marriage of Milo Holmes and Miss Anna Brown at the bride's home, Congress, Ohio. The bride is a daughter of the late Elder P. J. Brown. She is an accomplished lady and has chosen a splendid partner for life. It is the desire of their many friends that God's richest blessings may accompany them wherever they go. Ceremony by the writer.

BENJ. F. OWEN.

Our Dead

PALSGROVE—Charles Henry Palsgrove, son of David and Eliza Palsgrove was born in Fairfield county, Ohio, February 26, 1862, and died at his home in Pleasant Hill, Ohio, April 1st, 1918, aged 56 years, 1 month and 5 days.

In his boyhood days the deceased with his parents came to Miami county Ohio where he had spent the rest of his life.

September 24th, 1885 he was married to Amanda Huntsbarger who still survives him. To this union were born three children, a son and two daughters, who grew up to be known as among the very best Christian young people in the community, but in the short space of three years these three children had fallen victims of the dreaded tuberculosis, a great grief to parents and the community and a severe loss to the local church. Brother and Sister Palsgrove had been members of the Brethren church about 28 years at the time of his decease, having been received into fellowship by Rev. Kilhefner. In community life, business and church circles the deceased was a highly respected man and was a member of the official board of the church for a number of years and served also as a member of the village council. Besides the wife, four brothers and one sister remain with many friends to mourn the departure of a faithful, upright husband, brother, citizen and churchman.

Funeral services in charge of the writer, assisted by the other pastors of the village churches.

W. J. BARNHART.

DEETER—Isaac Deeter was born in Pleasant Hill, Ohio, April 1st, 1842 and departed this life May 31st, 1918, aged 76 years and two months.

The deceased was one of Pleasant Hill's oldest and best known and respected citizens. Brother Deeter has taken an active part in the public affairs of the community and served on the local school board and village council. At an early age he had united with the Church of the Brethren but in 1874 became a charter member of the Progressive Brethren church here, and for many years served as Superintendent of the Sunday school and as member of the official board.

The deceased was twice married, the first companion having passed away only seven years after their marriage. In July, 1871 he was married to his second companion who with friends and relatives survive him to mourn his departure. Ten children of the two unions still survive, and without exception are upright and industrious citizens of this and other localities where they reside, a splendid tribute to a worthy parentage.

In the absence of the pastor the funeral was in charge of Rev. Kerr of the Christian church, assisted by Rev. Flory of the Church of the Brethren.

W. J. BARNHART.

HOCKER—Sarah Hocker died at the home of her son, near North Liberty, Indiana, May 20, 1918. She was a member of the Church of the Brethren for many years. Funeral services by the writer near Teegarden.

C. C. GRISSO.

GOHN—John Gohn departed this life at his home near North Liberty, May 28, 1918. He was a member of the Church of the Brethren for many years. Funeral services from the Star W. M. church by the writer.

C. C. GRISSO.

RUPERT—Mrs. Oscar Rupert passed away at her home in South Bend, Indiana, June 2nd, 1918, at the age of 33 years. She leaves a husband and five small children. Sister Rupert was a faithful member of the North Liberty Brethren church. Funeral services held at the family residence in South Bend, by Elder G. W. Rench and at the church in North Liberty by the writer.

C. C. GRISSO.

STONER—Emma S. A. Stoner was born in Carroll county, Illinois, March 20th, 1859, and departed this life June 8th, 1918, aged 59 years, 2 months, 18 days.

She was united in marriage to Nelson Stoner, February 27, 1889. To this union was born a son Mallie, and a daughter Edna, who with the husband survive her. She leaves also to mourn her departure one brother, and two sisters.

Mrs. Stoner united with the First Brethren church in October, 1916.

Mrs. Stoner was naturally of a jovial nature and although being a great sufferer the past several months she bore it all with remarkable fortitude, and even to the last she cheered those about her by flashes of bright and good humor. She died triumphant in the Faith, anxious to depart to that realm where her suffering would cease never to return.

The funeral was held at the Brethren church in Lanark, Monday afternoon at 2 o'clock, the pastor, Rev. B. T. Burnworth, conducting the service.

JONES—Mrs. Mary Gillin Jones, wife of C. M. Jones, of Waterloo, Iowa, departed this life on March 14, 1918, at the age of 63 years. She was born in Pennsylvania near Ebensburg, being a daughter of John and Elizabeth Beallier Gillin. Her mother, who was then a widow, moved to Iowa when May was 12 years of age. In 1882 she was married to C. M. Jones. She had no children. Of Dunker stock her father was a deacon in the German Baptist church—she united with the Brethren church about 20 years ago, for about 8 years holding membership at Hudson, since then at Waterloo. For years she was in poor health, the last year of her life being seriously ill almost constantly. She was a woman of strong and vigorous mind, a patient sufferer, and a fine Christian character. Her husband, who survives her, is a respected and active member of the Waterloo congregation. The service was held in the Waterloo church, conducted by the pastor.

H. L. GOUGHNOUR.

FURRY—Emma J. Furry, wife of Elder John Furry, died June 9th, aged 54 years, 3 months and 12 days. She had been in failing health for some time. She was a faithful member of the Brethren church, dying in full hope of that glorious rest that remains for the people of God.

She bore her protracted illness with Christian fortitude. Sister Furry's kindness and generosity were known throughout the community.

She leaves a husband and son, and our faithful Brother, Elder Samuel Furry, father of the husband, many relatives and friends to mourn their loss.

May he in his infinite mercy regard the bereft family, and may they, though broken-hearted kiss the rod and say "thy will be done." Funeral services by the writer, assisted by Edward Byers and W. W. Frey.

has been written along this line for a number of years. The Publishing House used to keep a goodly supply of these tracts on hand at all times to meet the demands of the pastors and churches, but the demand has greatly fallen off and because of this and also because practically every doctrinal tract of the church should be re-written and revised before another edition of any of them should be published the House has let the supply run low until at the present time it is practically exhausted.

What Conference Should Do

It is not wise for the church to be without tracts to present its special plea to the world, but the tracts that are published and presented by the church to the world in need of the gospel should be authorized by the church and should have the stamp of approval upon them. Just now there seems to be a growing need of tracts as a means of carrying out some of the provisions of the Four-Year Program of the church, and to meet this need we think the General Conference should revive the old committee on tracts and publications and through this committee authorize the re-writing of every tract the church desires to use of its old publications and to prepare such new tracts as the needs of the day may demand. To meet the requirements of the present age tracts must be somewhat differently written than they were twenty-five years ago and to comply with these needs every tract in use should be modernized and brought up to date, not that the doctrines need to be modernized, but that the method of presenting them needs this change.

There will be a call made upon the Conference for some such arrangements and it will be well to think about the best methods of reaching this end.

VOLUME 40 ASHLAND, OHIO, WEDNESDAY, JULY 31, 1918 NUMBER 29

Co-operating With Nature

According to the Genesis story when God placed Adam and Eve in the garden of Eden to care for it there was every indication that it was his purpose to have a full co-operation between man and what we call nature. By his dressing of the Garden Adam would secure all that he could use in the way of food for the physical man.

If God is regarded as a beneficient being with the interests of his creatures at heart he must be considered as making provision for man's every physical need, and so far as we can see the chief end of all nature is to provide the necessities and comforts and luxuries of life to mankind. Yet only this morning we read, on the editorial page of one of our exchanges, the statement, "Nature is against us." To this was added, "and we must fight or suffer." The question immediately came forward, Is this really a correct statement? Is nature against us in fact? or is the struggle we must make to secure the best results from the world of nature about us only a method for self-development as well as for the subjection of the forces of nature? We do not believe nature is against us. We do not believe a God as we believe God to be would place human children of his own creating in a world of such conditions. When nature is against us it is because we have violated the laws of nature. It is true we do have to struggle to make nature respond to our wants, and while in the great natural world and its struggle for existence we must recognize the law of the "survival of the fittest," yet in human life we find a higher law than that, and the struggle man makes and the fight in which he engages are but efforts to bring nature into subjection to his will, and man is not weakened but rather he is strengthened by the struggle.

It is true that many of the forces of nature seem to be destructive forces, but the water that drowns also carries the commerce of the world, and the fire that destroys also is one of the greatest servants of humanity as its great power is brought into subjection by the industrial world, and the lightning that kills is also man's swiftest messenger to carry his word and his messages entirely around the world. So while nature does destroy, and while nature does do injury to mankind, we repeat it is only as man runs counter to nature's laws. Comply with nature's forces and nothing more beneficient in all the world is found, run counter to these same forces and no greater harm can come to the physical man.

I know we talk about overcoming the laws of nature and of improving upon what nature has done, but even this is but the aplication of human intelligence to the directing of natural forces that secures results that nature unaided could not secure. It is co-operaion with nature. When Luther Burbank develops a new fruit it is not that he has destroyed some law of nature nor that he has made any new law, he has simply added human intelligence to the operation of laws of nature that have been in force since the world began.

It is true that one may plant a garden ever so carefully in the richest soil in the world and with the best seed that can se secured, and then leave it to itself and it will go "back to nature"—become a veritable wilderness in a single season, but the fight that must be made to destroy obnoxious weeds only helps to develop the crop that we desire from the good seed planted, and what seems to be the opposition of nature is but nature's effort to keep a lazy man from neglecting to cultivate the soil that desires to produce him his living.

When the decree of the Almighty went forth, "in the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread," it was one of the most beneficent decrees that was ever handed down to man. If this decree were more fully lived up to there would be less need for the many sanatoria and health resorts that beckon to a decadent people to find relief from their physical ills within their walls.

While nature is not God and God is not nature, yet in nature is found an expression of God that reveals his beneficence in a most striking manner, and it should be the joy of existence to co-operate with God in bringing about good from the action of his natural laws, for all nature and all nature's laws are his.

From the Editor's View-Point

Education and Democracy

Few words in the American tongue have been more overworked in the same period of time than the word "democracy." That it is a great word none will deny, but that a word may lose its greatness and become commonplace by its too frequent and by its misuse must alo be admitted; and we are slightly inclined to the belief that the word is losing some of its glamour to the American people because of its too frequent use in places where it does not really apply.

It is not the purpose of this short editorial to define democracy, that has been done a great many times by writers who have contributed to multitudes of American newspapers and magazines; but what we want to do here is to show that it is as important to educate for the tasks of democracy as it is to fight for its possesion. The question often looms large in the minds of many people. What will we do with a world democracy should we chance to secure it?

A very important question is, Are the people of the world ready for democracy, and could they carry it on advantageously should it become a world condition? Of course the enthusiast may ignorantly declare that any people are better able to govern themselves than any one else to govern them, but let us not be too sure about that. Do we right here in America as common members of the world's greatest democracy give as much attention to the things that really make for a true democracy as we should, in other words have we been educated for citizenship in a democracy?

When the United States decided that we were in a state of war which Germany had forced upon us an urgent call was made for the youth of the land to rush to the defence of the American colors and to participate in the task of "making the world safe for democracy." Of course it is unpatriotic for any one to oppose the plans of the government in times like this and no one except such as the class of men of the type of Debs and his followers would do so, but sometimes the youth of a country make the mistake of letting their enthusiasm run ahead of their judgment and enlist where they can not do the greatest good after all.

Many young college students who had not reached the age that made them come under the selective service of the country offered their service freely and fully as a patriotic duty and thy counted it more than a duty, they regarded it as a sacred privilege. But has this been the wisest course after all Dr. Elmer E. Brown says, "A young college man can make his life count more for his country by sticking to his preesnt task than by rushing off to the recruiting office that will bring him soonest to the firing line."

There is a great fundamental truth embodied in this statement by Dr. Brown. Democracy needs trained leadership—a leadership that has been prepared to take a sane view of personal obligations to fellow men. There is no such thing as absolute equality among men. There must be leadership in the most democratic of democracies, and the world today needs such leaders schooled in the best colleges and universities of America, so we would urge the young student to heed the advice of Dr. Brown and to stick to his present educational task.

The Commonplace Man

When Abraham Lincoln said, "God must love the common people because he made so many of them," he struck a responsive chord in the hearts of the multitude for, deluded as some few people are concerning their own place in the varying scale of humanity, we still believe the vast majority of them recognize the fact that they are just common folks and as such they are willing to do the common things of life and to do them well. But because a man is a common man and because his life work may be the performance of the common things of life it does not necesasrily follow that the man himself is commonplace.

The commonplace man seems to have no initiative in his nature and no objective in his life. He has no greater ambition than to follow the course of life that offers the least resistance, or to pursue the easiest way. There are commonplace men it is true, but it is not impossible for such to rise above the commonplace into the extraordinary in life. There is a great deal more to the nature of many people than they are given credit for, but too frequently their real character is not revealed until some unusual circumstance brings it out. So long as life continues along an even course it may never be known what really is in a man, but when he rises to the height of his being to meet some emergency that is suddenly thrust upon him he astounds the world with his reourcefulness and his daring.

Regardless of the great and many evils attendant upon the great world conflict of the present it yet must be admitted that it has drawn men out of their secret chambers and has revealed their true worth as nothing else in a generation has done.

After spending many months working among the soldiers in many camps and after seeing their devotion and willingness to sacrifice what men usually hold dear a man of a great deal of prominence said, "Never again will I call any man commonplace."

The Contempt of Familiarity

The old saying, "Familiarity breeds contempt," is being demonstrated as true every day, and in more ways than one. Badges of honor were once held in high esteem, but of recent years they hav been bestowed so frequently on unworthy men for committing the most brutal of crimes rather than for performing deeds of chivalry and valor that all respect has been lost for those of certain types.

There was a time when men were envious of their companions who had performed a deed of such heroism as to win the decoration of the "iron cross," but a great deal of the glory attached to this decoration in former years has vanished, and it is now reported that in Germany the iron crosses sell for forty cents, and a New York paper facetiously remarks, "The depreciation of the paper mark accounts for a price still ten cents too high."

When men come to realize the vanity of trying to win worldly glory by performing dishonorable and inhuman deeds which are crimes in time of war as well as in times of peace they will then understand why the proverbial "thirty cents" seems too great a price to pay for a military decoration that once was regarded as priceless from a monetary standpoint.

The world is still ready to decorate men of valor who are willing to risk their lives in a good and moral cause and who may achieve things worth while for coming generations, but no number of iron crosses can obliterate the stain attached to them when they are given in recognition of nothing more than an act of brute strength or beastly ferocity.

Anxiety for the Morrow

While the spirit of the teaching of Jesus Christ when he said, "Be not anxious for the morrow, what ye shall eat or what ye shall put on," is very generally recognized as a wholesome one it is still regarded as a rather difficult principle to put into practice in actual daily life.

Men will consider what they shall have to eat and women will consider what they shall have to wear in spite of our Lord's reference to the ravens and to the lilies of the valley and of God's care for them. The changing styles of clothing which have been the cause of millions of dollars' worth of clothing for both men and women to be thrown in the great American rag-bag every year when less than one half their service has been utilized has been an unadmitted scandal for generations. Present world conditions have modified this extravagant practice in a measure but it has not been entirely eradicated. Yet necessity may drive men and women of only moderate means to use common sense in the matter of clothing and to wear garments until they are at least "frayed around the edges" before discarding them because they are "out of style." A late New York paper states that garment men are predicting that men's ready-made suits will reach $100 next fall. Then some men will economize.

Report of Church Extension Department

Section II: Methodology

A Cardinal Weakness.

Any long view of the home mission efforts of our church will reveal this cardinal weakness—the lack of both a generalissimo and a strategic reserve. Fortunately, world affairs will afford us a usable parallel for this in current ideas concerning happenings abroad. Practically all of our mission enterprises have been inaugurated without sufficient counsel or investigation, generally on the initiative of a single pioneer. The wonder is that so few have failed and so many have succeeded. We do not blame the pioneers; had it not been for their hardy conduct we would have had no gains at all. We have had just failures enough to point out the lessons as to what will not do, if we will only now have the grace and good sense to learn from the past.

Oversight we must have—oversight backed up by a permanent cash reserve fund for eventualities. Such an oversight and such a fund might have saved many thousands of dollars badly but conscientiously spent and also might have saved many a promising field long since passed to the limbo of the "might have been." Any sane methodology must consider this first.

Survey Fund

The oversight must be centered in the General Missionary Board, of which the secretaries of the district boards are "ex officio" members, by a closer alliance and the adoption of a unified policy covering the work of all extension agencies. This was provided for in the general re-organization of the General Board some years ago but has never worked out effectively, largely because the board in question failed to elect a Field Secretary, as recommended, who should have the personal responsibility for this co-ordination. It is imperative that this office be filled whether the said secretary actually take the field or not—probably not. A vast work can be done by correspondence.

The fund in question was called for by the Director last Thanksgiving Offering and is accumulating as that offering reaches its goal. It was named the Survey Evangelism Guaranty Fund. Also at that time $100 was called for for the inspection of of prospective points. The latter fund has not been used but waits on the working out of a definite policy at the coming Conference. The work comprehended under both ideas might be paid for out of this common Survey Fund. We hope the fund will be $1000 by that time, raised always a year in advance and banked for that exclusive purpose.

Operations of the Survey Department.

Let us consider the operations of this proposed department under the headship of the Field Secretary, co-operating with the various secretaries of the district boards as a unified department:

I. Evangelism for Dying Churches. This is perhaps the most immediate call. There are a number of such places which lack the leadership, faith, zeal, or the money to secure the needed evangelist to revive the work. The Field Secrtary, working through the district secretary, will put a competent man into such fields and guarantee his remuneration. Experience shows that in the vast majority of such cases the meeting will pay its own way. Whatever is short will be paid out of the Fund. Under ordinary conditions the Fund ought to cover a large number of places.

II. Establishing Class I Prospectives. In the last number of this report we spoke of a large number of promising rural fields, which, however, were in sparsely settled and uncertain rural communities that would hardly justify the large expense of mission funds to establish them, yet which had a claim on the church and often produced some of the brightest workers and choice examples of sacrifice. We said their problem was comparatively simple and we believe it to be so. Thorough revival methods for two or three successive years will win most such real prospects and do all that can be done for them. With a good Sunday school and perhaps a woman's organization, they can get along with very indifferent pastoral care from revival to revival, perhaps grow stronger because of their condition, and work out their destiny just about as well as though they had a resident pastor exclusively. Such fields often afford a key to some desirable population center either because it is near by or because of removals thereto. The church can do no greater work than to recognize the value of such places, give them a definite status, limit the expense to be aplied and let no such opportunity escape. There is scarcely a great church among us that cannot be traced back to such a beginning.

III. Inspection and Survey Evangelism of Classes II and III among the Prospectives. This line of activity differs from the two previous in that it deals with the preliminary stages of every standard church extension project. It is suggested in the opening of this article. Its need must be apparent to all. In this line of work the Survey Department would put ni, at the expense of the Fund, investigators who would thoroughly review the situation from every angle and make plans for an evangelistic trial meeting to discover the fruitfulness of the field. These investigators should represent not only the district board wherein the prospective field was located, but also the General Missionary Board of the church to be sure the judgments reached were sound. All preliminary expense would be borne by the General Board.

Typical Operation in Establishing a New Field.

Let us portray the operations in establishing a new mission anywhere in the brotherhood.

1. Preliminary conferences between the district board secretary and officers of the General Missionary Board.
2. Inspection trip or trips by the best qualified observers at the expense of the General Board Survey Fund.
3. If the report is favorable, a qualified woman visitor to be put in to study the available material in detail for one to three months. General Board expense.
4. An evangelistic campaign to be conducted at the expense of the General Board.
5. If the movement is thoroughly successful in the organization of a church and the proper location of its plant, the whole project to be turned over to the District Board for completion. If the success of the first effort is doubtful, the visitor can be left to try a preliminary Sunday school, care for the nucleus and spread doctrine abroad for a second effort. It is better to spend a few hundred dollars and know for a certainty than to load up a proposition blindly that can never make good. If the inspection is done thoroughly and deliberately such cases ought to be rare.

Distribution of the Burden.

According to the above it will be seen the suggestion is made that district mission boards spend their funds only for approved projects, all preliminary and investigation work to be done in cooperation wth the General Mission Board at the expense of the latter. The reasons for this are apparent. Under the present system the main activities of the General Missionary Board consist in giving grants-in-aid to various district projects, some of which are of the most uncertain nature. A careful and more business-like system must be inaugurated at once. It is far easier to train a few experts in one central system than to be sure that a multitude of districts will be able to use expert judgment in these delicate matters. Also the General Board by virtue of its relation to all other boards is in a better position to learn quickly the lessons taught in any district, however remote. Such lessons are available here and there and this whole report is an effort to utilize them.

We must adopt some such general policy for the various agencies if we expect to make any headway over the present. A more intelligent policy of co-ordination must be worked out if the General Mission Board is to be lifted from its present anomalous position and made the aggressive agency the circumstances require. We recommend these suggestions to the careful thought of all. Of course the transition from the present system should be gradual so as not to injure present projects.

Finally, in this connection let us note that the General Missionary Board will have another line of activity in territory where there is no organized district. The procedure should be the same in regard to new work except that this board would finance the project clear through to success.

G. T. RONK, Extension Director.

Viewpoint of the District Goal Director of Indiana. BY W. T. LYTLE

Our first annual report on goals attained and lost on the Four-Year Program for Indiana churches from the District Goal Director's point of view.—

What this report should mean to our churches is of greater value than I surmise some of our congregations and pastors really anticipate.

I will try and explain the matter as I see it from my point of view. First,—The report will show very definitely the weak places in our local organization and of course that shows us as an organization where we need to apply a special effort to attain and not slip back.

Second.—This report ought to awaken within each local organization a desire not to be found lacking, and if we have lost for this year so our report does not read like we want it to read, it will serve to arouse us from our indifference and cause us to be interested in achieving. In fact we ought to see that our eternally excusing ourselves and "going to do""—has made us a record that we can improve upon, if we will meet the issues as real problems and go forth in the name of Jesus Christ to conquer.

Third,—This report ought to show the real mission of a church to the community, to the extent that our local organization would know that it had a real place in the shaping of a community life, that others would know that the church was aiming at something which was making us put forth an effort to attain.

Fourth,—This report will quicken the pulse of zealous pastors, until they will want to assume the responsibilities with real business methods. Showing they desrie to be more efficient in doing the work which has been assigned to them as pastors.

Fifth,—This report will serve to spur up the sleepy and slothful congregations and pastors, until they will know by actual experience that the "Lord's Work Requires Haste," and that Paul knew something of the average congregation and pastor when he said "Not slothful in business."

Lastly,—The cause is worthy of a careful summary of the entire Four-Year Program as every goal is worthy of seeing how we can attain, and if this year we have not attained, then why not? Let us start forth with an ambition worthy in its object to make sure by our own help that we will, "go forth."

We hear a great deal these days about mobilizing, this is a day of marshaling together and concerting our efforts so then let us look at Wesley's conception of a mobilized church—"all at it, always at it, altogether at it." That is what we will have to do in the "putting over" of this Program. May no call, then be sounded, that falls on heedless ears. The churches have given in the past fine co-operation, and we must have more co-operation as goal by goal we attain.

This can be done, and should be done, and I am willing to venture the saying "THAT IT WILL BE DONE."

Surely Brethren, we ought to be willing to do our full measure when the report of the 1920 conference is read and made public, the sweet sounding echo will vibrate sending forth the word that not only every goal has been attained, but better yet, much more has been accomplished.

Then in the words of Paul, "This one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth to those things which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus."

Daring to Fail. BY C. L. ANSPACH

Sometime ago while riding down one of the streets here in Toledo, I saw this motto in front of one of our prominent churches, "To fail to dare is ignorance, to dare to fail is noble." I wonder if any of us are pausing long enough to fully consider that question. Are we daring to fail?

In the prosecution of this war our government is daring to fail daily. We have failed in some instances and the result of our failures is making us a stronger nation. Your success and my success are in direct ratio to our failures. It took a man like Browning to say, "Not what I am, but what I have aspired to be, comforts me." Never before in history has there developed a time when individuals are attaining success through daring to fail than now. After the entrance of our country into this war a young man from my office was successful in obtaining a commission in our army, was attached to an engineering division and sent to France. He was there placed with a French officer in a government factory. Recently I heard that while the French officer was on leave of absence this young American officer was placed in charge. He dared to fail and the result of his efforts was that production in that plant was increased 300%.

Life is a record of failures not of successes because failures make success. The leader today is the person daring to fail. No one, no matter how capable can be heard unless he talks. Your ideas may be laughed at but if you continue to think sometime an idea will grow and bear fruit. Your life is as important in the world development as any other. Fire away and eventually you will hit the mark.

After you have reached a decision see it through. In the private office of an official of a prominent company there hangs two mottos. The one is the picture of a bull dog standing on the defense with a piece of somebody's trousers in his mouth. Below the picture is this inscription, "Remember the bull pup, my son, his usefulness consists in his ability to stick." The other motto is, "the valuable man is the one, who calls upon his boss the least." It is needless to say that the theme of the mottos are "Sticktoitiveness," and "dare to fail." Make sure you are right, dare to fail and success is the result.

It is said that Thomas Edison made a thousand tests before he perfected the record of his phonograph. His daring to fail combined with drudgery resulted in the success of the record. We now see that in order to be succesful we must (first) ascertain the justice of our cause, (second) dare to fail, (third) exercise perseverance.

We must apply the principle of daring to fail to church work if we are to be successful. The live church is the one that is continually on the move with every member an active force. The best example of a religious worker endowed with this spirit is Billy Sunday. Here is a man who left a successful business career and dared to fail for Christ. We all know the wonderful work he is doing. To still illustrate this point we may take the life of him in whom not even Pilate, a judge of men, could find any fault, our Savior. His life is marked in its entirety with this principle. Every journey undertaken by him was undertaken in a spirit of daring to fail. All important steps were first taken by him through prayer with the Almighty before they were pursued and then followed a display of spirit which should be our guide.

We of the Brethren church have this brought home to us in a definite form because of our Four-Year Program. We are assuming a large plan and are now daring to fail. It seems that the theory of daring to fail is an inherent quality with which we are blessed. Our ancestors oppressed by religious restrictions, set sail for a new land which they had never seen, over a sea that they had never navigated, with nothing but a firm grip on God and with the thought of Lincoln's, "With charity toward all, with malice toward none and firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right; let us strive on to finish the fight we are in," finally landed upon the strange shores of our blessed America. We all know the struggles that were made and eventually they were successful.

We are now entering upon another contest, which is just and fitting. We are now at the turning point in the road of our progress. The result of our edeavors is dependent upon each of us. Through our failures we are now strong enough to attain these ends. We can no longer afford to remain inactive. Now is the time for all big movements. Toledo, a city of 200,000 population was asked by the U. S. Government to subscribe $9.409,000 on the third Liberty Loan campaign. Toledo hoped to raise $14,000,000. She actually raised $15,000,000, in 72 hours' time with a total of 70,000 subscribers. Incidentally Toledo was the first city in the United States with a population of over 100,000 to reach its quota. This feat could not have been accomplished two years ago. We are now raising $3,000,000 for a war chest. A certain business was listed to subscribe $5,000 by the war chest committee. The salesman in that territory called him and dared to fail. He did not ask for the amount specified but asked for $25,000. You ask what was the result? The salesman left that office with a check for $25,000.

Our College at Ashland, our only educational school is in need of money. We are endeavoring to raise $100,000 as a part of our Four-Year Program. I believe that the right time to put this plan across has been chosen. Granting that we have chosen right, we must realize that our church organizations should be active to accomplish these ends. Everybody in the Brethren church has a place to fill and now is the time to fill it. If we have any dead members in our organization let us bury them before they begin to decay.

We are now lined up on the starting line of a great race. The starter is ready to give the signal to start. All eyes are turned on the runners with expectant eyes. The starter is saying, "Get set,"—"Go!"

Another Conference

The First General Conference for the Evangelization of Russia which was in session at the Moody Tabernacle in Chicago from June 24th to June 28th will not soon be forgotten by those who were in attendance. The first session on Monday evening was appropriately given for the most part to the Swedish Ministers and Churches of Chicago, the closing address being given by Rev. Gustav F. Johnson, pastor of the great Swedish Tabernacle of Minneapolis. More than four thousand people were in attendance at the initial service. On Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday the Conference program filled the entire day beginning at nine o'clock in the morning and closing between ten and eleven each evening. Among the outstanding features of the Conference must be noted the following addresses:

"The Inspiring Vision of a Regenerated Russia," by Rev. A. B. Winchester of Toronto.

"Why Must America Take Leadership in Evangelizing Russia?" Rev. Pres. David Nyvall of North Park College, Chicago.

"Great Opportunity in Present World Conditions," Rev. Gust. F. Johnson of Minneapolis.

"The Bogoiskateli, or Seekers after God in Russia," Rev. I. V. Neprash, until recently of Petrograd, now of Philadelphia.

"A Concerted Movement for Russia's Evangelization," Rev. Wm. R. Wedderspoon, pastor St. James M. E. church, Chicago.

"The Russian Orthodox Church," Dr. Robert M. Russell of Moody Bible Institute, Chicago.

"What Has Been Done to Evangelize Russia?" Rev. Pres. Charles A. Blanchard, of Wheaton College.

"Russia's People and their Neighbors," M. A. de Sherbinin, one time profesosr Russian and Ruthenian, Presbyterian College, Winnipeg, Canada, and now of the Chicago Tract Society.

"America's Christian Duty to Russia," Dr. James M. Gray, Dean of the Moody Bible Institute, Chicago, and

"A Great Missionary Program for Russia," Pastor Wm. Fetler, President of the Russian Bible Institute of Philadelphia.

One of the very interesting features of this Conference was the presence of the Rev. N. F. Hoijer, Deputy Pan-Rusisan Evangelical Committee, who has already devoted forty years of his life to Evangelization work in Rusisa while under the rule of three czars. Mr. Hoijer's two addresses were entitled—"Forty Years in Russia," and "Among Mohammedans and Kurds of Ararat."

One of the sessions of the Conference was devoted to the topic "What Has Been Done for these People and their Neighbors Now in America." The Chicago Tract Society Missionaries reported of their work. Constantine Antoszewski spoke for the Russian Poles, Rev. Paul Kozielek of Detroit for the Austrian Poles, Rev. M. M. Aijan of Detroit represented the Armenians, Rev. C. T. Papadopoulos of Chicago the Greeks, Rev. V. Hlavaty of Cedar Rapids the Bohemians, and Mr. Andrew Todoroff the Bulgarians.

At the evening service of Wednesday, in response to an appeal of Pastor William Fetler over fifty volunteers came forward offering their lives for the service and the same evening an offering was made for the work amounting to something over ten thousand dollars.

The closing service of the Conference proved exceedingly interesting. At this meeting a special effort was made to bring together representatives of the different Slavonic peoples in Chicago, and brief addresses and appeals were made in at least seven different languages. The impressive singing of the choir of fifty students from the Russian Bible Institute of Philadelphia under the leadership of Pastor Fetler and the stirring addresses and appeals made by the Missionaries of the Chicago Tract Society, who told of their work among the Slavonic people here in our own land, will not soon be forgotten. During the entire Conference there was great unanimity and hearty expresisons of loyalty to our Master and of love to the brethren. The addresses were of a high order and it was decided to publish them in a volume through the Bible Institute Colportage Association.

In view of the great need of Russia it was unanimously decided that while nothing shall be done to interfere in any way with plans or work of existing denominational boards, still it is important that a strong and sympathetic Christian effort be organized as quickly as possible to enter upon this great and long neglected field, to carry on a work that shall be thoroughly Evangelical, but also strictly interdenominational so that intsead of exhibiting to the new Rusisa the different denominational features of our work in America we can go to them with a united front, with a united appeal and with a united effort to bring those one hundred eighty-two million people under the power of the Gospel of Christ.

The Conference was called by more than one hundred Evangelical leaders in different parts of the United States, Canada and England; and according to the recommendation of its Executive Committee a new organization was effected to be known as "The Alliance for the Evangelization of Russia." This alliance has an Executive Committee of twelve members and a General Council, which at the outset will be composed of all those who signed the original Manifesto, calling the Conference.

It seemed to the leaders of the Conference necessary, in view of the greatness of the opportunity, that a "flying squadron" of Christian effort should be organized at once to carry the gospel by the written and spoken word to the Russian people, and while undoubtedly the denominational boards will approach this task, yet under present war conditions the work of all will be painfully inadequate, and there is apparent the need of a united effort in which the faith and love of the Christians of Russia may find expression without reference to denominational lines. The effort of the Alliance will be to carry to the people a Christ rather than a creed, a personal Savior rather than any particular system of faith and order that has developed through the centuries of controversy. The promoters of the Alliance have set themselves at once to raise a $3,000,000 religious liberty fund for Russia.

The Mother and the Problem of Child Labor

Mrs. Max West of the Children's Bureau of the U. S. Department of Labor sends to mothers who are helping in Children's Year a word of reminder about children's work at home.

One is likely to think of child labor as a matter concerning factories and legal enactments, but as a matter of fact, many young children, well below the age at which they may go to work outside the home are put at work too heavy for their young shoulders to bear, or are kept at work too long, or too steadily within their own homes. Free unhampered play is essential to health and development in childhood and children who are unduly deprived of their playtime by work at home may suffer just as seriously as those who work for pay. This condition of affairs, of course, comes about largely because there is so much work to be done, and so few to do it that it seems necessary for each one to take some part in the work of the household. But it often happens that the young shoulders are given too heavy a load, the young muscles too great a strain and youth is made toilsome and unhappy rather than joyous, because parents do not realize what is happening.

The pathetic "little mothers" of our large cities, who have the care of their younger brothers and sisters, and the children, both boys and girls, carrying heavy bundles about the streets are common examples of children who have responsibility and heavy work which should not be placed on young shoulders.

In the country and on the farm children are often required to work in the field and gardens too long at a time, or to carry water and other weights too heavy for their strength and often to work under a blazing sun. Such early work interferes with growth and development, which is the one great business of childhood. Many men and women, whose physical strength is impaired, might trace their ills to sickness, underfeeding or overwork during the formative years of early childhood.

The tasks children are given to do should be suited to their years, and varied by frequent opportunity to rest and to play. At the same time food should be good and plentiful and there should be long hours of sleep. The harm which heavy work can cause little children can be ill afforded at any time, and least of all now. For the children must be kept well and strong to meet the demands which will confront them when they come to maturity and face the tasks of reconstruction in the critical years to come—work which will demand physical wellbeing as well as efficiency and character.

Prime Moral Obligation

BY HENRY M. LELAND

I am not a Methodist, nor am I a preacher, but as a believer in fair play I appreciate the humane and just provision the Michigan Methodists are making in creating a fund for their veteran preachers.

When one considers the years of special preparation to which clergymen submit themselves, and also thinks of the sacrifices they constantly bear, and of the hours of service which they give, and then considers the wage given them for this unselfish service, one is inclined to feel ashamed of the Christian Church.

That recruits for the ministry are still presenting themselves under these circumstances speaks more eloquently of the character of the applicants than of the sense of fairness of the churches. During his active service a minister is entitled to at least as much money as a hod carrier, or other unskilled and untrained labor. After having given his life to such sacrifice for the good of the church, and being deprived during that service of any opportunity for laying aside funds for his old age, it is a prime moral obligation upon the church to care for him after his years of active service are over. A church that will not do this is not entitled to consideration by young men who feel called of God to preach, and I hold it as a conviction that any church that will so shamelessly mistreat its servants will sooner or later come under the active displeasure of God. Your work is a work of simple justice. It surprises me that other denominations have been so inactive.

I wish you the best of success in this laudable undertaking.

an organized and well-directed intensive cultivation they would pay largely."

The Wichita Beacon points out that there are fifteen million acres of irrigable territory in the West, much of it in the western part of Kansas. These reclaimed areas must be taken in hand now, for "if the war is to end in 1920 or 1921, which seems probable, if all goes well, work will have to commence now in order to provide sufficiently large tracts of usable land for the soldiers who are coming back." The Spokane Spokesman Review thinks Secretary Lane's project is "of deep and particular interest" to the Pacific Northwest with its extensive irrigable areas and its constantly increasing expanse sof logged-off lands. It reminds us, moreover, that his estimate of cut-over timberlands at 200,000,000 acres is more clearly comprehended when it is considered that this area "approximately equals the combined areas of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Wisconsin, Indiana, Kentucky, Maryland, Vermont, New Jersey, New Hampshire, Delaware, Connecticut and Massachusetts." Says the Portland Oregonian:

"The varied work of reclamation will have to be done on so large a scale, and will employ such vast capital, that it can be done only by the Government, or under government direction. Most of the land in question being in private ownership, it will be necessary for the Government either to buy it outright for resale to the settler after it has been reclaimed, or to arrange terms on which the owner shall pay for the reclamation and shall sell to the settler.

"An essential part of the plan is that the farmer shall own his farm. That would go far toward stopping the prevalent tendency toward tenancy, which is introducing into this country the evils of European landlordism. By attracting a large number of former urban dwellers to agriculture it would do much to correct the balance between urban and rural population, which has been swinging strongly toward these cities."

The Story of a Cradle Roll

BY GRACE B. SANDERS

Three babies were born in the same town upon the same day, one in the big house on the avenue, one in the middle-sized house on a common street, and one in the hovel on the edge of a great forest.

Master Bob opened his eyes in a palace. There was a white-capped nurse in attendance. A little bed was ready, whose mattress was of softest silk and blankets of finest wool. He and his mother had everything which money could buy, but money, alone, will not buy happiness.

All day the mother lay alone in the big bed in that upper room. She heard the tread of feet below the stair and occasionally the nurse's low sweet voice, but always, and ever she was listening to the rattling of the car a block away. She listened for the opening of a lower door, but the day passed and darkness came without a visitor, and finally a man hurried in and past her bed to the crib.

She heard him talking in low tones to the nurse. He was leaving without even speaking to her. When she called "David," he came and bent over the bed, but his breath reeked so of liquor that she turned her head away murmuring: "Oh David, you've been drinking again."

He straightened himself and blustered, "I've a right to celebrate the birth of my son and heir, and I'm going to do it again and I'll stay all night and I'll drink as much as I please."

He banged the door and was gone and then the poor little orphan society girl who had flippantly declared that she did not need the church so long as she had money, buried her face in the pillow and wept. She was all alone in the world—father gone, mother gone, brother, and sister. She thought of the sorrow and suffering through which she had passed. She remembered the sentence about the sins of the fathers being visited on the children, and she wondered if she had brought the beautiful boy into the world to be what his father was. And when she thought she could not stand it a minute longer, a soft hand touched her forehead and a cheery voice called, "How are you darling?"

A short little woman with a pug nose and shining hair and blue eyes stood before her in a tailored gown of blue. The little mother recognized her as Mrs. Thomas Booth, one of the most important women in the town. "I heard you had a lovely little boy, and I thought I'd run in and see you."

The little woman was so glad. And somehow it was not long before she had told Mrs. Booth all her joys and fears. Mrs. Booth nodded understandingly. "He's a lovely boy. I don't wonder that you wish to raise him right," she said. "May I come again, and shall I put his name on the Cradle Roll?"

"I'll be glad for you to come. My mother is dead and you may put his name on the Cradle Roll if you like. We're not church folks, but it won't do any harm."

Little Mrs. Booth smiled happily to herself when she went away. Her friends had laughed at the idea of going to these ungodly, wine-drinking people. Other church workers had applied in vain for admittance. She had gained entrance because of a little child. She bade the mother goodbye, and went to visit the middle-sized house, and the hovel on the edge of the forest.

A month later, she and the minister called at the house on the avenue. The young father felt so important that he promised to attend the men's club meeting at which a prominent Senator was to speak. He went and was amazed that such a pleasant evening could be spent in innocent amusement, and when he woke next morning without the headache which usually followed nights of dissipation, he avoided the sideboard which he patronized quite freely and patting his wife's cheek, he said, "I'll have to cut a little of that out if I'm going with church people."

He went to the church on Sunday morning and was delighted with the men he met there. And thus passed the year. When Cradle Roll Day drew near Mrs. Booth sent out her invitations, and about a week afterward she followed her visit with a call. She had just rung the ball at the big house on the avenue when the little mother came running to meet her.

"Oh, you blessed angel," she cried, "we're just the happiest folks and it's all because of you. When you came Fred was drinking, and I was almost wild, but he's been improving right along, and when the Cradle Roll invitation came, what do you think he said? He said, 'We'll go and we'll make the confession so as to be able to raise him right.' Oh, Mrs. Booth, I am so happy."

Mrs. Booth was happy, too. She followed the little mother into the room that she might see Baby Bob's clothes. The mother was saying, "I want him to be the prettiest baby there," but the Cradle Roll Superintendent was thinking, "What if I had not called."

She left after a while and walked down to the middle-sized house on a common street. A dumpy little brown-eyed woman saw her coming, and waved her flag of truce, a baby's white dress. "You blessed angel! I am the happiest woman on earth," she said when she was in Mrs. Booth's arms. "Bob has a better job, and he said he would join the church tomorrow. Oh, Mrs. Booth, I am so glad!"

Glad? Mrs. Booth could not speak, but after a while she took her basket and walked out of the city and out in the country road. Cows nipping at the white clover were lazily straggling homeward. She heard a robin twittering in an apply tree, and a child's sleepy cry. She reached the hovel and saw a women in a brown calico gown. Her face was brown and spotted as an autumn leaf.

"Are you ready for Cradle Roll Day?" cried Mrs. Booth.

The woman did not turn. "I was just a-thinkin'," she began, in a queer strained tone, "of how things was when you come. I'd been sick, and I got out of bed and crawled out into the kitchen. The cupboard was empty and I didn't know what to do, for we were hungry. The house was dirty, and the children's clothes were worn, and I was just a-wonderin' how I'd get enough to cover one more body, even if it was a little one. And I seed you a-comin' in your fine duds."

Mrs. Booth sat down outside the door and fixed her eyes upon the brilliant sunset.

"I knowed you had scads of money, and my heart was as hard as nails because you had so much and I had so little. I hated you. I never thought of you stoppin', but you did, and you asked to put Baby Bill's name on the Cradle Roll. It pleased me, but I made fun, and told you I'd ruther have a bread roll than a Cradle Roll, and you opened that very basket you're carryin' and give me food enough for us all. When you come back and brought that certificate all framed up nice and shiny, I hung it on the wall and it looked so pretty that I got ashamed of my house, and after you was gone I went to work and scrubbed the floor as bad as I felt. And Bill come home, and he was so pleased that he fixed some chairs that I'd begged him to do for more'n a year, to have mended. He got a job on a farm that week. He commenced going to church, and ever since he's bringin' his money home and actin' like a decent human bein'. He was tickled to death about that Cradle Roll invitation and he brought this," the woman held up a coarse white dress on which she had been working, "and he said we'd go to church tomorrow and make the confession every one of us. Oh, Miss Booth, I can never thank you for what you did for we'uns."

All these things were to be accomplished on the morrow because of her work. Little Mrs. Booth took from the basket the little white things which she had prepared for Baby Bill.

She hurried away after a while through the velvet dusk which was perfumed with roses and variegated by stars. She reached the top of the hill and looked out across the fields at the big house on the avenue which was ablaze with light, at the middle-sized house on a common street which was lighted by a kerosene blaze, and finally out at the hovel on the edge of the forest where the tapers glittered like fireflies through the night. And as the greatness of the work came upon her, as she thought of the thousands of little ones coming up without Christ in the home or the church, she trembled like a storm-tossed ship upon a troubled sea.

She fell upon her knees to pray, and as she waited there asking, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do " a voice seemed to float up from the valley, saying:

"Hark, 'tis the Shepherd's voice I hear,
Out in the darkness cold and drear,
Calling the lambs lest they go astray
Far from the Shepherd's home away."

And with these words ringing in her ears, she rose from her knees, with a deeper determination than ever before to seek out the little ones and bring them safely into the heavenly fold.—American Mesesnger.

REVIEW OF
The Thought and Work of the Church

After an absence from our columns for several weeks the Honor Roll for Brethren churches that have placed the Evangelist in all the homes of their active membership appears once more, It is the Roann, Indiana church and their energetic pastor, Roy Brumbaugh that are responsible for this re-appearance of the Honor Roll. The list of subscriptions from Roan is a most worthy one and we extend our congratulations and thanks to Brother Brumbaugh and his loyal workers. This new addition to the Honor Roll helps us to keep the Evangelist list up to the point we desire to have it when we make our annual report to the General Conference.

The July number, or number four, of the Brethren Missionary quarterly has been mailed to all subscribers and a few hundred copies will be sent to the Winona Conference for distribution among those who are not subscribers. This is the best number yet published and contains twenty-four pages and cover, or twenty-eight pages in all. It gives a full report of the Easter offering for foreign missions and shows that in this offering the church "went over the top and beyond." The total offering amounting to more than twelve thousand dollars. The twelve churches that gave the largest sums are as follows in the order as given: Long Beach, California; Roann, Indiana; Sunnyside, Washington; Whittier, California; Goshen, Indiana; Nappanee, Indiana; Millersburg, Iowa; Washington, D. C.; Ashland, Ohio; Berne, Indiana; Johnstown, Pennsylvania.

W. H. Miller asks us to announce that his correspondents will reach him more directly if they will address him at North English, Iowa, where he is located for the summer at least.

Every member of the church that contemplates attending the Winona Conference should read every word of the suggestions made by the secretary, Dyoll Belote. This will be one of the most important Brethren Conferences of recent years.

G. C. Carpenter makes a most earnest and a most justifiable appeal to the churches to come to the help of the General Misisonary Board in its attempt to relieve the Washington City church from the last mortgage that has been held against the property for many years. If our readers will take the pains to note where the Washington church stands on the list of churches in its contribution to foreign missions they will find that it is loyal and generous to the core.

A. B. Cover, one of the Executive Committee of the General Conference is urgent in his appeal for a good attendance at the Conference. We hope to have something in our columns each week from now until the meeting of the Conference that will cause the people of the church to want to attend.

In a very brief note Brother Lyon of Washington expresses the delight of the Washington membership over the readiness with which Brother Carpenter has taken up the proposition to cancel the mortgage on the church property.

Whittier, California has recently passed through a season of spiritual refreshing and soul harvest. N. W. Jennings held an evangelistic meeting in this congregation in June which resulted in many confessions and re-consecrations. The pastor, A. V. Kimmell, reports that eighteen were baptized during the progress of the meetings and that others have been baptized since that time. Just how many we do not know. The Whittier church has made splendid progress during the past year.

The letter from C. F. Yoder contains most cheerful news. The missionary work in South America seems to be gaining favor among the people steadily, and the opposition from some of the Roman Catholics to Brother Yoder continuing as a professor in the great state college, during his furlough in the home land, has broken down and he now has all his work in the college back again which gives him a splendid opportunity to shape the lives of the student body.

Brother Sands is having plenty things happen at Sergeantsville and Pittstown, New Jersey to add zest to his labors. 'Definite work undertaken for God seems to have aroused the ire of Satan and his hosts, but Brother Sands and his co-workers are not only determined to stand their ground but to make decided inroads into the ranks of the enemy as well.

Long Beach, California has just passed through a season of refreshing under the leadership of their pastor L. S. Bauman. In a two weeks' meeting twenty-nine confessions were secured and the church greatly strengthened. Delayed work in completing the church has now been finishd and paid for as well. This was done at this time to be better able to entertain the Brethren Bible Conference which meets at that place.

Brother J. G. Dodds has recently moved into the Maple Grove congregation in western Kansas. Though this church has been pastorless for seven years the faithful ones have not given up and Brother Dodds hopes to help them to a more active life in the kingdom of God.

Wm. C. Teeter, acting pastor at Camden, Ohio makes a good report of the work being done that that place. It is one of the newest points for the Brethren in Ohio, but it is going on to success. L. S. Bauman has been engaged to lead them in an evangelistic campaign in the winter.

A short report of the churches that have responded to the call made by the Ohio conference for contributions for the Board of Benevolences and the Four-Year Program fund is made by secretary Mason. Delinquent churches should heed this notice and give the support the conference has requested of them.

E. H. Smith reports again the progress of the work of the Lord in his parish which covers almost an entire county. Brother Smith is a hard worker and he is getting results from his labors in Armstrong county, Pennsylvania. A goodly number of members have been added to this charge during the past year and the outlook for still better harvests is promising. I. D. Bowman's recent labors among them were greatly appreciated.

Brother Beachler's Campaign Notes are of special interest this week. Other weeks have resulted in larger gifts to the College Endowment fund but not many have been of the same character as this week. The gifts of notes, money, Liberty Loans and deeds to lands make it an unusual week in the campaign. There is no reason why Ashland College should not receive a most liberal endowment from the Brotherhood. While the Brethren church is not a rich church as the world counts riches, it is yet a well to do church and is amply able to meet the financial needs of the day.

The program of the eighth annual convention of the southern district of Christian Endeavor and Sunday schools of Indiana appears in this number of the Evangelist. Indiana is reaching a front line position in her Sunday school and Christian Endeavor work.

Both Dr. Miller and James S. Cook report the services of the dedication of the Krypton, Kentucky church and school. Brother Miller has nothing but good to say of the work of all the Brethren in Kentucky, but he does make a most earnest appeal for a larger force of workers to "go up and possess the land." It seems that this is the day of opportunity.

The organization of new Christian Endeavor societies is reported this week and Brother Garber bids a hearty welcome to these new recruits to the army of young people who are fighting the good fight of faith in the name of the Lord.

We have just learned that some copies of the Evangelist have not reached our subscribers right here in Ohio for more than a week after they were mailed, and subscribers in the far away states are also disappointed many times. However, it seems there is nothing that can be done about it as the mails are so congested that prompt delivery of second class mail seems impossible.

Around the Editor's Table

Science and Religion

Too long has it been claimed that there is a conflict between science and religion. It may be true that many scientists are not religious just as it is true that many religionists are not scientists, but there is no reason that we have discovered why one can not be both and be consistent. It is when men belonging to either class deny to the other the right to uphold the principles in which they firmly believe that the conflict appears. One of the reasons for apparent conflict between science and religion is because some scientists have never experienced religion and do not understand it, and another reason is many deeply religious people have never experienced the emotions of the scientist and they know little, if any thing, about the science they condemn.

It is not only the man who has devoted himself to the mastery of the mysteries of the natural sciences that is accused of working counter to the plans of God, but the man who has given much thought and time to studies in political or social science has also come into his inheritance as one who is attempting by human methods to accomplish only what God himself can do.

We think that much of the criticism that is made of the work of men and women who preach and try to work out a social gospel is a criticism of misunderstanding. It will not do to take the utterances that some few radicals have made in their books or writings and condemn the whole principle because of what one man or even a number of men may say about it, and from all that we have been able to learn we can see nothing more in the purpose of the Christian who advocates the cause of a social gospel than an attempt to apply the principles of the teaching of Jesus to the many physical and social ills from which the race is suffering. It is not an attempt to save the world by a social application of the gospel, but an attempt to apply the principles of the gospel by a SAVED people to the ills of a people that NEED saving, and that may help them to a better social existence as well as to a religious experience.

Swords and Plowshares, Spears and Pruning Hooks

No sincere Christian can help longing for the time to come and to come speedily when the ancient prophecy concerning the beating of the instruments of war into instruments of industry and peace shall be fulfilled. Just how or when that time shall be ushered in may not be fully understood. It is undoubtedly true that some men have given more thought to the matter and have given more attention to the teaching of God's Word upon the subject than others have and they have a right to speak with more authority than those who are not thus familiar with the teaching of the Word; but even the best informed must face the fact that Jesus himself taught that of the time or the season when these things should come to pass no man could tell. The signs were foretold, but in a way or at least measurably so these signs have appeared in every century since the days of Christ. It is true that they appear to be more portentous now than ever before, but even this may be only the beginning of the latter day, and we should not forget that in the mind of God a day may be a great many centuries. But because we may not be convinced that the millenium period is not coming upon us suddenly we are not justified in not living as if we thought it were, or because we may be convinced that it is coming soon we are not justified in not trying to do what we can to relieve the suffering and distress of the world until that great day shall come upon us. In either case there are duties that are purely Christian that must be done and there are duties that are not wholly Christian, or rather that belong to what is generally regarded as being apart from Christian duties, though every duty should be a Christian duty and every work a Christian work, that should be done.

When the War Is Over

That great responsibilities shall rest upon the American people after the war is over is admitted on every hand, and one of the greatest of these will be the placing of the great American army back into the ranks of civil life once more in a manner that will be for their own good and for the best interests of society. This problem is occupying the minds of our statesmen and business men and Christian workers even now and it will receive more attention as the days pass. In a magazine that come to ours desk appeared an article recently that shows how the people are thinking abou this great problem over the entire country, and for the benefit of those of our readers who do not have access to this magazine we reproduce this article here and give the credit to the Literary Digest.

When Our Swords Turn Plowshares

When Johnny Comes Marching home victorious and lays aside his rifle and uniform, a place must be found for him in the ranks of civil life, and now is the time to prepare for it, our newspapers are saying. Some of them find a partial solution in the plan of Secretary of the Interior Franklin K. Lane, to settle those who wish to farm on lands prepared by the Government. It is noted that if the war is a long war, five million men must find a path back to ordinary life when it is over, and though a large part may return to the work and even the positions they had left, a very large proportion will be more or less at sea. In Secretary Lane's plan, set forth in a letter to the President and in several speeches, we are reminded that the nation still has millions upon millions of undeveloped acres, desert land that must be irrigated, swamp land that must be drained, cut-over timber land that must be stumped out and made arable. The question of reclaiming arid and swamp land, the Syracuse Journal recalls, has been before Congress in one form or another for many years, but no serious consideration was ever given to it. Events seem to show that Secretary Lane has brought it up at the psychological moment, and it trusts that the note he sounds will not be ignored by the wise men in Congress. In Mr. Lane's letter to the President we read:

"A million or two dollars, if appropriated now, will put this work well under way.

"This plan does not contemplate anything like charity to the soldier. He is not to be given a bounty. He is not to be made to feel that he is a dependent. On the contrary, he is to continue in a sense in the service of the Government. Instead of destroying our enemies, he is to develop our resources.

"The work that is to be done, other than the planning, should be done by the soldier himself. The dam or the irrigation project should be built by him, the canals, the ditches, the breaking of the land, and the building of the houses, should, under proper direction, be his occupation. He should be allowed to make his own home, cared for while he is doing it, and given an interest in the land for which he can pay through a long period of years, perhaps thirty or forty years. This same policy can be carried out as to the other classes of land, so that the soldier on his return would have an opportunity to make a home for himself, to build a home with money which we would advance and which he would repay, and for the repayment we would have an abundant security.

"The farms should not be turned over as the prairies were—unbroken, unfenced, without accommodations for men or animals. There should be prepared homes, all of which can be constructed by the men themselves and paid for by them under a system of simple devising by which modern methods of finance will be applied to their needs."

The New Orleans Item notes the statement of Secretary Lane that the public lands of forty, thirty, and even twenty-five years ago are gone, and considers that the settling of the soldiers on reclaimed land is one after-the-war problem in which the South is vitally interested. The South should be exceedingly active in its solution, for "it affords the South opportunity for settlement and development similar to that enjoyed by the West after the Civil War." For Northern-born men the northern third of Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Michigan would be "vastly preferable to anything the South could offer," according to the Minneapolis Journal, which tells us this section is "destined by nature to be the greatest dairy region in America." The Boston Transcript, too, observes that—

"There is another source of land for such a purpose which probably has not suggested itself to Secretary Lane, but which would, if availed of, supply a larger acreage than either the irrigation or drainage projects. It is the unused or half-used farmlands of the northeastern States. These are now in private ownership, and for the most part their land is out of tillage because it can not be made to pay under current or 'extensive' methods of cultivation, in competition with better land in the West. . . But under Welcome, Twice Welcome, Marylanders!

To organize two societies within practically a year's time is an accomplishment deserving of honorable mention in the columns of any Christian Endeavor page. This is an achievement to be accredited to Brother A. B. Cover of Hagerstown, Maryland, as his report indicates.

But there is more than personal glory (The desire for which hardly entered the mind of the Endeavorer) in an accomplished endeavor of this kind. These two new societies on the Maryland side almost put the Maryland and Virginia conference across on our Four-Year Challenge. If Buena Vista, Virginia has completed the contemplated organization, of which we heard some time ago, that district is "over the top" clear with their three new societies out of the thirty asked for in the general goal. Moreover the inspiring and developing ministry of Christian Endeavor has been secured unto a fine group of Maryland's young people. What this will mean to their spiritual development and through them to the church and community their pastor understands full well as a result of his own experience and observation in other successful fields of labor.

We congratulate Brother Cover, most heartily upon the organization of these promising societies and cordially welcome them into the fellowship of our National Union. Be assured, new Endeavorers of Maryland, that you have joined hear and hand with a society that is not only denomination wide in scope and influence but world wide, for wherever the Christian evangel is proclaimed there you will find Christian Endeavor standing for Christ and the church. Many times its representatives first proclaim that glad message of salvation. And most of the missionaries receive their first impulse for missionary service in the society if they do not go under its auspices. Feel, therefore, that you are a part of a great militant host determined to make the most out of themselves that they may help to take this world for Christ.

Christian Endeavor Notes from Hagerstown, Maryland

About a year since, a union society was organized at Mapleville, Maryland. The people, especially the young people, of the community and those of the church were eager to do some definite work for the Master. After a series of meetings in which a number of young people united with the church. The organization was effected. This society has been working during the last year and its members have made some progress. They are handicapped in that the pastor connot be with them in the prayer meetings, but they are willing and striving to serve and learn to serve. At present the following officers have charge: President, Harry Keodle, Vice President, Ethel Smith; Recording Secretary, Olive Hose; Corresponding Secretary, Janie Kennedy; Treasurer, John Hose. They took a pledge for the Kentucky work last year and hope they will again do likewise this year.

Hagerstown

We have a Christian Endeavor society at Hagerstown. Although very young, the indications point to a coming "live wire." This work will require patient nurturing but we believe the talent is here for a fruitful development. Since our organization, some two months ago, our meetings, considering the summer obstacles, are encouraging. The young people lead our meetings creditably and the attendance has been in the main gratifying. The officers and committee chairmen are taking upon themselves the responsibilities in a manner that shows interest, and we already detect evidence of real leadership among our number. We are planning to take a pledge for the Kentucky work at our coming conference and we shall give an account of ourselves, on "Ashland College" night. The officers are as follows: President, A. Emmert Fahrney; Vice President, Robert Cushen; Recording Secretary, Blanche Whitmore, Corresponding Secretary, Amy Fahrney; Treasurer, Jas. A. Koontz; Organist, Ruth Poffenberger. We have in addition ten committee chairmen which gives us a fine working cabinet.

We rejoice in the progress of C. E. everywhere and are glad that we may be numbered with the immense army marching under the King's banner in all lands.

A Great Loving Heart

Back of every great man there is to be found the reason for his greatness. When the discovery is made it will generally be found that the secret of the individual's success and greatness is due, at least in part, to the great loving heart of some friend. To such friends we owe a great debt which can only be paid in so far as we influence some other life to the realization of higher ideals.

How many workers are there in our Christian Endeavor Societies or how many preachers who occupy the pulpits who cannot trace the line of unbroken friendship with some big loving heart to whom they feel indebted beyond their ability to repay? Abraham Lincoln voices the thought when he said, "All I am and ever hope to be I owe to my angel mother." When John O'Neil buried his face in his mother's arms and said, "Mother, I have been called to preach the gospel," his mother receiving again for a moment the brightness of her youth, replied to the boy by saying, "John, before you were born I dedicated you to the service of God." These are only two out of numberless illustrations that might be used to show the power and influence of a great loving heart. The question we should ask ourselves is: Have I paid the debt I owe to the world? Has each member of the Christian Endeavor Society paid his or her debt? Has every pastor done his best to help his young life find their place in the world and prepare themselves for the task?

Allow me to speak to the preacher for a moment, for after all if he is not interested in his young people he cannot expect them to be interested in him or in other young people, who may need help. I am forced to believe by the small number of Christian Endeavorers who were present at Newark that the preachers in the state of Ohio are not visibly showing the interest in the young life of this great state that should come from a great heart bathed in love. Are the ministers of this state friends to the great host of young people who carry forward the work of Christian Endeavorer Sure they are. But often we fail to point the person who is seeking instruction to the main source of help. Do not misunderstand, I do not say the Christian Endeavor conventions are the main source of help. That source I will speak of later. This I do say, A man who is passing through a struggle as to what his life's work is going to be cannot go to such a convention without receiving help. No boy or girl can attend such a convention and come away without an unconscious change stamped upon their lives. The pastor is older and with a wider experience. He knows the necessity of attending these conventions. That's why the writer firmly believes that a pastor has not completed his Duty until he "sees" the leaders and prospective "Life Work Recruits," feasting upon the blessings of the convention. You can easily understand how hard it would be for the pastor to "see" his young people enjoy such blessings unless he was there himself. If the pastor by his example and influence is the means of some boy or girl getting a vision of their future life's work they will always be remembered "as a great loving heart," who was first to see their need and point them to help. A greater compensation could not come to an unselfish minister.

Let us notice the main source of help when a decision must be made. One might very profitably ask the question: What makes a heart great? or what makes a heart love? A heart is great and loving because it is loved by a greater heart. That love when shed abroad in our hearts causes us to love others. We love because we were first loved. The proof of that love is the service it rendered on our behalf. The death of Christ on that cross that is a test of true, unfailing love. We know God loves us because we can talk to him and he can and does talk to us. When we talk to God we call it prayer. When he talks to us we call it revelation. Prayer then is the main source of our helpfulness, because, prayer is Love at work. Our intercessions are the evidences we offer of our true love and devotion for Christ, our blessed redeemer and Savior. "By this shall all men know that yea are my disciples, if ye have love one for another." Our hearts and lives must be wholly consecrated to God before we can intercede for others.

Watson set the same truth forth in a forceful way when he said, "The essential to all true prayer is our unconditional surrender to the father's will, then the richest gain we reap from prayer will be a closer agreement with the great loving heart who wants to hear us speak:" We must remember that our prayers are not always answered best by what is done for us externally, but the effect it has upon the heart and mind for whom we pray. Let us remember the words of our Master, to pray the father that he may thrust forth laborers unto his vineyard. Fellow Endeavorers, pray the Lord of the harvest to thrust forth from your societies, "Life Work Recruits," in order that the kingdom may come. Just remember that prayer is based on "faith." and "Faith" without "Works" is dead. Some people pray and fail to work, while others work and fail to pray. The two must not be separated. "All things whatsoever ye would ask in faith believing ye shall receive." If you work diligently and pray unceasingly, some day you can say,

"And when in silent awe we wait
And word and sign forbear
The hinges of the Golden Gate
Move soundless to our prayer.

News From the Field

National Conference Notes from the Secretary

It falls to my lot again to prepare the annual list of suggestions concerning our coming National Conference at Winona, so here they are. In case you are not thinking of attending that gathering then pass this by without further notice; otherwise read it—ESPECIALLY THE PREACHERS.

By the time this epistle appears in print part, if not all, of the Credential Blanks for our coming National Conference should be in the possession of either the active pastors or some member of every working congregation. Please note: In some cases the pastor's address was not known, and some working congregations had no pastor to the secretary's knowledge, so in each case the papers were sent to some member of the congregation, whose name was known to the writer. NOW—if you, as pastor did not receive any blanks, first ask at service next Sunday if anyone did receive blanks; if not drop me a card stating the number of members in your congregations and also the number of elders and I will forward them to you by return mail. BUT BE SURE AND GIVE YOUR FULL ADDRESS—and look closely at the secretary's address also that you get it correct. (Canton has about 80,000 people and name and city are scarcely sufficient.)

If any congregation having no pastor is thinking of sending delegates to conference and has received no blanks let some official of the orgaization write me and they too shall have blanks (be sure and tell the number of members in your congregation.) Any minister who thinks of attending and has no blanks likewise write me.

By a ruling of the Conference of 1915 "All accredited officers and members of the co-operating organizations of the General Conference and the President and Secretary of the S. S. C. E., the Y. P. S. C. E. and S. S. shall be delegates upon presentation of properly accredited credentials signed by the Secretary and Moderator of the last preceding General Conference." According to this ruling the following parties will find credentials meeting the above conditions awaiting their arrival at Conference, same to be had by application to the Secretary.—H. F. E. O'Neill, J. L. Kimmel, H. H. Wolford, William Kolb, G. W. Rench, W. D. Furry, W. H. Beachler, W. S. Bell, Martin Shively, O. E. Bowman, Mrs. Mary Wenger, Mrs. G. T. Ronk, Horace Kolb, Miles J. Snyder, Z. T. Livengood, M. D. Kerr, John Lichty, G. C. Carpenter, W. H. Moomaw, Christian Rowland, J. Allen Miller, J. C. Cassel, L. S. Bauman, A. J. McClain, A. L. Delozier, M. A. Witter, J. A. Garber, J. L. Gillin, H. L. Goughnour, Mrs. J. Allen Miller, Mary Maud Billman. If it should so happen that there are some who are members of the Missionary Board of the Brethren church, the Foreign Missionary Board, the Brethren Publishing Company, the Board of Benevolences, the Board of Education, or are officers in either the National organizations of the S. S. C. E., the Y. P. S. C. E. or the Sunday school, and your name does not appear above just come to the secretary at the Conference and your blank will be filled out for you.

And now get those blanks signed up right away and then put them in your suit case or traveling bag or other receptacle which you are sure to take to Conference with you, so you will have them when the Committee of Conference Memberships calls for them. More anon—if necessary.

Washington, D. C. "Over the Top"

Word just came from Brother Miles J. Snyder of Milledgeville, Illinois, that is most encouraging. This is what he says:

Milledgeville, Ills., July 22, 1918.

Dear Brother Carpenter:

I was glad for the announcement in the Evangelist last week of the Mission Board proposition concerning the mortgage on the First Brethren church of Washington, D. C. I availed myself of the first opportunity and presented the matter to our people last Sunday morning, and I hereby pledge you $41.00 from the Milledgeville church on conditions named. I think this is an admirable idea and trust there will be many generous responses so the mortgage may go up in smoke at an early date. Having twice visited the Wahsington church, I look upon this proposition as investing mission money in a dead sure thing.

Fraternally yours,
(Signed) MILES J. SNYDER.

The amount of the debt is $2500 00 and the proposition is to raise it at once and burn the mortgage at the Winona Conference. Only pledges are asked now, no money being expected until the whole amount is pledged. The Washington, D. C. church through her loyal and hardworking pastor, Brother Wm. Lyon, has offered to shoulder $1,000.00 of the amount on condition that the brotherhood will get under the balance of $1,500.00. This is a very liberal offer on the part of the Washington church when their present burdens are considered, although the outlook for the work of the Brethren church in Washington was never better.

The pledges to date stand thus:

First Brethren Church, Washington, D. C.	$ 1,000
First Brethren Church, Milledgeville Illinois	41.
Scott Richael, Polk, Pa.	5.

This is a splendid beginning. Every pastor has received an urgent appeal to present this call to his church, to organizations and individuals, at once, and a blank pledge card for return was enclosed. Let everybody help. Write the undersigned at once and say how much you will shoulder that we may go "Over the Top." Watch the report next week.

Peru, Ind. G. C. CARPENTER.

On to General Conference

Today we hear the oft-repeated phrase "no slackers," or "don't be a slacker." Civilly a slacker is not permitted, religiously he should not be tolerated. The time of apologetical Christianity is yesterday; today honest persistent activity is demanded of God's children, and Brethren, let us get into the van. Of the church greater demands will be made day by day; shall we as a denomination be able to measure up to the demand! Splendid provision has been made to bring us face to face with present day needs at our coming Conference. Men of position and ability have been secured to present to us problems of the hour. Now it remains for the churches and pastors to give these men the audience they merit, and which the church needs. Buy a ticket for Winona Lake, Indiana, and the ticket will be honored on any road, so says the Railroad commission. Plan to meet your friends at Winona at the General Conference of the Brethren church, and give them a rich spiritual feast.

A. B. COVER.

Washington, D. C.

This time your unworthy servant comes with a special message. Will you all bear with me once more? I firmly believe that my message is pleasing to our blessed Lord. If that be true, and you really are interested in his work, you will enjoy what I shall bring to you in his name. I refer to the appeal that our dear brother Carpenter has made to Evangelist readers in regard to settlement of mortgage on our church property. I have used the word "appeal." Mark you, I am not using that word in the sense of "begging" any one, no, we simply present the opportunity and then leave the matter to rest between you and the Lord himself. For years we have been doing this and God has never disappointed us. There was a time when we "begged," we didn't know any better, and both God and man were disappointed.

When this letter is finished I shall "spread it before the Lord," (Isa. 37: 14) and let him take care of the results!

Many of you who read this are going to "count it a privilege" to have part in this work. You have done so before; you have enjoyed sweet fellowship in so doing; you are glad for another privilege. God bless you, one and all, as HE only can! Others are going to have part now. Yes, you will want to have a very personal interest in the church located in your representative city. One denomination is just now about to finish an edifice here costing two million, five hundred thousand dollars, most of which has been made up by voluntary gifts of individuals holding membership in that denomination throughout the United States, and confined principally to the Southern States. You will want to have part in this offering because it represents your own and only church in the Capital of this great nation! Yes, you will want to have part in it, of course, you will, and then it will make you enjoy that visit so much more when you come here and can worship in your own church home. God has wonderfully blessed the work here during the more recent years, but we are anxious to have this church become one of the very strongest in the brotherhood. If you should be inclined to doubt with reference to the substantialness of the work, I can only say, "Come and see." It will be worth while. But I wanted this message to be brief. Why should I say more? Pray for us. God bless you all!

In His Name,
W. M LYON.

Whittier, California

At the first opportunity we offer a report of the evangelistic meeting held in Whittier by N. W. Jennings. The meeting began a little late in the year, the first Sunday in June, the vacation time had already set in, but the evangelist could not reach us any earlier so we made the best of it.

As the pastor was away during the latter part of May, helping to launch the new church at Fillmore it was necessary for the members of the church to do most of the preparatory work for the meeting. We have a membership the most of whom will do their best in any place they are asked to work, so when the pastor came home on Friday and the evangelist arrived on Sunday morning the soil had been turned and the sowing and reaping followed rapidly.

Brother Jennings reached a tender place in the hearts of the people in his first message, when he made it plain that it is the blood of Jesus Christ that cleanseth from all sin. Then soon we discovered that he believes and preaches that the whole Bible is really inspired of God and the people said, "He is a safe man to follow." But it was after the sermon on the "Second Coming of Christ," that they fully opened their hearts and claimed him as a California Brethren.

This meeting was not without difficulties, but why name them? Any successful meeting has the devil to fight and when you are fighting the devil in earnest he always makes trouble. However all of our trouble was on the outside and the members and the evangelist toiled through prayer, personal work and fearless preaching until victory was ours.

Altogether fifty came to the front. Not all of these were new converts. In two instances the teachers and the entire Sunday school classes came. This was not at the solicitation of the evangelist nor of the pastor; the teachers were led to make the move in behalf of the few unsaved in the classes. Again, California is noted for a place where people are living that left their religion in the East and a number of these re-enlisted in the Master's service. Eighteen were baptized during the meeting and we have another baptismal service tomorrow night. Most of those who came into the church are men and women of splendid ability who stand high in the community. We feel that this is the Lord's way of encouraging his own for this church is going through some severe tests under the war conditions which are now on us.

Evangelist Jennings is a fine fellow to work with. He strengthens the pastor as well as the members. His efforts in personal work are untiring and he gives the glory to the Heavenly Father. Mrs. Jennings sang for us several times but a bad throat limited her work along this line.

The church is prospering financially as well as spiritually and the report which is to be presented to our Conference this month shows that this little congregation has contributed over six thousand dollars through free will offering during the last year.

A. V. KIMMELL.

Rio Cuarto, Argentina

Since writing last we have been favored with the visits of several missionaries from other branches of the Lord's work. First came the Bible Coach which is maintained by the Plymouth Brethren and makes tours of unevangelized towns during the winter or dry season. It has been five years since the coach passed this way and we were very glad for another visit. Brother Langran with his wife and daughter and Brother Dorn accompanied the coach. They remained with us five days and helped us a great deal. We had a meeting on Sunday afternoon in the square in front of the church which was attended by several hundred approving listeners. Then these brethren, accompanied by Brethren Bock and Barrios sold Bibles through the central portion of the town, disposing in all of about a hundred books.

The Coach was constructed purposely for this work and is covered with scripture texts which attract the attention of the people. However, Brother Langran says they wish to dispose of it in order to get a Ford truck to which they will construct a top to suit and which will be much better. This kind of work is certainly very fruitful. The Plymouth Brethren are in this manner finding the little groups of believers that are scattered here and there and are giving the gospel to those who are needing it most and at the same time starting churches in many new places. For a genuinely aggressive campaign in this country we should also have a team of workers in the field in this way. From here the coach went to Cabrera where Brother and Sister Atkinson are laboring. A letter from Brother Langran says that there they had one of the best street meetings held anywhere, besides meetings in the hall.

This week we have had a visit from Brother Penzotti, the superintendent of the work of the American Bible Society in South America. He is one of the veterans known and honored everywhere, having spent more than forty years in missionary work in this continent. He was for many years a colporteur and suffered imprisonment for this crime (!) For months he had to sleep out of doors because no one would receive him, but now he finds missions and Christians everywhere who give him a royal welcome. He spoke for us in the church and also in the hall in Pueblo Alberdi and did us a great deal of good. It is an encouragement to all to have visits from other workers and we long for the time when we will have a group of churches large enough to have inspiring conferences such as we have in the homeland.

The twenty-fifth of May is one of the national holidays here and is celebrated every year. This year Brother and Sister Barrios with the social committee of our Christian Endeavor society, prepared a program for the evening of this day, consisting of recitations, dialogs, illustrated songs, etc. The house was crowded full and all seemed to appreciate very much the entire program. We hope next to prepare for Decision Day in the Sunday school in June. We have a number of children old enough to experience conversion. My work in the college goes on again as usual as the minister of education sustained me in my place. This week a group of students came to get evidence of the existence of the soul and combat the materialistic teaching they are getting from others. All the girls of the college also came together one day. There have been deaths also in the families of several professors which have given occasion to present the consolation which we appreciate so much and it was thankfully received by them.

We have not yet heard from the Easter offering, but are sure that it has been better than ever. We note the coincidence that we were in the West India Islands at the same time as Brother Gribble and his party and reached Buenos Aires the same day that they reached South Africa.

We have the usual difficulties in mission work but there are also many things to encourage us and we are confident that by prayer and faithful sowing of the Word the harvest will be abundant.

Sergeantsville—Calvary Charge

The work at Sergeantsville is moving along nicely. The interest and attendance are good at the regular services and the Auxiliaries are doing their part in advancing the work of the Lord at this place.

These are testing times, however, for the Brethren church. For some time there has been a determined effort on the part of other churches to close the Brethren church and drive us out of business. One of the churches by interfering with our services (not openly) and by trying to make the Y. M. C. A. and the Red Cross denominational organizations have thought to discourage us while the other brought in the Secretary of their District Mission Board and made an effort to absorb us and in that way force us out, but both failed and we are still doing business at the old stand. The Secretary has gone and the other people are cooperating with us, for the time being, in Local option work. Thus we feel that the Lord is with us and helping us to stand every test.

Just now things are especially interesting because of the local option campaign that is on in Delaware township. Several months ago the pastors and one representative from each church, in the township, got together and organized for the special work of getting rid of the one hotel in the township. There are 8 churches in the township and their representatives made quite an organization. We thought it unwise to try for a special election so concluded to wait for the general election in the fall. In the meantime we got out our petitions for this election and then interesting things began to happen. First, we found that some of the drys were wet and some of the wets dry. Then we found that some of the members of our churches were lacking in moral courage, while others had the almighty dollar in their eye to such a degree that they did not have the backbone to take a stand for that which is right. Then the wets got just a little excited and made some threat against the writer and the other ministers but they have not scared us and we are going on cleaning house as if nothing had happened. And by a campaign of education we hope to make it so interesting for them that they will throw up their hands and give up to the inevitable.

In the midst of the testings we still find time to preach the old gospel story and plan for larger things for Christ and the church. Among our plans is a great Home Coming Day on Sunday, August 1, when Brother I. D. Bowman will be with us and an effort made to have every member of the church present to enjoy a day of worship and fellowship in the Lord. We expect Brother Bowman to stay with us for a few days and deliver some lectures on the Second Coming of Christ, the Millennium, the End of the Age etc., but we will report these services later.

Now we must say something about the work at Calvary. This church just recently passed through a season of refreshing. On Sunday, May 12 we began a series of evangelistic services for the salvation of souls and the building up the work of the church. The pastor preached every night for a week and then M. A. Witter of Waynesboro came and held forth in his characteristic way for three weeks. Brother Witter preached splendid gospel sermons and his work in the homes of our people was excellent and it was a pleasure indeed for the writer to work with him in this special effort to build up Zion. The immediate results were not as large as we would like to have seen but we feel that we won a great victory for the Lord. Four gave their hearts to the Lord, a mother and her two children and a middle aged gentleman who is a successful farmer and the head of a large family most of whom are in the church. Others were set to thinking and we hope to see some of them brought into the kingdom soon.

The work here has two drawbacks which we have mentioned in former reports that of distance between Sergeantsville and Calvary making it impossible to give good pastoral service, and afternoon meetings which do not make for growth and progress in church work, but still we feel encouraged and will press on in the upward way trying to do all the good we possibly can for the souls of men.

M. L. SANDS.

Long Beach, California

First of all the Brethren Church of Long Beach is after all of the Goals, so we advise all of you to get busy.

Our Pastor L. S. Bauman has been with us since holding the very successful evangelistic campaign at Fillmore, California. A church was organized by him in connection with the Mission Board. You no doubt have read the report of it in a recent issue of the Evangelist. The devil led him a merry chase while there and he is a good runner, but thanks to our God, he is a mightier power and came off victorious as usual.

We have just closed a two weeks' meeting, also held by our pastor assisted by singer P. B. Stout. There were 29 confessions and re-affirmations and one re-consecration. The meetings were well attended. The congregation enjoyed both sermon and song. Brother Stout does like to sing and the people enjoy hearing him. His Telephone song made a great impression upon the children as well as the older people. Have you heard it? If not you should. I am not paid for this advertisement.

We have been working overtime to get basement and gallery of the church completed and ready for the Annual Brethren Bible Conference of which this is the second. It was held here at the Long Beach church last year. The work is about completed which is the last in the completiion of our church which has been delayed by the strenuous times of the past year or more. A free will offering was taken up and in about 15 minutes the entire amount of $2500.00 for the final payment for the completion of the work was raised. The members and friends of the church are by no means a wealthy class of people but they stand ready at all times to give to their limit in support of the Lord's work. Our pastor is also always on the job and stumped nine other members of the church to give $100 each, making $1,000. One of our faithful members who is blessed with more of this world's goods than the rest of us, offered to make his gift $500, if we would meet the pastor's challenge; you can guess the rest; both had to come across and the money was raised.

All are now looking forward to the coming conference here, we expect a 10 day spiritual feast. Brother Stout will be with us for the entire session, to lead the singing and furnish us with solos. Aside from the able pastors of our churches of South California we will have such noted speakers on the program as P. B. Fitzwater of Moody Bible Institute, Chicago; N. W. Jennings, Evangelist; R. F. Darling of Turlock, Calif.; Prof. J. P. Dickey of La Verne College, La Verne, Calif., and E. M. Cobb of Los Angeles. We wish you might all be here to enjoy the conference with us; however you may be privileged to attend the National Conference later. We hope so. We expect to send a full delegation.

Yours in the Blessed Hope,

A. H. KENT.

Norcatur, Kansas, Maple Grove Brethren Church

During the first week of May we located in the Brethren parsonage here. Report was not made sooner because I wanted to be able to report the work at its normal progress. Even now a thoroughly definite report can not be given. But we wish the Brotherhood to know that the Maple Grove Brethren church is alive.

Recent History

For seven years the church has been without a pastor. During those years a few revivals were held by various neighboring pastors. Last fall A. E. Whitted of Portis, who was the last regular pastor here, conducted a meeting which resulted in a revival and several additions to the church. One woman made confession but was unable to be baptized. She came for baptism June 16th and was received into full membership. Through these seven pastorless years several members have withdrawn to become active elsewhere. Others have become indifferent or lukewarm. However a few families have remained faithful, upheld the cross, and looked steadiily to the time when the work should be revived.

Location

Our church is one and one-half miles from the Church of the Brethren. The majority of the people within a radius of ten miles attend one or the other of these two churches. The present problem seems to be to get them into the Sunday schools and to induce them to become regular attendants.

Present History

For the quarter ending June 30th the average attendance in the Sunday school was 43. The largest attendance for any one Sunday was 79; the smallest was 25. We have a live superintendent. Graded work was introduced in the Primary and Junior division this quarter. Sunday evening, June 30th, the young people met and organized a C. E. society. Thus the work is progressing. Monday, June 24th thirty of the faithful observed communion service. The service was the means of quickening the life to do greater things in the Lord's kingdom.

The Maple Grove Brethren church of Kansas asks an interest in the prayers of the Brotherhood.

J. G. DODD.

Camden, Ohio

A few items about the work of the First Brethren church at Camden, will be of special interest to Evangelist readers. The initiative at this place was taken by Elder Sylvester Lowman, less than two years ago and the church organized for about one year wtih a good house of worship owned by the congregation. Camden has a population of about 1,000 inhabitants, with only two other churches in or near the place and neither of them very strong numerically. The outlook for the Brethren is quite encouraging.

Since accepting the charge as acting pastoar the last of April I have been endeavoring to do constructive work in the way of more fully establishing the members in the Brethren program for service. Mother's and Woman's Day was observed in May and Brethren Day in June with appropriate sermons and special music by some of the best singers of the First Brethren church at Dayton, the Misses Bertha Cotterman, Lova Deeter, Grace L. Buck, and Mrs. Sarah Kenney Griffith, with appreciative audiences.

A special preparatory service for communion was held on Thursday evening, June 27th, when A. J. McClain, pastor of the Miami Valley circuit was present and preached the sermon, and Miss Ruth Whitehead of Dayton, sang. The next evening they observed the Lord's Supper and Communion and W. S. Bell, pastor of the First Brethren church, Dayton, was invited to assist in conducting the service. This was their first communion service held and many of the members had never been present at one of our communion services. There were 68 communicants and the occasion was greatly enjoyed by all, and particularly the new members. Brother Bell laid special emphasis upon the observance of the ordinances as we hold and teach them and it was a great spiritual feast. The church has invited Elder Louis S. Bauman of Long Beach, California and secured his promise to hold a revival campaign for them during the holiday season, and are looking forward to a good time with Brother Bauman at that period. The members of the Camden First Brethren are anxious to carry forward their work in an acceptable way to the best of their understanding and ability. Recruiting Campaign Day was held June 30th, and Attorney Orion E. Bowman, Treasurer of the National Home Mission Board ,Dayton, was with us and helped us "Go Over the Top" and some additional, in the funds required to take care of the present financial need, and his service was greatly appreciated. We desire the prayers of the Brethren everywhere that the Lord's will may be done in this new field.

Dayton, Ohio, July 20th, 1918.

WILLIAM C. TEETER,
Acting Pastor.

Answered the Call

The following churches of Ohio have answered the call for the six cents levy for benevolences and the apportionment placed upon them by the Ohio conference to meet the current expense of the Four-Year Program committee. The levy for this is $1.00 for each congregation of 100 members or less and $2.00 for each congregation with a membership of more than 100.

These apportionments should be paid to E. G. Mason, West Salem, Ohio. The list of churches that have paid follows:

Mansfield, for Benevolences $4.00; Four-Year Program $1.00.

Pioneer, for Benevolences $4.00; Four-Year Program, $1.00.

Bear Creek, for Benevolences; Four-Year Program, $2.00.

Salem, for Benevolences, ; Four-Year Program, $1.00.

Miamisburgh, for Benevolences $4.00; Four-Year Program, $1.00.

Fair Haven, for Benevolences, $5.00;Four-Year Program, $1.00.

Total, for Benevolences, $17.00; Four-Year Program, $7.00.

Armstrong County Charge

Having postponed reporting our work for so long a time many items of interest must be omitted just now.

It was a pleasure to have our old veteran and war horse Elder I. D. Bowman with us on the charge four weeks. To say that our work was helped very much by his life and powerful sermons puts it mildly. I was surprised to learn that Brother Bowman, owing to his strenuous evangelistic career, has not lost any of his old time power, but rather increased in power and favor with God and man. We have baptized 27 as a result of this campaign. The larger part of the converts were from Bush Valley meetings. Owing to the smallpox having invaded our ranks we were necessitated to postpone our Kittanning meeting until the hot wave struck us and every city church worker knows what that means by way of affecting a meeting.

Sister Nora Bracken was with us recently, and as a result we have a promising C. E. started at Brush Valley. At this point we have plenty of capable material and golden qualities among our young people here ,and we are laboring hard to make clear to them the manner by which they can adjust themselves and adapt themselves to the new conditions so as to make life and the church a real success, and to show them that if individuals are placed in a new environment to which they cannot adjust themselves they will, no matter how able, prove an absolute failure.

This section is undergoing a revolution in many ways. We are now merging into conditions some of our congregations have passed through years gone by. Not that we are prehistoric, but these conditions have just been thrust upon us, as one of the inevitable characteristics of modern civilization, and our people are meeting the issue with determination to win. I am not worrying about the "Four-Year Program". We may swallow the entire dose, or may come ten years off of first base. One thing is sure that I can count on my fingers the congregations that can easily reach every goal. now, that when they were living in the present tense could not get a nibble in ten years.

Our Sunday school is an ultimate hope. Every department is forging ahead in the great drive.

We entertained the Sunday School Convention of the 10th district this year, at West Kittaning and are proud to tell you we have the largest and as well equipped school in the district, and at that time we were in our second quarter. A few slackers have developed through the extremely hot weather here, but our picnic on July 30 will bring most of them out for one day at least.

Brush Valley held her Sunday school picnic last week, and war bread, and pie and cake and Adam's Ale were relished beyond description. Fifty babies were present, and of course 50 mothers, as there were no twins. Several hundred people were present. Prayer and songs and speeches and select readings composed the program for the day.

A Service flag floats in our church at Brush Valley with 8 stars. Blanco too has had its share of sorrow and joy, as 18 stars remind us that 18 Blanco boys are in the conflict of right against wrong, two from West Kittanning so far, and one from Mosgrove is in the training camp.

We have had 2 Children's Day services this season and the programs were well rendered to large audiences. Neither of the churches could seat the people who were present. About one-half the people at Blanco could not get in the building.

We are having a hard financial pull to make here at "Kitt" just now, as our insurance is to be met and rate is $10.40 per thousand, but our boys and girls are working hard to meet it. In a few years, yes, very few, this church will be out of debt, and we are not doing any begging from home, either. Some churches have been existing so long and tramp like, depending on hand-outs from back doors that it becomes a second nature, (so a tramp informed me, and I guess he was right), so they depend on it.

I think we should have a church extension fund, and loan to congregations, in their first 10 year's experience if necessary, but they should be expected to pay it back or quit business. I have built and remodeled 14 churches in my time and not one of them but what pulled through financially, unless we fail here.

Come and see us, but don't ask for money, at present.

The Krypton Dedication

Upon invitation of Brother Cook and the Chairman of the General Mission Board I had the privilege of visiting our work in Kentucky and dedicating the new church at Krypton. I would like to say a word that will inspire the active and prayerful supporters of all our work in this state.

I had the privilege of dedicating the church and school building at Lost Creek at the beginning of our work. I have noted the struggles that Brother and Sister Drushal passed through during all the years of their inaugural of this work. On my recent trip I visited Riverside, as the place is now known, and was impressed more than ever with the great work being done there. But I wish to say most of all that I noted the greatest change imaginable. Jackson is a progressive and energetic city with fine new business places and a splendid government building. I spent a half day here and talked with many. All knew of the work done at Riverside and spoke of it in the highest terms. One man said to me, and the remark was made upon his learning that I wished to visit Brother Drushal, "Mr. Drushal has done a wonderful work for this part of the state and is known for miles."

Upon leaving Riverside for Krypton Brother Drushal and family joined me. I had a "big wagon" ride that I shall not soon forget. Brother and Sister Bradfield accompanied us to Haddix where we took the train. By the way, thees two young people are in this work with a will and I was greatly pleased to meet them and urge them on to faithful service. Brother Bradfield is a coming preacher for this field. At Haddix Brother and Sister Thomas Allen also joined our party for Krypton. We had a delightful trip and talked all along the way about the work of the Lord committed to us in these wonderful and promising mountain districts. Everywhere we saw the opening coal mines and the promise of work and wealth for many.

At Krypton Brother Cook met us. Almost immediately upon alighting from the train we all spied the new church and we were agreeably surprised at the fine appearance it made. We had a fine day for the dedication and though the audiences were not so large we had good services Brethren Drushal and Allen gave splendid addresses in the afternoon and the people seemed in earnest and appreciative.

I found that the men of business and influence in the town were members of the church. All with whom I talked expressed their great interest in the work and were very glad that such a fine church stood in their midst. I called the place, the church, the parsonage and the grounds,—a beauty spot. Great credit is due Brother and Sister Cook for their untiring faith in this work and the labor of love so freely bestowed upon it by them. With Miss Brubaker's help I am expecting great advances this year. I really look for a fine report from the meeting which Brother A. E. Thomas is now holding for them.

In conclusion I want to call attention to one matter that impressed me so much that I cannot escape it and I must mention it. I hope the Mission Board will seriously consider this suggestion made in the spirit of the deepest interest in this work, an interest which I have held from the beginning. The railroad has opened this whole country from Jackson to within a short distance of the Tennessee line. All along the road great mines are being opened. Men and money are more plentiful. Towns are growing and new ones are springing up. The people are awakening to the knowledge of the great outside world. Everywhere the work of preaching the gospel, organizing the believers into churches and carrying forward Sunday schools is now possible as never before. We have a fine beginning. The work at Lost Creek gives us prestige along this whole line of railway for 100 miles. We have friends among the many students scattered along this line and into the communities lying near the road. Many of these have been baptized. Some are carrying on Sunday schools in the communities to which they have returned. Everywhere openings offer themselves to us.

NOW, WHAT ARE WE GOING TO DO?

The answer to this question must be found in what other denominations are beginning to do. We must place a man into this field who can give his whole time going up and down the line and preaching, teaching and baptizing the people and wherever possible organizing them into Brethren churches.

JAMES S. COOK

This must be done if we are to enter upon our fruitage. Unless we do this we will lose the field to others who are already at work.

Who can do this work best? The answer is without question, a man who knows these people. Fortunately all who know this imperative need agree that we have a man fitted in every way for just this work. This brother is a native of the mountains, tried out in the Brethren Faith from the beginning and willing to undertake this task. A very moderate compensation will suffice to command his time and best endeavor. Drushal, Cook and myself canvassed the whole matter most thoroughly and we are agreed that this is the most essential and immediate step that must be taken if we are to even hold what we have fairly gained. It will mean many Brethren churches in the years to come. Brethren, readers of the Evangelist, pray over this matter. May God bless the work and the workers in the Kentucky mountains.

J. ALLEN MILLER.

Krypton, Kentucky

June the 23rd marks an interesting bit of history, for the Brethren church, and especially those living in and around Krypton, Kentucky. We trust it is a day long to be remembered by the youngsters who occupied a goodly part of the service, together with the older folks, who brought their baskets well filled and enjoyed a common meal together in the basement of the building at the noon hour.

However, this splendid dinner so bountifully and splendidly prepared, was not the most important part of our service, though it was greatly enjoyed by every one.

We had the blessed privilege of having with us at this dedicatory service, our beloved Dr. J. Allen Miller. It was a privilege indeed. A privilege in which everyone expressed their profound gratitude.

The New Brethren Church at Krypton, Kentucky

We held our dedicatory service in the morning, at which, Dr. Miller used for his theme, "Can we do without Jesus " In the afternoon we had a fellowship meeting in which Rev. Thomas Allen, Rev. G. E. Drushal and Dr. Miller each gave short but interesting and inspiring talks. So inspiring were they, that at the close of the service the entire audience stood signifying their desire to stand by the church and more fully do God's will. In the evening Dr. Miller used for his theme, "The biggest thing a man can do," making clear that that thing was, "Doing the will of God." '

We regret, Dr. Miller could not be with us longer than over Sunday, but his work in the school would not permit him to be away longer. However, we feel that the time has been well spent. Our people have expressed themselves as having experienced a joy.

It is not often a church is dedicated free from debt, but that is what happened at Krypton. We called upon our people here to raise the car fare or the expense of Dr. Miller's coming, which amounted to $32.00 and this they gave gladly.

It might be worthy of note to mention something about the interior of the building. Its dimensions are 44x60 feet. The auditorium is plastered and calcimined. On each side of the choir loft there is a small room 8x12 feet, used for class rooms, etc. The wood work is hard pine finished in its natural color. There is an eight foot basement under the entire building. The school room is in the basement and is one large room 42x42 feet. We have a large furnace in one end of the basement, well equipped for heating both the basement and auditorium.

We at Krypton appreciate greatly all the Brotherhood has done toward making this building possible. And we trust you will rejoice with us on having such a beautiful place where we can meet with our God and your God.

J. S. COOK.

P. S.—Those who have contributed toward the completion of the church in the last few months will see that account in my next report. J. S. C.

Campaign Notes

The Martinsburg church and the McKees church form a circuit of which Brother J. I. Hall is pastor. Neither of these are large congregations from the standpoint of numbers; but under the able and careful attention of their pastor I found the work in splendid condition in both churches. Brother Hall does not make as much noise as some of us, but his heart is in his work and he is faithful in getting into the homes of his people. Moreover, he is talking the Four-Year Program to his people and he is leading them up goal by goal. I could only wish that all of our District Goal Directors found the pastors of their respective districts taking the Four-Year Program as seriously as Brother Hall. If such were the case I fancy there would be very little occasion to complain that reports did not come in.

I got to Martinsburg a little ahead of schedule and thus took our people a little by surprise. But the report from these two points will not indicate that this fact worked in any way against the campaign. On the Fourth of July Brother Hall took me with him to the Sunday school picnic of the McKees Sunday school. It was in every way a perfect occasion. The weather, the grove, the fellowship, the dinner (and supper), the singing and all made it a day and an occasion never to be forgotten. The McKees folks can get me back there to a picnic most any time they want me.

As for the canvass for endowment: The Martinsburg church went $850. This is very fine for this place considering that the membership is small. There are some features about this result which are deserving of mention. For example, of this $850, there was in cash and Liberty Loans $578. That is really a record. Then too, it was most gratifying to see how the various auxiliaries enlisted. The Sunday school, the Y. P. S. C. E., the S. S. C. E., and three classes in the Sunday school all took part in the good work. And in each and every instance there was cash on hand to meet the first payment of their notes. A class composed of eight young ladies gave a note for $80.00 less their first payment. If any of our young, single brethren are interested in young ladies' Sunday school classes I most heartily recommend the "Rose Circle" class at Martinsburg. That is what I call a real class. But this by no means represents Martinsburg's final gift to Ashland College. All I will say now is that time will bring forth some fine developments among some of the Martinsburg brethren in the interest of the school. Ashland College has some staunch friends at this place.

At McKees the result will go almost or altogether $1,000. Half of this comes from the members of the church who are in moderate circumstances and who work very hard for their livelihood. The other $500 comes in but a single gift. Brother and Sister George Paul live in Martinsburg but they have their membership in the McKees church. And Sister Paul has enlisted for $500 which is credited to McKees and which brings the McKees result up in such splendid shape. Thus our class of $500 givers keeps gradually growing. But Brother Paul is not a man to be outdone by his wife: So Brother Paul is doing something which ought to make Henry Rhinehart, and John A. Miller and all the rest of us take notice —he is laying on the altar of Ashland College the deed for a forty acre fruit farm in Florida, also a city lot. So you see the Dormitory can raise all of its own oranges and grape fruit right down on our fruit farm in Florida if it chooses to do so. We cannot say what value is represented by this gift, but we have reason to believe it is a very substantial sum. Moreover, Brother Paul whispered to me that he was not sure that he was done yet in his giving to our School. This is one more of the many proofs I am finding that a big future looms ahead for Ashland College. I simply mean that Ashland College will not always be poor—by no means.

I preached to good audiences at both Martinsburg and McKees. One night two automobile loads of the Altoona folks came out to McKees to assist in the good work. Brethren W. C. Benshoff and L. Z. Replogle were in the party and each of these brethren gave us good endowment talks. I am very grateful to each of them; and I am glad to say that everywhere I am finding friends who are willing to render any and every assistance to put this great campaign across. When final victory has been gained there will be a grand host of people entitled to praise and credit for the noble part they have contributed in other ways besides actual money.

It was at McKees that I met for the first time my good friend and Brother Lloyd Walters. Brother Walters has been recently ordained to the ministry and is now doing considerable preaching. This man is big of body but I believe he is still bigger of heart and soul. In his good home I was well cared for while at McKees; and Brother Hall took just as good care of me at Martinsburg. For all of this I shall ever be grateful.

If I may, I should like to add just this: Wherever I go I like to get around and see how folks have to earn what they give to Ashland College. At McKees a number of our men work in the Ganister quarries. If you don't know what that is I will tell you when I have more space and time. But I can tell you it is hard work. Some of the McKee men and many of the Altoona brethren work in the big car shops. Some also work in the iron mills. It is all hard work. And especially when I was in the blacksmith department of the car shops and in the iron mills, where it is almost too hot to live, I said in my own heart—These men surely do not come easy by what they are giving to Ashland. And many of those noble brethren put in my hands Liberty Bonds and they did it cheerfully. God bless each one of them!

There will be a fine delegation to conference from the Cove churches, also Altoona and Conemaugh. Many of these folks have passes and they are going to use them for the church.

Campaign Secretary.

The General Conference

The program for the coming General Conference appeared in the Evangelist recently thus reminding us of our immediate obligations as a church. The date is August 26th, to September 2nd and the place is Winona Lake, Indiana. This event in the progress of the church's work is of sufficient importance to occupy the first page of the Evangelist this week. The following considerations are presented with a view to arousing interest in and deep concern for the work of the church, especially as it relates itself to the Conference.

The Program

Let it be said first of all that the program as outlined is full and certainly very suggestive of good. The value of a program carried out lies not in its makeup so much as in the preparation which the several persons assigned a part thereon make. No man has a right to accept a place unless he is willing to accept also the obligation of the best possible preparation. This will take time and hard work. A man who apepars at the Conference with an apology that he has not made the preparation he ought should be kept off future programs at the least. Every part assigned on the program should be in view of the the special fitness of the individual to discuss that topic. I greatly sympathize with our Executive Committee in its endeavor to build a program. The difficulty lies in the erroneous notion held by our ministry that a place ought to be made on the program for every man. The matter urged here is that every one accepting a place on the program is under obligation to make the fullest and the best possible preparation to fulfill his part. The program for the coming Conference is good. It gives some attention to every phase of our church life and work. It has room for the devotional life of the people who attend. Business is largely done by the several Boards and Committees and the greater part of the sessions are informational and inspirational. This is right. The program as planned if carried out promises great blessings to all. Let the spirit of prayer rather than the spirit of criticism prevail. Look for the good and the beneficial in the addresses and sermons. If you can not accept all that is said be Christian enough to love your brother and believe him as conscientious and sincere in his views as you may be in yours.

What Makes a Good Conference

Sometimes we say after our Conference is over, "We had a good Conference." Sometimes we are not quite so ready to say this. It will be really worth while to ask ourselves what will make a good and worth-while conference. Now unless we can make the Conference at Winona Lake this year of our Lord 1918 the best we have yet had it will be doubtful whether we are justified in holding it. Indeed there was some inclination not to have a Conference this year because of the stress of the times. It was wisely determined to hold our Conference. We must make it worth enough to be held. It must be indispensable to the greatest progress of the church to justify the expenditure of time, labor and money. What are some of the elements that will make it worth while being held?

First.—A Conference is good and profitable just in so far as the Spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ prevails. If the fellowship and the worship of God are real and stimulating we are greatly blessed. Fellowship is one of the Apostolic marks of a genuine Christianity. Christian fellowship breaks down all barriers between individuals and removes all causes of stumbling and fault-finding. It stops all censorious judgments and the blasting effects of petty jealousies. It curbs godless ambitions and makes impossible intrigue. Christian fellowship builds up the spirit of brotherhood and strengthens the ties that bind men together. It makes a man large in his sympathies and forgiving in all his relations with others. It compels sincerity and honesty of purpose and thought and grants the same privilege to all others. "The Communion of Saints" is a fine way to describe this Apostolic mark of all genuine Christians. This will help make a Conference worth while to all who attend. And what shall be said of the true worship of God? In song, in prayer and praise, in testimony and meditation, in the scripture reading and study and in the sermon.—in all these may God be worshiped! And if so then the Conference can not fail to be worth while. Of course God can not be rightly honored in worship when we absent ourselves from the services. And please pardon just a word of loving rebuke to all who may be inclined to stroll, to boat and fish, to spend the time in idle conversation, or in any way to show a disregard for the WORSHIP OF GOD at the appointed times. Be at the services at the appointed times. The program allows for recreation at the proper times.

Second.—A second essential to a good Conference is faithful attendance upon the sessions assigned to the business. Delegates are sent not for pleasure primarily but for the attendance upon the business of the Lord committed to us. Many times when the most important matters are under consideration delegates absent themselves. The work of the Conference ought to be the first in every thing. When an action is agreed upon or a method of procedure adopted for the carrying out of some work all ought to share in it. And then what is far more important all ought to go to the home churches and help execute the work planned. Faithful attendance of all upon the duties dependent upon delegates and members of the church will make a good Conference. One should never accept a position on a board or on a committee without the express understanding that the work attendant upon the appointment will be faithfully undertaken. No honor positions or appointments should ever be made. Life is too short and the work committed to us as a church too insistent to be either lacking in earnestness or lax in the discharge of our obligations. The earnest and conscientious attendance of all who come to Conference to do business for the church first will help make a good Conference.

Third.—Another essential to a good Conference is the full, open and free discussion of all questions. After a discussion practical agreement ought to be easily attained. My observation has been that a Conference action forced against a large minority or without due consideration is worthless to the church as a whole. A long and quite active participation in the affairs of the Conference has taught the writer that it is better to go as fast as the most of the folks are willing to go. If you can not succeed with the work as you think do the best that can be done and WAIT. More than thirty years ago Brethren Gnagey and Moomaw proposed a plan for the working of the church. Hardly decent respect was had for the proposal to even seriously consider it. At the Johnstown Conference in the nineties the writer proposed a plan and he was brushed aside without discussion of his proposal although Conference had previously appointed him to do this very thing. It took us five years to get the report of the Committee of Twenty-five perfected and adopted. But we do now have what we might have had and ought to have had thirty-five years ago. But we had to wait. It goes without controversy that any steps taken for the furtherance of the work of the church must be quite unanimously agreed upon to be of any real value.

What the Coming Conference Ought to Accomplish

Among other things the Conference of 1918 ought to show us most clearly the following:

First.—That the FOUR-YEAR PROGRAM is by far the big-

From the Editor's View-Point

Politics vs. Patriotism

Some men seem to have been steeped in the principles and practices of party and local politics for so many years that even in times of stress like the present they can not rise above their own selfish interests or the local interests of their own personal costituency.

While a United States senator is elected from a certain state, and while a Congressman is elected from a certain district in a state, yet, if either is not able to sink his own or his own immediate constituency's personal needs out of sight for the good of the whole country he is not a big enough man to be either a congressman or a senator.

That we have such men misrepresenting some of our districts and states at Washington all of us know. It is not polite to call names, so we will not mention them, but any one who reads the papers can readily see that the position many of these men take is one which favors their own or the financial interests of some of their most powerful followers, or leaders. Political bosses are not always members of congress. Many times such a one can get his work done more effectively by working through some one else rather than do the "dirty" work himself, and many a congressman and many a senator in past years, and some few at the present time as well, have found themselves tied hand and foot by the interests that secured their seat for them.

They are not always their own masters and from a political standpoint they dare not act otherwise than they do while occupying their place in the congressional halls. The workers in the cause of prohibition for the period of the war or for any other period have found this true and the opposition they have met from some sources makes it plain that the above statement is absolutely true in many instances. A congressman from certain districts in a state or even from any district in some states could hardly be expected to do otherwise than oppose prohibition, because he feels he must represent the element that elected him to his position and with him politics is more important than patriotism.

Now Is the Accepted Time

We feel justified in giving a large portion of this page to the discussion of the question of prohibition at this time, because we think it has been a question of vital importance to America for forty years, it is of the very greatest importance now.

Had any one prophecied five years ago that the American people would ever come to the necessity of observing meatless days, wheatless days, and sugarless days and heatless days and lightless nights they would have been laughed to scorn and would have been told they were fit candidates for a position at Matteawan. This would not have been thought a possible contingency even though war might have been brought to our own shores, but here we are, with the war more than three thousand miles away from our coasts and yet the great liberty-loving American people find themselves unable to buy what they want even though the product may be on the market and they may have the money to pay cash for it.

Against these restrictions we have not a word to say they are all necessary, and the people should co-operate in observing them, but we believe this co-operation could be and would be more willingly secured if a few inconsistencies were removed. Not long since the Brewers Journal stated that Great Britain used 161,000,000 pounds of sugar last year in the manufacture of beer, and yet we are told that beginning August fifteenth we must all limit ourselves to the use of two pounds of sugar per month. Of course we will do it because we are patriotic Americans, but we can not help wishing there were a few patriotic brewers who would be as willing to conserve sugar as the common people are.

Since congress has decided to take no action on the measure which provides for total prohibition during the war, until after their summer vacation it would be well for every state to take special pains to let its senators know that when they get back to their work again in the fall that they will be expected to take immediate action on this most important measure. Now is the accepted time and our senators should be made aware of it.

Keep the Home Fires Burning

The political pot is boiling in many a state just now and we trust that a good fire may be kept under each pot until after the November elections. While a splendid array of states has lined up in favor of the national prohibition amendment a great many more must take favorable action on the amendment before it becomes a part of our federal constitution.

A great many candidates for office would like very much to keep this matter out of politics until after the election, but it is always "bobbing up" somewhere. Many candidates are coming out into the open and declaring their stand upon the question even before the primaries, but a few are edeavoring to evade the issue or to straddle it if possible. But these times are too strenuous to elect any "straddle bug" to any important political position and every candidate should be forced to declare his position or to be ignored entirely. There may be some who will say that since they have no opposition before the primaries it is not necessary to declare their stand until after the primaries are held. But we contend that no Christian can consistently give his vote, even in a primary election, to a man who stands in opposition to this great moral reform, and while we strongly urge all men to attend the primary elections and to help nominate good men to office, yet if there is no choice left and the only candidate up for nomination will not declare himself I would feel justified in not attending the primary election at all. It is not necessary to choose the less of two evils. Sometimes it is better and is the only Christian thing to do to make no choice at all.

But in the meantime the Christian voters of America should be especially active to make it possible to have good men nominated and elected to office that there may be no doubt about the prohibition amendment being ratified by the legislatures of the required number of states.

Bake or Brew

That is the use to which our American grain can be put. Which shall it be? Two ounces is the war limit of bread, but as yet a man can buy all the beer he has money enough to pay for or stomach enough to carry home that is unless he chances to live in the more favored sections of our country where it is not on sale. One of the arguments advanced by those who are opposed to war-time prohibition is that it would destroy the barley industry and that this grain would have to be fed to chickens and to the hogs. Well, so long as we have to pay $4.50 per hundred for chicken feed that would not be a bad price for barley, and as for feeding it to hogs, it might as well be fed to hogs in its natural state as to be used to make "porkers" out of human beings after it has gone through the process of brewing. Just a few days ago we were compelled to spread a newspaper on the seat of an interurban car, where one of these human swill barrels had "slopped over," in order to get a place to sit down. We will admit that a quart of chicken feed scattered over the seat and floor would have been considerably less objectionable.

Then again we are told that should the brewery business of America be discontinued the great hop industry would be destroyed. But we should not forget that within the last year a large section of the hop-growing country of the northwest sought to be released from their contracts for supplying hops to the New York breweries that they might devote their land to the growing of wheat to help win the war, but these patriotic (?) breweries refused to release them from their contracts.

We are thoroughly persuaded that the country would not noticeably suffer from the discontinuance of the use of barley and hops for the manufacture of beer. But if some sections of the country should suffer somewhat because of this their sufferings would be nothing in comparison to the sufferings of other sections of the country where these products are consumed rather than produced. If it comes to choosing between the bakers or the brewers our vote will go to the bakers every time.

Section III: Laboratory Notes

Introductory

In Section I we discussed the available prospects for new missions and in Section II the necessary methodology. In this section we offer a bird's-eye view of these methods in action as proof that they are sound, sane and scientific. While we emphasize the activity of one individual. others had a vital part. The district mission board's part would make interesting reading. In fact the significant thing about the affairs so chronicled is that they are the work of a smali district, numerically, which had the leadership, vision, faith, spirituality—and consequently the Spirit's leadings—to do a great and systematic work which they plan on continuing definitely. To stimulate such a vision and such a leadership and show the practicability of sane methods in every district, we detail the experience of A. V. Kimmell in the Southern California district.

A Warning from Kimmell

"Perhaps my first suggestion is by way of warning. There has never been a doubt in my mind that every field we have entered in Southern California was revealed in answer to prayer; and in this answer the Lord gave us a definite purpose for our going and he led us to accomplish the thing whereunto we had been sent. If any of us are inclined to seek new fields with the mere idea of establishing one of the forty churches we desire to build, we will be taking a long chance toward failure; but if we are "dead sure" that the Lord wants us to plant a church in a particular locality, all the force of circumstances cannot keep it from succeeding. An example: No town in all Southern California seemed less in need of another church than Whittier, a town of churches with about twenty regular services each Sunday. Yet the Spirit said, "Go to Whittier." After offering about all the excuses possible the voice still said, "Whittier."

"I do not believe our biggest success is in the one hundred and sixty members, nor in the work which has been self-suporting from the beginning, but our influence on the religious life of the community. A certain denomination said of us when we came, "Those people are cranks when they talk about the Lord coming again;" their preacher visited from house to house saying we had wheels in our heads. From that same pulpit just three weeks ago the pastor said, "Jesus is coming again and he is coming soon." This is the Christian church. A Baptist member said to me the other day, "We have Bible study in our church now, just like you do in your church." An unbeliever was saying on the street the other day, "I do not go much on those Brethren people; all they know is what God says in the Bible and I do not believe that." Let us urge that in building new churches our object be—to carry the Whole Gospel."

Kimmell on Population Centers

"The next thought is to encourage your position in insisting that the place to work is the populace centers. Not on the side streets or the allies but the best block in town. Tell the people who you are, what you are and what you are going to do—and then spare no money or effort in doing that thing. Below is a copy of a handbill we place in every home in the community a few days before we open a new field. We always put this out just about the time the tent goes up.

Announcement

Dear Friend,—

We desire to announce the opening of a large tent meeting Sunday afternoon at the corner of Bailey Street and Milton Avenue.

This meeting is to be under the direction of the Brethren churches of Southern California, working through their Mission Board. At the close of the meeting we intend to purchase a lot and erect a building.

We are not a new organization. Our church is over two hundred years old. We are what was known as the "Progressives" of the old "Dunkard" church. Our name is Brethren.

Our Creed

For a creed we have the New Testament only, and we adhere to a gospel alone doctrine. Our motto is: less than the Bible is not enough, more than the Bible is entirely too much.

We will bring you no fads, no fancies, no isms, just the plain gospel.

We wish to make you our friends and to help you to know Jesus Christ better, to have the Spirit make our daily life true and strong and joyous, to know the loving God as Father. We need your co-operation to do this. Give us the opportunity of meeting you personally by coming to the meeting.

Sincerely,

A. V. KIMMELL.

First Bible classes were held in the homes the early part of 1909, chiefly because there were several members whose business or means of conveyance made it impossible to attend the church services regularly, especially the prayer meeting. Church three miles away with indirect car service. Classes met every week. Attendance increased, several conversions. These were baptized and became members of the church. Tent meeting was planned for fall of same year. Evangelist and singer secured, pastor directing the business end. Meeting began in November, 1909, When meeting was over some thirty members in all living in that vicinity. Contracted for best lot in the community. Bought a building in good condition out of which a good house of worship was made. Dedicated February 27, 1910 with building indebtedness pledged. Pastor of First church preached here every Sunday afternoon, also taught Sunday school class for six months until regular pastor was secured. Self supporting from the beginning.

Data on the Long Beach Church

Two families, six members, desired Brethren services. An offer of $1,000 if church was started. It was thought this would pay for the lot. Mission Board under the direction of Conference decided to make the effort. Pastor of Los Angeles, First church, made business manager. Secured evangelist and singer. First meeting October 13, 1912. Forty-nine members secured making total of fifty-five. Two lots purchased. Building started immediately. Services held in tent and school house while church was building. Pastors of Southern California churches took turns preaching every other Sunday, while a Bible teacher from outside the denomination preached the alternate Sunday. Regular pastor took charge about May, 1913. Church dedicated July 13, 1913, at a cost of $22,000. Self supporting from the beginning.

Data on the Whittier Church

Twenty-two members living in and about town. Pastor moved to Whittier four months before time to pitch tent. Began prayer and Bible meetings in the homes. Mission Board endorsed the work and elected pastor business manager. Secured pledges for about twelve hundred dollars from the members living in the community and an additional amount up to twenty-five hundred dollars (in all) from Conference before ay public meetings were held.

First meeting May 10, 1914. Forty members at close of meeting. Two lots were purchased in the best location available, but clear title was delayed till December in same year. Services held regularly every week in tent. Building was delayed until May, 1915, but services were kept up in rain and cold throughout the winter, all but two Sundays in the tent. Church dedicated September 12, 1915. Value $18,000. Self supporting from the beginning.

Data on Fillmore Church

The same worker did somewhat similar work in preparation for the recent expansion at this point. The details were recently printed in the Brethren Evangelist.

The Mission Board was responsible for and carried the expense of the preliminary tent meeting in each of the above cases. The large work of this busy pastor consisting of visiting, Bible class study, investigation, inspection, encouragement, organization, and finally business management of available isolated groups, was done in week time amidst the rush of regular duties. The great and impressive thing is the combination of zeal and business sense, all under the direct leading of prayer. May God raise us up more such toilers for our church extension program.

The Religion of Our Fathers

By An Evangelist Reader

This article is not to tell you what the religion of our fathers was. A few weeks ago our Editor said some nice things about children taking up the religion of their parents. This is generally looked upon as a virtue. When I attended the councils of the undivided Dunkard church great respect was paid the "old order." Questions were debated and decided, not on the facts, philosophy or scripture relating thereto, but on whether or not they were in harmony with the "old order." That the "old order," was and is the "religion of the Fathers.' The religion of the Fathers is the religion of the "stand patter." It was not the religion of John or Jesus or Paul. They set aside the religion of the fathers and gave "new" commandments. The "religion of the Fathers' is truly the religion of the Roman Catholics, the Mahometans, the Confucians. Of course those who use the phrase do not want to give it universal application. They want Confucians, Mahometans, Roman Catholics, Mormons, etc. to abandon the religion of their fathers. "The religion of the Fathers" is to be perpetuated only when it is the religion we have espoused.

If the religion of our fathers was good it is almost axiomatic that it was expressed in a way that would have been repudiated by their fathers. The Puritans left Europe to colonize where they might worship God as their consciences dictated. When others later came for the same purpose they were driven out of camp and exiled. An expression of religion different from the Puritans could not under any circumstance be tolerated. One of the greatest hindrances to the spread of truth has been veneration for the precepts of the dead. When expiring dying people occasionally insisted upon pledges from their children or others to do certain things which they had not up to that time been willing to do. They have not been willing that the coming generation shall live their lives as we and our fathers have lived ours. Many bequests are so hedged about with restrictions as to be after a few years practically worthless. How many sons and daughters of legal age have their lives blighted and embittered by their parents refusing them the life they desire to live. These sons and daughters love thair parents and want to honor them but they have temperaments, tastes, ideals and standards different from their parents and find it impossible to pursue and enjoy the same thing as their parents.

This is a living age. What is must give way to other standards. Even our language is changing. The answer of Jesus as to what is the greatest commandment, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul and with all thy mind. This is the first and great commandment. And the second is like unto it, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," is about the only permanent basis for co-operation. This is a statement of an "eternal verity."

In the Y. M. C. A. communion service of the military camps, Romanists, Christian Scientists, Mormons, Seventh Day Adventists are reported as participating together. Our Christian soldier boys that have covenanted with death do not see the distinctions that loom large before inquisitorial committees. Stripped of all earthly pomp, ceremony or aggrandizement they catch a glimpse of the company "over there." They see the "four and twenty elders fall down before him that sat upon the throne and worship him that liveth forever and ever, and cast their crowns before the throne." May God inspire us to do something more than strain at gnats.

Begotten of God. BY SAMUEL KIEHL

Of his own will begat he us with the word of truth. Jas. 1: 18.

God by his spirit through grace working on the conscience and heart of the natural man causes him to see that he (a sinner) is lost, that he can not save himself, that a Savior has been provided in the person of his only begotten son the Lord Jesus Christ, and that "whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have everlasting life." Any one in possession of such knowledge, and who is keeping it a sacred treasure hid deep in his heart, waiting for an opportune time to open the door and let the Savior in, has been begotten of God. It is now up to him (a free moral agent) to accept or reject the Christ as his Savior and Lord. If he accepts he immediately becomes a child of God, a member of the heavenly family (Eph. 3: 15); if he rejects, where God and his Christ are he cannot come.

Every sane person knows it and the scriptures show, that the natural man is begotten of his father (Prov. 3: 22), born of his mother (Job 14: 1), and has the spirit of man in him (1 Cor. 2: 11). The natural birth is an egress. That which is born of the flesh is flesh (Jno. 3: 6).

The spiritual man (Gal. 6: 1) is begotten of God (Jas. 1: 18), born of the spirit (John 3: 3-7), and has the spirit of God dwelling in him (Rom. 8: 9). That which is born of the spirit is spirit (John 32: 6). The spiritual birth is an ingress (1 Cor. 2: 12). Know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost (The spirit of God) which is in you, which ye have of God? (1 Cor. 6: 19).

The natural man without Christ has no hope (Eph. 2: 12). He that believeth not is condemned already (John 3: 18). Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners (1 Tim. 1: 15). He says, I am the way, no man cometh unto the Father but by me (John 14: 6), and him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out (John 6: 37), From these texts it might appear that God, after giving his son to save sinners, needs do nothing more for their salvation. Not so. God's love is infinite. First he gave his son; ever since he has been working to have them receive his son as their Savior and Lord. And this work, on his part, seems to be absolutely necessary, for Jesus says, No man can come to me except the Father which hath sent me draw him (John 6: 44). The drawing of the father is the begetting: Jesus gives his father's begetting plan in these words: It is written, they shall be all taught of God. Every man therefore that hath heard, and hath learned of the father, cometh unto me (John 6: 45.) There is no exception to this rule. The word, " every man therefore," from the lips of Jesus, is conclusive evidence.

The one who has thus heard, and learned of the father, is begotten of God. He will come to his son and confess, Thou art the Christ the son of the living God (Matt. 16: 16). To such begotten souls Jesus says, as he did to Peter, Flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my father which is in heaven (Matt. 16: 17). In due time (immediately or soon thereafter) these begotten ones receive (accept), Christ as their Savior and Lord; and in that act receive the Holy Ghost (John 7: 39) The spirit of God (1 Cor. 2: 12); are fit subjects for baptism according to (Acts 2: 41; 8: 36, 37; 10: 47, 48), shall be saved Matt. 16: 16), have a good conscience toward God 1 Pet. 3: 21), have passed from death unto life (John 5: 24), are born again (John 3: 3-5), and (living separate from the world) are received as sons and daughters by the Lord Almighty (2 Cor. 6: 17, 18). Thus do natural men and women, boys and girls, by the grace of God become spiritual; fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God (Eph. 2: 19).

It is written, He (Jesus) came unto his own, and his own received him not. But as many as received him to them gave he power (the right) to become children of God, even to them that believe on his name (John 12: 11, 12, R. V.), who were begotten . . . of God (John 1: 13, Diaglott). Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ is begotten of God (1 John 5: R. V.). "First things come first."

When the sinner has been begotten (Jas. 1: 18), quickened (Eph. 2: 1), delivered from the power of darkness, and translated into the kingdom of his dear son (Col. 1: 13) by the grace of God, he has a vision. He sees the king in his beauty (Isa. 33: 17), the glory of his kingdom, his righteous government, and the peace and joy of his subjects. Immediately he becomes a subject by receiving Christ (the King) as his Savior and Lord by a living and ever abiding faith. Let everything that hath breath praise the Lord (Psa. 150: 6) for such a God, and such a Savior.

Dear reader, God works after the counsel of his own will (Eph. 1: 11). Of his own will begot he us with the word of truth. Let us joyfully take him at his word, and give HIM all the praise; or if you have not yet received Christ as your Savior and Lord, do so today. Tomorrow may be too late. God, who loves you (John 3: 16), and longs to become your heavenly father (2 Cor. 6: 17, 18) is pleading with you by his word and spirit (Isa. 45: 22) anxiously waiting "to deliver you from the power of darkness (sin), and translate you into the kingdom of his dear son." "Will you come to him now?"

Our heavenly father,, be pleased to take into thy care and keeping the soul of every unsaved "Evangelist" reader, for his good and thy glory. We ask in his name.

The Married Woman on the Second Line of Defense

BY JANE A. DELANO

Director of the Department of Nursing American Red Cross

In this time of war darkness no woman wishes to hide her light under a bushel. If that light is a nurse's training and experience it is particularly needed at this juncture in military and civilian hospitals and in public nursing activities. Awaiting every woman who has completed her hospital training is an opportunity for practical service in helping the nation maintain the health of its second line of defense—the civilian population.

No other service women can render can have a more direct bearing on winning the war. All garduate nurses who can do so, should enroll at once, to be assigned to the Army and Navy Nurse Corps, which must have thousands of nurses to complete these essential units of our fighting forces.

Women who hold a nurse's diploma and who, because of marriage or other reasons are no longer engaged in active nursing, and who can not serve in the military hospitals, should enroll at once as Red Cross home defense nurses. Home defense nursing will afford them, and at once, opportunity to become of direct service to the country.

Those enrolled as home defense nurses, and who can be spared from their other duties, should give freely of their time to the nursing service for which they are best qualified. So important has their skill become to the community and to the public, that such nurses should consider whether any readjustment of conditions would release them for this important service.

For those who can give only a day, or a certain number of hours a week, to nursing, and even for those who can devote but a few minutes at a time to caring for the sick, there still is work to do. In even a few minutes they can give a skilled treatment to a neighbor who can not obtain a nurse. By volunteering for a few hours of service, daily or weekly, in hospitals, clinics, dispensaries or baby-saving stations, they will help the public, release other nurses for the Army and Navy and at the same time economize the time of physicians whose services are in great demand owing to the withdrawals of large numbers for military duty.

Public health nursing also offers the married or retired nurse an opportunity to help a number of sick and, what is of especial importance, to assist in forestalling or checking the spread of contagious disease. Others, who can not agree to give any specified time to their former calling, at least can enroll to be summoned when unusual local disaster makes it necessary to gather, immediately, a number of nurses to relieve pain and save life.

So necessary does the Red Cross regard this home defense nursing service that it issues a special badge to those women who, not being able to go with our soldiers and sailors, patriotically offer to undertake these nursing activities so vital to our civilian health.

THE RED TRIANGLE MEN

To The Workers of the Y. M. C. A.

Their huts are brown on the Western front
And pink in the Eastern dawn.
They stand and serve where the men lie thick
And the blinds of fate are drawn.
Wherever the need of help is found
Their footsteps gather and fall
In shell-raked village and shattered towns,
And God looks down on them all.

Some of the men are college men,
Some hail from the nation's schools;
Each will give what he has to give
In the lands where the war-fiend rules.
And few are young, and fewer fit
To answer the greater call,
But each is doing his biggest bit,
And God looks down on them all.

Under the lee of the fighting line,
In tents that are pitched in haste,
They set the food and the steaming cup
Near the slopes where the red death raced.
There, where the guns in anger roar,
And the whistling bullets fall,
They serve—the Red Triangle men,
And God looks down on them all.

gest and best piece of church work we have ever planned. The fine thing about this program is that it is being carried out. Thanks to the work of the Committee to whom it was committed. This Committee should be able to show the conference the next things to be done. This program alone merits the holding of the Conference next year.

Second.—This Conference ought to lay hold of the RESOURCES of the church as no other Conference ever has. Every available and efficient man and woman in the church should be called into service for Christ and the church. A draft? Yes, if you so call it. But better a selective service act! Then there is the wealth of the church. It just must be used. Conscripted? If for the Nation why not for the CAUSE OF CHRIST? The Conference should at the earliest possible session create a large and representative committee to study and report this subject of using our resources as a church.

Third.—One thing more this Conference ought to do is to take steps to more fully inform every member of the Brotherhood of the stress of the times, the work of the church and the consequent duties. To do this effectively the following plan is suggested: (a) Address a letter of introduction and information to every minister of the church. (b) Address a letter of instruction and information to every Official Board of the church. Where a congregation has no Official Board address the letter directly to the church as an organization. This letter should reach every deacon, trustee and church official in every local congregation. (c) Address a pastoral letter to every member of every local church through the pastor or the church's officers. This letter should be informational, inspirational and above all direct in its appeal for a whole-hearted response in service to the BRETHREN CHURCH. This matter should be early called to the attention of the Conference and most carfully considered. MILLER.

Winona Citizenship Institute

A rare opportunity for the study of problems of practical patriotism will be afforded at the fourteenth annual Christian Citizenship Institute to be held at Winona Lake, Indiana, August 4 to 15, under the direction of the National Reform Association of Pittsburgh, Pa.

The world war makes a demand on both men and women, not only to devote themselves to giving material aid to America but also to study the moral problems which accompany or are intensified by it. American morale must be maintained during the war and she must lead the world in the moral reconstruction which should follow it.

The Winona Institute this year will therefore be devoted to the discussion of America's moral problems and those of a world reconstruction after the war which shall be based upon righteousness and justice. Present conditions, threatening evils and fudnamental principles for a new and better world will be the gripping themes of able specialists who are also stirring speakers. The program includes some of America's best known orators and moral leaders, men and women of vision and power.

The Honorable Frank J. Cannon, former United States Senator from Utah, fluent, dramatic speaker, who has recently returned from Europe where he investigated German and Mormon polygamy, will give daily addresses on the general theme, "Under Which King."

Samuel Zane Batten, secretary of the social service commission of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, a well-known student of social and industrial conditions will discuss the Christianization of the family, of industry, of the nation and of international relations.

Mrs. Lulu Loveland Shepard, the famous "Silver-tongued orator of the Rockies," one of the most eloquent women of America will reveal Mormon evils. Her addresses will be supplemented by Mrs. Marion Williams, for years one of the wives of a polygamist, who will tell of her life in a Mormon harem.

Other speakers include Dr. James S. Martin, Superintendent of the National Reform Association, Dr. James S. McGraw, its General Field Secretary and Dr. Larimore C. Denise, Assistant Superintendent, widely known as leaders in the battles for better moral conditions here and abroad.

Labor Shortage

The Breweries of the United States employ 65,000 men, but the total engaged in making, handling and selling it is over 300,000.

A much smaller proportion of the money paid for drink goes to labor than in any other industry.

The Nation needs these men for useful industry. If the supply of drink were stopped a large number of idle drunkards would be restored to the ranks of workers; millions of workers also would work more efficiently and steadily, thus increasing the output in all lines and decreasing the cost of living and of necessities.

When Congress declared war, our industries were already running at normal capacity. We added to their burden an immense War Program and took from them 1,500,000 men.

We may thoughtlessly condemn the Food Administration, the Fuel Administration and the Transportation Management, but without more men and more efficiency, we cannot produce and distribute the extra quantities necessary. We must do without some luxuries to permit the sufficient production of necessities.

We believe labor generally is loyal and will more cheerfully give up its beer than will the brewers give up their business.

The building business has been greatly injured, except for war material and food product plants, due to the apparent shortage of labor and high cost of materials, the high cost of materials being due to labor conditions in quarries, mines, lumber fields, planing mills, steel mills ,etc., and at the structures.

The cost of building would be automatically reduced at least fifteen per cent by the immediate stopping of the manufacture and sale of all intoxicating beverages, without reducing the rate of wages or the profit of the contractors and manufacturers of building materials.

This would cause many manufacturers, who now hesitate, to proceed with the enlargement of their plants or the erection of new plants.

YOUR business would likewise be increased.

We must all do business and should do more than usual, to pay taxes and buy Liberty Bonds and to enable our employees to do the same, if we would help our Government to the utmost to win the war, and if we do not win, nothing is worth while.

Ship Building

Victory depends on it. We are behind schedule for lack of men and materials. Enough material is not available because material manufacturers cannot get enough men and consequently shipyards and manufactories are employing men at tasks for which they are not adapted. Hence, the efficiency of the men is poor. We have enough workmen—UNCHAIN THEM.

The Sunday School and a Patriotic Opportunity

BY WILLIAM T. ELLIS

To "keep the home fires burning;" to prevent a slump in national idealism; to maintain patriotism on the highest levels; to save America to essential religion; to help Christians to be big and brave enough for any changes in coventional religious forms that the war may bring to pass; and to preserve the soul of the nation from becoming calloused or embittered or darkened or otherwise hurt by the war—this is the clear present task of the Christian church and all her agencies. "New occasions teach new duties." This grave hour of history seriously summons all leaders in religious thought and activity to great and unusual efforts.

Some uncertain spirits may falter and ask whether the gospel has any word for this unprecedented day. Such know neither the times nor the gospel. The eternal contemporaneousness of the Message of Jesus was never more clearly manifest than now. The war itself has unleashed for all the nations, in newness and practicality, the principles and spirit of the Savior. Our present need is for alert interpreters of the gospel and of our times. The clamant query is not "What?" but "How?" Methods of pressing home to the hearts of all the people—especially of those outside the normal reach of the church—the pertinency and power of the truth should engross us now.

Even more pervasive than the outreach of the pulpit is the influence of the Sunday school. It goes to every village and crossroads of the nation. The Sunday school lesson is possibly the most potent single educational or character-shaping influence in the whole world today. Its message is multiplied ways and times without number: what the teacher reads is carried to classes and homes and into conversation, growing like a snow-ball as it goes. I wonder if even the Sunday school workers have realized the full potency of the lesson? For these scripture portions are all related to life. They are selected for their character-forming qualities. They contain the truth which, if pressed home with regularity and with interest, will keep the nation itself steady.

There are surprising potentialities for patriotic and Christian propaganda in these lessons. Every qualified commentator and teacher will interpret them in the light of the world war and its implications. They offer a rare opportunity for presenting the reality and workability of the teachings of Jesus. As one who has been treating the Uniform International Sunday School Lessons for daily newspaper readers, I can testify that I have found them aglow with messages of fortitude for our fighters, of comfort for their kindred, of illumination for patriotic service, of inspiration for new ministry to the world, and of vindication for the ideals of America and the Allies, as expressed by that stalwart Sunday school man, President Wilson. These lessons bring the eternal word of God to bear on present perplexities which will never be satisfactorily solved in any other manner. When the lessons are linked with life, the throbbing, thrilling, tremendous life of the present crisis, they are as absorbing as dispatches from the battle front. By them, the purposes and principles of the people may be maintained at the lofty levels which the occasion requires.

Patriotism summons editors and writers and teachers to utilize the Sunday school lessons as a vehicle for conveying the highest interpretation of our country's cause. In times of great feeling, like the present, the public is most sensitive of spiritual appeals. Therefore, if the sincerely religious aspect of this war for righteousness is clearly and consistently presented to the people, their spirits will be strengthened and their resolution will be established. Patriotism is unshakable when founded upon faith in God. Surely this is the hour wherein all the tides of national feeling may be purified and directed by religious conviction. Both state and church may greatly be served now, if Christian leaders are alert to the occasion.

The present is an opportune time to press for the publication of a Sunday school lesson in the secular newspapers. Hundreds of dailies run this as a weekly feature. It carries the truth to the eyes of the men and women who never see a church paper and never hear a sermon. Properly treated, the newspaper Sunday school lesson may be the best of preventatives for the religious vagaries which for a time made headway in Great Britain, during the first years of the war. For the only lesson which a wise editor will print, as representative of the desires of his readers, is one that is sincerely evangelical, though entirely undenominational. It should also be popular and journalistic in style, and interesting to the average reader. In our new pursuit of a closer relationship between all of life and religion, Christians who feel their larger responsibilities should seek to secure the publication of a Sunday school lesson, or kindred religious feature, in every daily newspaper. There should be developed also writers with a gift for thus popularizing the great truths of scripture.

What our Lord sought in his beneficiaries should also be found in those Christians with a public mind who seek to promote the general cause of truth—the grace of saying "Thank you." When a daily newspaper publishes a lesson, or any other really helpful religious feature, the church folk should be at pains to express their appreciation. Incidentally, they will thus prove themselves an alert and present-day force. To help in any wise to publish the clear teachings of Christ upon the problems of the present time is to serve the State as well as the gospel. For the principles of patriotism are established in the eternal verities of the Christian religion.

That is the note which should be dominant during these heart-hungry days, in church press, Sunday school publications, and wherever else the truth may be told. Religion and patriotism should be inseparable. A reverent and teachable respect for the truths of religion can keep patriotism from deteriorating into mere blatant nationalism and militarism. So it becomes the task of all who write or speak in the name of the gospel to pour into the day's spirit of patriotism the great impulses and insiprations and inhibitions of the Christian religion. Thus shall we not only help to win the war; but also we shall help the nation to win our own souls.

Sunday School Secretary in Egypt Loaned to Red Cross

Rev. Stephen Trowbridge, of Cairo, Egypt, is the Sunday school secretary for Moslem Lands of the World's Sunday School Association. About six months ago request was made by the Bishop MacInnes Relief Committee that has charge of extensive relief work in Palestine asking for the services of Mr. Trowbridge. Though the Sunday school work in Egypt and the Sudan demanded all the time of Mr. Trowbridge the request and opportunity could not be refused. Since then Mr. Trowbridge has administered more than $50,000 monthly of the money contributed to the Armenian and Syrian Relief Fund. He has made a number of trips to Palestine and had the interesting experience at Easter time of going to the Jordan to meet a large party of refugees, which had finally escaped the Turks. Many in this company had shown Mr. Trowbridge when he was a missionary at Adana, Turkey. This relief work in Palestine has now been taken over by the Red Cross. They just cabled to Mr. Frank L. Brown, General Secretary of the World's Sunday School Association, New York, asking that Mr. Trowbridge be loaned to them for "six months and preferably one year." After consulting with members having the Moslem Sunday school work in charge while the Sunday school work in Egypt will be looked after by the efficient field worker, Sheik Mitry Dewairy who is working jointly for the World's Association and the United Presbyterian church. This was a war emergency call that could not be declined by the World's Sunday School Association.

REVIEW OF

The Thought and Work of the Church

The Evangelist Honor Roll appears again this week and we are most certainly glad to give it prominence in the midst of a hot summer season. This time it is the Tiosa, Indiana church with Brother Oxley, the energetic pastor that wins the honors. This is not one of the very large churches of the state, but the pastor reports that the list of Evangelist subscribers is complete, and it goes to show that it is not necessary to wait until December or January to reach this goal by an individual congregation. It can be done any month in the year when pastor and people get together on the proposition and decide it is the proper thing to do. We welcome the Tiosa church to the Honor List and congratulate them on their achievement. We have reached our goal for the year for new subscribers, but we are still a few churches short of the number set for the Honor Roll before Conference. Are there not a few others that are so nearly ready to achieve this honor that by a little pushing they can yet win a place before Conference meets?

Some might wonder that a pastor who is taking a summer vacation on a berry farm can find to write about in the way of church news that would be of general interest to our readers. To all such we would refer the communication from Brother Bame as it appears on another page among the "News from the Field." It is to be noted that Brother Bame again is to take up his work as pastor at North Manchester, Indiana on October first.

Albert Trent gives us report of the work and of the receipts of the Pennsylvania District Mission Board this week for the past nine months. There remain less than three months for the remainder of the churches of the district to make up their apportionments. Pennsylvania has always conducted her missionary endeavors along sane and systemtic lines and has been unusually successful in collecting the apportionments from the churches. We hope all delinquent churches may find it possible to answer Brother Trent's request with their remittance at this time.

Again we call attention to the announcement made by the secretary of the Ohio District Conference. Brother Mason is endeavoring to faithfully perform the duties the conference has placed upon him and the churches should give a more ready response to his calls upon them to meet the obligations placed upon them by the last conference.

If Washington doesn't get "over the top" in the matter of a cancelled mortgage by Conference time it will not be because an interest has not been aroused among many of the Brethren. If you will read the messages from Orion E. Bowman, C. W. Brumbaugh, J. M. Bowman and G. C. Carpenter in this number of the Evangelist you can readily discover that some of the most zealous workers in the church have been touched; but their real zest must be caught quickly for the time is indeed and delay is dangerous. It will be less than three weeks until General Conference meets, but a great work can be done in three weeks when the "people have a mind to work."

C. E. Beekley's suggestion that because of the congested conditions on the railroads and because of the increased fare, as many churches as possible in Ohio arrange systematically to make the trip through to Winona in automobiles is a worthy one and we recommend it to the consideration of all the Ohio churches. When the churches really want to do a thing they can generally find a way to do it.

It has been a long time since we have had a report of the Eaton and Muncie, Indiana charge, but this week Brother Kimmell gives us a good report. At the Eaton church four members were received in the early summer, and at Muncie four members were added to the church by baptism in July. W. S. Bell of Dayton held a very short meeting here in their tent which is pitched on their newly acquired and paid for lots. They hope to erect a tabernacle on these lots before the summer passes that will enable them to do more effective work in this thriving city.

Brother Carpenter makes another report and an appeal in behalf of the work in Kentucky. Brother Thomas is now engaged in a successful revival meeting at Krypton. The schools at both Krypton and Riverside have opened with a splendid attendance and fine prospects. But the great need at Lost Creek at this time is a matron to take charge of the dormitory. Is there not some good woman or a man and wife who can engage in this kind of missionary work, if they are not able to be missionaries to some foreign land?

The work in Spokane, Washington has developed wonderfully during the two years it has been conducted, but it has now reached the point where "a friend in need is a friend indeed." This is one of the most thriving mission points the Brethren have recently established, but it needs help from the brotherhood to make the work permanent. The church building should be completed before winter sets in, but a great deal of help from the brotherhood will be necessary to make this possible. Read the report from Brother Miller and then decide what you can do about it.

Another splendid report comes from the Waterloo Brethren church. Twenty-eight members have been added to the church since early spring, fifteen of them just previous to the communion service. The attendance at this service was exceptionally good for so large a congregation. We are glad for this report, but Brother Goughnour is mistaken about our protesting against boiled down reports, it is the attempt to make a "sugar bush" of the church and to boil down the sap only once a year that we object to.

A partial report of the annual Brethren Bible conference recently held at Long Beach, California by the Southern California Brethren churches appears this week. Brother Reed has arranged to furnish this report in installments, because he wants to make the report rather full and does not want to occupy too much space in the columns of the Evangelist in any one week. If the remainder of the report proves as interesting as this first installment it will be worth reading by all the readers of the Evangelist. Great work has been done on the Pacific coast, and undoubtedly the emphasis laid upon Bible study is one of the secrets of this success. Too much Bible can not get into the hearts of the people.

The College Endowment Campaign notes by Brother Beachler cover a little more territory than usual this week, but Brother Beachler has found things in Pennsylvania that are worth while reporting to the entire church. Pennsylvania holds a unique place in the history of the Brethren church and we are glad she is measuring up to the traditions of the past. Brother Beachler's canvass up and down Morrison's Cove and the contributions he received were really worth while. Though not as large gifts were received as in some other congregations when all things are considered it was no small matter to secure the amount he did from these small bodies of Brethren.

A rather unique contribution appears on another page from the pen of one of our most gifted readers of the Evangelist on the Faith of our Fathers. Some of our brethren in the ministry have told us it takes them but about thirty minutes to get all they want out of the Evangelist, but recently this brother wrote us that he had just finished reading the Evangelist from page one to sixteen; and he is no isolated members that gets only his county paper and his church paper as the sum total of his reading matter, but he is one of the keenest observers in the Brethren church and a man of wide experience in many lines of endeavor.

Around the Editor's Table

In Honor Prefering One Another

How often we have read the above admonition from the Apostle without giving it the attention it really deserves or without applying it to ourselves! We have been free to apply it to others, but we have left it to others to apply to us. Now, let us examine ourselves for a few moments and without any attempt to pass judgment upon the conduct of others let us see if our own conduct is always consistent with the above admonition.

It is now but a short time until the meeting of our General

Conference, and strong efforts are being made by the executive committee to secure an attendance of delegates and visitors that will make it a notable gathering. The program has been prepared and sent out to the entire brotherhood for inspection that the whole church may know what questions are considered of sufficient importance to be given a place for discussion in the meeting of our general body. There have been some momentous themes assigned to the various speakers who have been placed upon the program; but the question very naturally arises, Shall we give them a hearing that will inspire them to do their best in presenting the matters assigned them to the Conference? It takes more than a good speaker to make a good meeting, it takes also a good audience of sympathetic listeners. Men are not inspired to make great addresses to vast rows of empty seats in an auditorium while at the same time they are able to look through the open windows and see large numbers of fellow pastors and visitors sitting upon the benches in the park or wandering about among the trees.

If a topic is of sufficient importance to be given a place on a conference program it is of sufficient importance to receive a respectful hearing, and the speaker who has given much time to the preparation of his address deserves better consideration from his fellow ministers than he sometimes receives.

When WE have a place upon the program and step out on the platform to give our message we are grieved if we notice that many upon whom we had counted for a sympathetic hearing have become exceedingly conspicuous, but their conspicuousness is that of absence. Now, without any attempt to call the names of others let us ask ourselves the question, Are we observing the Golden Rule in Conference? We hear a great deal about the Golden Rule in business and we are frequently told that such a thing is impractical, but do you know of any better place for ministers and church workers to apply the rule, "as ye would that men should do unto you, even so do ye unto them," than at a conference where many have places upon the program and where the zeal and enthusiasm with which they speak depend so largely upon the reception they receive from the audiences they address.

When we speak we want as many as possible to hear what we say, when others speak why should we not give them the same kind of a hearing we want them to give us. If there is any honor in it, let us be free to give it to the "other fellow" and like bread cast upon the waters it will return ere many days bearing a large increase for ourselves. Yes, in honor let us prefer one another.

Calling a Pastor

One of the very important tasks of a local congregation of any church body is the selection of a spiritual leader or pastor. In a body like that of the Brethren church where the congregational form of church government prevails to an extent that sometimes seems not to the best interests of the entire church especial care needs to be exercised that no serious blunders be made.

We might assume that in a body of churches no larger than that of the Brethren there could be no imposters in its ministry, and we like to think of our brethren in that way, but to say our ministerial body is entirely free from insincerity would be making a claim that scarcely any church we know can make. But it is not the imposter nor the insincere minister that should be guarded against so much as it is that an effort should always be made to prevent the calling of a "square peg to fill a round hole." There is a vast difference in the requirements or needs of different churches, and there is also a vast difference in the qualifications of equally sincere and maybe equally able ministers, so that the important thing is to find the man whose qualifications and whose temperament fit him for the special place that needs to be filled.

The Brethren church is not so large but what most any intelligent pulpit committee can learn about all that is necessary to learn about practically any minister in the church without any special difficulty. But one thing needs to be guarded against, and that is any tendency to think there only two or three men in the entire church who are able to pass upon the qualifications of a pastor. Only recently a vacancy in a Brethren charge was mentioned to the writer, and the question was raised as to who would take up the work, when it was stated that it is pretty certain that no man can get into that charge without the O. K. of Brother Blank, an adjoining pastor. It is well for an adjoining pastor to have a keen interest in the spiritual progress of his neighboring churches, but to have that interest go so far that it may be said "no man can get into that charge without his O. K." is going just a little too far. It might be possible to make application here of the words of Paul: "Who art thou that judgest another man's servant? To his own master he standeth or falleth." It is a weakness on the part of a congregation and it is presumptious on the part of a minister to give occasion for such a suggestion. The greatest of care should be exercised by any church when it calls a pastor to minister to its spiritual needs, but no one man in the Brethren church is big enough to say to any congregation, "Don't you think of calling a man unless I place my O. K. upon him."

Salvation by Blood

One of the efforts made by a class of modern religionists is to make it appear that the blood of Christ has nothing to do with individual salvation. Christianity without Christ is a powerless religion and Christ apart from his death upon the Cross has no saving power according to his own teaching and the teaching of the gospel. While an attempt is being made to take from Christianity anything that may appear to shock the finer sensibilities of the more fastidious of the human family it should not be forgotten that shocking as it may seem to think of the necessity for shedding of the Blood of Christ on Mount Calvary it is no more shocking than sin itself that made necessary this death of the Savior.

Moreover it is a mistake to think or to teach that any other sacrifice than that of Jesus Christ himself can atone for the sins of any man. We know that just now there is a tendency to teach that great personal sacrifice wins or secures salvation. This is wrong teaching and would make of no effect the death of Christ. Great personal sacrifice, even to the extent of giving up one's life may be a Christian duty sometimes, but the sacrifice itself is not what makes one a Christian, and the sacrifice without faith in the saving power of Jesus' blood and without a personal acceptance of the salvation he offers is without atoning power.

War and Sunday School

One of the great problems that is now before the Sunday schools of America is that of keeping the work of the schools up to the standard regardless of the inroads made upon them by the exigencies of war. A really alarming condition in the Sunday schools of America is developing. Even in a church body no larger than the Brethren and among a people whose non-resistant principles have been taught two hundred years this condition is felt.

One of the ways we have of knowing some of these things is the word we get from local congregations and Sunday schools about their supplies, the church paper, etc. Yesterday we received word from a postmaster that the Evangelist could not be delivered to a subscriber at his office. The reason given was brief—"gone to war, no address." The same day we received word from another young man to send his paper to his parents as he was going to camp, and also we received word from the secretary of a Sunday school to send supplies to another party as he must go to camp in a few days, and also on the same day we received word from another Sunday school to change the address of their literature because the one to whom supplies had been sent had gone to the war and there was no one left at that address to bring the supplies to the school. This in one day's mail. The condition is general and in all the churches.

But careful investigation which has revealed a falling off of 200,000 in the gain of the American Sunday schools for 1917 as compared with that of 1916 shows that it is not alone the loss of the young men who may have been in the Sunday school that this falling off must be attributed to, but also to the fact that many of them were leaders and where the leadership has been removed the cause has suffered. It has also been shown that there has been a large falling off in the beginners and primary departments of the schools which is taken as an indication that the parents of the Sunday school are so taken up with other duties of the present that they fail to keep their small children in the Sunday school. These problems must be faced, and it will require more radical treatment than can be given in a short editorial on this page to overcome the difficulties and the problems the Brethren schools must solve. Our Sunday school workers should at least have some carefully worked out plans to offer at the Sunday school sessions of our coming General Conference.

New Signs of Life in China

The Chinese Republic has not yet settled down to a united program of improvement and progress in politics, education and religion. It is a large country with four times the population of the United States and only a small proportion are educated. There are, however, new evidences of spiritual progress in the response to the recent campaign conducted by Dr. Sherwood Eddy. Though China is rent by revolution and internal warfare, some seventy leading Confucian editors, governmental officials, business men and educators met Dr. Eddy at dinner in Canton to discuss the future of China. Among these men was the leader of the southern factions, the former head of China's navy. He attended the first two evangelistic meetings and showed deep interest in the message concerning Christ as the only Savior. Dr. Sun Yat Sen, the first provisional president of the Republic, was also present. Sun Yat Sen invited Dr. Eddy to address one hundred of his officers and officials upon the subject of Christianity, and the Christains who were present started personal work among the non-Christian officials. Several, including a member of Parliament, gave themselves to Christ.

The unique feature of Dr. Eddy's campaign this year is that it centers in the Chinese church. The aim is not so much to hold large meetings as to vitalize and organize the Christians to go out and win their non-Christian friends. On the previous campaign large numbers of enquirers and converts from the non-Christian community were turned over to the churches that were often unprepared to receive them. This year a new standard and system was adopted that promises much more far-reaching and permanent results.

On the last night in Canton the Chinese pastors of the twenty-eight local churches were seated on the platform. As the name of each church was called, the pastor rose, then his workers in the audience, then the new converts who had been won by them or had made the decision for Christ during the week. What an inspiring sight it was to see each pastor lead out his little flock of twenty, thirty, forty or fifty to begin their weekly Bible class and to extend the work of winning the millions of China one by one.

Excellent preliminary work was done by Mr. Buchman, and others, who went in advance to prepare the way. Chinese pastors, workers and Christians have been quickened as a result, and it seems that a new era of personal evangelism has begun in China. Twelve hundred Chinese Christians in Canton held a daily meeting to train in personal work. The century of seed sowing is bearing fruit. The fields were ripe for harvest. Specialists were kept busy night and day in interviews, organizing Bible classes, dealing with enquirers and hearing confessions of sin. This was the program in each of the cities visited. What does it mean for China when four hundred Chinese Christian workers meet to train for personal evangelism and each bring two non-Christian friends?

Dr. Eddy writes in a personal letter: "It is my belief that a new aplication of the method of personal work has been discovered and applied in the preparation for these meetings which will extend throughout the whole of Asia, with incalculable blessings. We are filled with thanksgiving because of what has already been accomplished. Let us not despise the day of small things. Robert Morrison landed in South China a century ago and preached the gospel in danger of his life, beaten by his own servants, publicly insulted, laboring for seventeen years to translate the Scriptures. After seven years, in secret and in danger, he baptized his first convert. The Chinese in those days stretched across the river a chain cable, forbidding access to all foreigners, like the great wall of exclusion which shut out the hated "foreign devil" and his new ideas and religion. Here in the city where Morrison seemd to labor so long and in vain, we have seen gathered what was said to be the most influential audience of non-Christians ever assembled in an evangestic meeting in the city. Here with open mind and earnest purpose they listened to a presentation of the gospel, and here several hundred non-Christian men have publicly taken their stand and entered the Christian life. A new day is dawning, a new Orient is being born, and the call comes to the West for us to enter our great heritage of opportunity for service and the regeneration of the Orient."

A New Y. M. C. A. Drive

Dr. John R. Mott, who returned in May from his visit to the battle fronts in France and Italy, has announced a drive for 4,000 new Y. M. C. A. workers to meet the increasing need in Europe due to the arrival of large American forces there. Eight hundred of these workers must be women and they are all needed before October 18. Plans are also being carefully made for a Y. M. C. A. drive in the fall for $100,000,000 to meet the tremendous needs of the work in Europe and in industrial centers in America.

Soldiers and the Bible

The following "Six-Point Program of Bible Study" is being carried out with marked success in most of the great training camps under the auspices of the Religious Work Bureau of the National War Work Council of the Young Men's Christian Association:

1. An organized Bible class in every company, battery or squadron, with a leader chosen from the ranks.

2. Small groups for the study of the soldiers' personal, moral and spiritual problems.

3. Leaders for Bible classes discovered, enlisted, trained and directed.

4. The development of a camp atmosphere by addresses, personal interviews, and discussions, which will make the daily use of the Bible and the organization of Bible classes a normal part of the training.

5. A Testament or prayer book carried and used by every soldier and sailor.

6. The wise and intelligent use of carefully selected religious literature, suited to the various needs of soldiers and sailors.

The Bureau reports that 400,000 copies of the four specially prepared courses of Bible study in book form have been called for, most of them actually purchased by soldiers. No studies are so attractive to the men of the new army as those which relate to the life and teachings of our Lord.

Gospels in Camps and Hospitals

The American Branch of the Scripture Gift Mission has completed a year of work along the lines made familiar by the Society in England. Over 70,000 copies of Testaments, gospels and Scripture portions have been distributed, 36,000 of these being Testaments containing President Wilson's message on reading the Bible. A distributor in the far West writes:

"I have placed over 3,000 copies of Scripture in the hands of our men; and have their promise to read it daily. Sometimes I am allowed to conduct regimental services, sometimes I have services in the company mess halls, sometimes in the Y. M. C. A. buildings, occasionally a meeting in the guard house, and quite often in the barracks and open air. God has signally blessed this work. I never give a copy of the Testament without telling a man its message of comfort, love and salvation; and getting his promise to read it. The results have been phenomenal. We have spent an average of three days a week at this service for about six months and have had over 700 men accept Christ, a personal Savior from personal sin."

Work of Camp Pastors

Under the auspices of the General War Time Committee of the Churches, more than fifty men spent two days in Chicago in April considering plans for greater efficiency in the work of the churches near cantonments.

Included in the meeting were army chaplains, Young Men's Christian Asosciation secretaries, representatives of various commissions, as well as the camp pastors from camps in the Middle West. Three fields were indicated in which the camp pastor is indispensable: first strengthening the churches in training camp communities so that they may the more effectively serve the enlisted men when off duty; second, following up the War Roll cards signed at the Y. M. C. A. meetings and relating the signers to the churches; third, ministering to the sick in the Army and Navy hospitals, where the work is always too great to be done by one man.

News From the Field

KENTUCKY MISSION NOTES

Special Prayer Request

There are many faithful praying members of the Brethren church who include the mission work among the mountains in their daily prayers. Some have done this for years and it is right. Just now special prayer is asked for the evangelistic effort being made at Krypton, led by Evangelist A. E. Thomas and the loyal pastor, James S. Cook. The hot weather hindered some at the beginning of the meeting, yet the attendance was good and let us all pray that the final results may be even a hundred-fold of blessing. Brother Thomas writes that he found conditions favorable for a splendid meeting. He writes also that he had the pleasure of visiting Lost Creek and was well impressed and found everybody busy.

Schools Largely Attended

At Krypton at last report about 70 were in the school taught by Miss Ruby Brewbaker and Claude Akens. At Lost Creek the enrollment had reached 84 and Brother Drushal predicted that the hundred mark would soon be reached. This is splendid for July and a very hot July at that. At both places the larger attendance is due in part to the fact that the public schools are included and are under the direction of the superintendents of our missions. This year is expected to be one of the best in the history of our mission work in the mountains.

Reports

Workers at Lost Creek and Krypton will do well to write often for the Evangelist. Thousands of Evangelist readers are anxious to read the reports of the work being done. A hint to both preachers and teachers ought to be sufficient. An extended report by Brother Thomas will be eagerly expected. Write often.

A Matron Wanted

At this writing no matron has been secured for the dormitory at Lost Creek. School is in session and the matron is needed now. A man and wife could be used. There are so many things that a handy man could do and thus relieve Brother Drushal of much of the routine work. Those who are in a position to consider this work, which is real missionary service should write at once and detailed information will be given.

G. C. CARPENTER.

Gratis, Ohio

My Dear Brother Pastor:—

Only four weeks remain until the meeting of the General Conference at Winona Lake, Indiana. The time is short and all churches and pastors should be making arrangements to do their part toward making this the best Conference ever held, and the best representation that Ohio has ever made. Our yearly conference success largely depends upon the spiritual inspiration of the gathering of the Brethren from the entire Brotherhood.

Things worth while have happened since the meeting of the last Conference, and unless our plans miscarry, still greater things will happen for the future of God's Kingdom, and the yearly Conference will have much to do with the churches of Ohio. So therefore, let us pastors boost Conference attendance; and since railroad fare is so high, we would urge every church in Ohio send an auto load, or as many autos that you can get to go. Perhaps your church would have some good brother that would donate his auto, the church standing the expense. We must outdo all previous years in spite of the conditions, and we must hold the churches responsible for co-operation. Our slogan should be "An Auto or a Ford from every congregation." Let every pastor appoint a committee on Conference delegates. Let them turn every stone to find the auto and the delegates. We will check up on the churches to determine the Ohio attendance whether they come by auto or rail.

We will plan for an Ohio Booster Get-Together Day after some afternoon session. Have some real hot suggestions for the promotion of Ohio District Conerence and create Ohio loyalty. Perhaps plan a boat ride, or some other way, in order to get together. The success of the Four-Year Program depends upon it.

Yours for the Promotion of the Kingdom.

C. E. BEEKLEY.

Eaton and Muncie, Indiana

No report from this charge has been given for some time, but we have been trying to promote Christ's kingdom and have been blessed.

We have not accomplished what we had aimed to accomplish, but we have the consolation at least that we tried.

Eaton

This church is going along very nicely. There are a great many good people here and a splendid class of young people who are regular in their attendance in Sunday school and church services.

In the month of April we held a short revival here of about ten days but we soon discovered that the weather was altogether too nice for a revival in a farming community and so we discontinued the services. In June we held another meeting of about the same length of time and ended by holding communion services which proved to be a splendid service.

As the result of the first effort two young ladies were added to the church by baptism, and a husband and wife were added by relation as a result of the second effort.

This church also gave Brother Beachler $600.00 for endowment for Ashland College.

In the month of June the young people had a Chautauqua in which they acquitted themselves nobly and which netted them about $25.00 to pay their pledge for endowment.

At this writing the Sunday school is having a contest which we hope will prove a great blessing. Brother William Bowman is the efficient superintendent and is trying to have the school do her best.

Muncie

The work here is steadily going forward—not by leaps and bounds, but making progress never the less.

First of all we wish to say that the two lots we bought since last Conference have been paid in full and we feel that if this was the only thing that this mission accomplished during the year it should be counted very satisfactory. In the spring, May 1st, we put up the tent owned by the State Mission Board and moved out of the old shack we had been in during the coldest winter known for years.

This proved a great help as our congregation immediately began to increase—until our Sunday evening services were especially well attended. July 8 Brother W. S. Bell, of Dayton, Ohio came and we opened a campaign for souls. Brother Bell preached the word fearlessly and with great power and the congregations were good but we had many things against us. In the first place the two deacons of the church were in Dayton making air planes, three of our best workers were sick and could not attend the services.

Second, the war excitement seemed to be uppermost in everybody's mind. The boys leaving for the camps. The soldiers passing through the city. The big battles on the "Western Front" were about all it seemed that people thought about.

Then, again, Brother Bell was with us only over two Sundays which was hardly long enough for a big revival—however, two husbands and their wives were baptized and received into the church. A young man promised to come but has not yet been baptized. Since the meeting closed a young lady said she would unite in the near future. Others are near the Kingdom and will no doubt soon come into the church.

Since last Conference twenty-four have been added to the church and the revival held by Brother Bell has given us a standing in the city such as we never had before. Slowly but surely we are getting recognition in this part of the city. At a business meeting last evening we decided to erect a tabernacle on our lots that will serve the purpose while the war lasts—both winter and summer.

This tabernacle will be erected if it please God before National Conference, which no doubt will be a great help to our work.

J. L. KIMMEL.

S. O. S. From Spokane

Since the last report from here we have had our quarterly business meeting at which the present pastor was called to his third year of service here, with an increase in salary. God has signally blest our ministry here up to this time, and we ask the prayers of you all that it may continue this year to his glory.

At this meeting it was decided also, to make another great effort to raise enough money to complete our building which is so badly needed. The date set was September 22-30, so as not to interfere with any other "Drive" the government is making. This is not a mere inspiration of the Spokane

Brethren to complete their building this year. It is an absolute necessity. If the building is not completed this year, the work is going to suffer materially. The contemplation of another winter with our present accommodations is not enticing either to members or strangers. But through hard work and faith, and much forbearance we have grown in spite of these things. And now we have come to the place where we must either go ahead or go back: we cannot stand still. The Brethren here are ready to shoulder all they can "Tote," and a little more, if they receive a little encouragement from the rest. Their record for the last two years has demonstrated this. It is impossible in these days to borrow the money we need, for this purpose. The congregation is not made up of well-to-do farmers, but of wage-earners that cannot give in large amounts, but steadily. So we MUST HAVE HELP NOW. Spokane needs it! Spokane deserves it! A work that has grown from a handfull to well over a hundred members in two years, is not a work to desert and withdraw support from, in its critical hour of need. That has been the history of too many of our missions, an opportunity lost.

Compare this work with any other work of its age and opportunity and intelligently decide as to what YOU will do to help. Put yourself in our place and see what you would do. Don't say, "Well, I think I will send them something pretty soon." God bless you, we need it NOW. You've been investing in Liberty Bonds. Now invest in some Spokane Bonds: they will pay big interest and principal in heaven where you're liable to need it. There will be a story told next year, what will it be?

Spokane is going to sacrifice and do all she can, will she sacrifice alone? NO! We have absolute confidence in the sincerity and purpose of the brotherhood to respond to a real need. We need $2500.00. Spokane will take care of the rest of the $5000.00 needed. Now let's raise it and be done with it! God helping us we can and will.

Sincerely yours for Christ's sake,
R. PAUL MILLER.

Over the Top for the Brethren Church at Washington, D. C.

Many of our brethren who have visited our National Capital at Washington are pleased with the splendid little church that the Brethren church has there. A noble band under the faithful leadership of our dear Brother Lyon have been struggling along and have now come to a place where they want to be out of debt. Brother Carpenter is receiving subscriptions for this debt. The propositon is this, that if the broherhood will raise $1500.00, the Washington Brethren will raise $1000.00 and this is to be done so at Conference a great jubilee service can be held in which we can burn the $2500.00 mortgage and have the church in the Capital of our Nation free of debt and self supporting. Come along and send your subscription to Brother G. C. Carpenter and help to go "over the top" for Washington.

ORION E. BOWMAN,
Secy-Treas. Missionary Board.

TRAVEL FLASHES

That is the general way a good deal of my travels can be expressed these days. If you were here at the most beautiful place this side of the Rockies and arose early enough in the morning, you would see my much abused "Lizzie" climbing the hill on low, most of the way, a mile north to my farm loaded with "kids"—berry pickers—and then a few minutes before the boat left port, rushing with all speed, dow the same hill with the valuable cargo of "reds" as they call the red raspberries, up here. Or, on some of the vacation afternoons, to some of the many beauty spots, lakes, native forests or some fine orchard away some 30 or 40 miles. Just most anywhere, but always to some place that is interesting.

To Indiana

When an invitation came for me to come to College Corner to dedicate their new country church, it did not take me long to decide. Although this is a most beautiful place, Indiana looks good to one who went there to get his "Better Half" who has proven all that the name implies. Brother D. A. C. Teeter had been quite closely associated with me at North Manchester by reason of residence there the last yaar. He was often a good listener during revivals and a good helper at prayer meetings. He had told me about a new church which had been building for a good length of time. The day was not ideal; rain came early in the morning and continued till after the hour for the morning service. We decided to defer the "collection" till the afternoon service because the neighborhood people were prevented from coming. Later it cleared and the afternoon was all that could be hoped for. The crowd came; the plan was that if we could raise the needed money to have an evangelistic service in the evening. Did we raise it? Well, it was some joy to see that crowd put their names to that list. Money was never raised more easily and we actually had to stop the giving for we ran over the mark more than $700.00 as I remember. Brother Teeter had done his part well. Some were not optimistic about raising the needed amount, but it did not take long to dispel their faithlessness. As a tribute to the loyalty of the people here, Brother Teeter was recalled to the pastorate for anoher term, and together, we predict that they will have a most pleasant year in their new church. It is here that our dear Brother P. M. Fisher had labored for a number of years and he honored the occasion with a visit. Brother Brubaker of the Church of the Brethren was also present and took a fine part in the work of the day.

Fraternal

Talk about fraternal work, brethren. Lately, I have been invited to a communion in the Church of the Brethren. I have been invited to hold a revival for a congregation in the same denomination. Had we not better wake up to see if all the courting is being done on our side? Let it never be so.

The Next Trip—Conference

I am planning right now that my next long traveling shall be a trip to Winona Lake. Can the Conference get along without me? Well, that is not the question! Can I get along without the Conference? Not well, I assure myself, if I am to keep pace with the denomination of which I am a part.

There are the minutes of a Conference and then, there is the spirit and inspiration of a Conference. One I can get off of paper reports, the other alone by attendance. No leader of a congregation can afford to miss the Conference for the sake of saving a few dollars or a small part of a week or month. The Four-Year Program has made a wonderful sweep over the churches and this phase of our Conference will be the most interesting thing of the whole program, I predict. The impetus for another year will be born in our Conference and the pastors that are not sent by their churches can not lead as they ought without being here. I hope the day will soon be here when the churches will not allow their pastors to stay away even if they have to hire them to go at double pay!!! (Pastors, I say that for the hope that they will at least pay your expenses.)

The Last Trip

The next trip will be a short one—back to North Manchester. I have not moved our goods up here. We came for the summer and will be back at the old stand the first of October. Many votes of confidence make me think that my work there is not yet done. After several forms of resignation and re-election my resignation was accepted per se.. But this week I have the unanimous vote of the church there to return and if the Lord so leads, what have I to do but to follow? We hope for a great and good year with them and the same for all the churches, everywhere.

CHARLES A. BAME.

West Salem, Ohio

The Ohio churches have responded rather slowly to our appeal for Benevolences and expenses for the carrying out of the Four-Year Program. As to Benevolences, some of the churches had already sent in their apportionment to Brother H. H. Wolford, Elkhart, Indiana, National Director, but when the organization was extended to the state the collection of this fund was given over to the writer. Below is a list of churches making payments to me. If the name of your church does not appear and did not appear prior to June 9th see to it that you come up to your apportionment of six cents per member in order that this goal may be met.

Pioneer	$ 4.00
Canton	2.00
Mansfield	4.00
Buckeye City	3.00
Miamisburg	4.00
Fostoria	1.92
Fair Haven	5.00
Total	$49.36

The following churches have also responded to the call for funds to defray the expenses of the Four-Year Program Committee. Ohio's plan is to ask each church with a membership under 100 to pay $1.00 over 100, $2.00.

Pioneer	$1.00
Louisville	2.00

Mansfield	1.00
Fremont	2.00
Miamisburg	1.00
Bear Creek	2.00
Fair Haven	1.00
Gretna	1.00
Canton .....0.....	2.0
Buckeye City	1.00
Fostoria	1.00
Gratis	2.00
Total	$19.00

Again, if the name of your church does not appear in this list, see that it does before another week goes by. We must reach our goals, and some one must pay the expenses. Will you do your part?

E. G. MASON,
Ohio Director of Benevolences and Statistics.

Also

Before the Ohio Conference, we sent out old statistical blanks, because the new ones were not yet ready for distribution. We have now received a supply of the new ones and they will be sent out to the Ohio churches within a very short time perhaps before this paper reaches you. Kindly fill out the blanks promptly and return them to me in order that the Ohio report may be compiled, and these blanks sent in to the National Director, Brother H. H. Wolford, in order that he may compile his report for National Conference. This means prompt action on your part. Do not let Ohio down in failing to send in your blanks as early as possible.

E. G. MASON.

Pennsylvania District Missions

The following contributions have been received during the present Conference Year to date:

McKee	$ 35.00
Altoona	60.77
Allentown	22.00
Vandergrift	2.00
Salisbury	23.00
Sugar Grove	10.35
Masontown	50.00
Martinsburg	35.00
Berlin	30.87
Uniontown	25.00
New Enterprise	14.00
Johnstown, First	156.00
C. E. Wissinger	3.00
Total	$466.99

Brethren of Pennsylvania:

We have reached the closing quarter of the current conference year, and find quite a number of churches have not yet responded to our district mission apportionment. We have not pressed the claims of our Board, feeling that the requirements of the Four-Year Program are sufficient to lead every loyal Brethren pastor and congregation to endeavor to meet their obligations to district missions.

No new work has been attempted this year as it seemed impossible to secure workers, and conditions seemingly are unfavorable.

The work in our present missions has been well cared for and at some of them real progress has been made. We are hopeful that all of our churches will yet respond as usual with their contributions for this work before the close of this conference year, so, that we may have a fund by the beginning of the next year to start our mission work in an aggressive manner.

ALBERT TRENT,
Secretary.

"Over the Top" for Washington, D. C.

The following report of pledges toward paying off the debt on the First Brethren church in Washington, D. C., is promising and there ought to be no difficulty in getting this amount pledged before Conference. One giver writes: "If the churches were as busy as the Red Cross there would be something done." Now pastors, get busy and give your church a chance to pledge and then return the card sent you giving full report.

Brother G. W. Brumbaugh, of Dayton, Ohio, has been visiting his son Paul in Washington, D. C., and while there has been attending services at our church. This is what he says: "The work is going along very well and I find a loyal group of workers."

A liberal pledge noted in the report given below was accompanied by this word: "We will pay fifty dollars to the Washington City church that the debt may be cancelled by Conference." Thanks to Brother and Sister Nininger. A multitude of willing givers ought to send us a card stating that they will be responsible for some amount when the whole amount is provided. Do it now, according as the Lord hath blessed you. "Give and it shall be given unto you."

The fund to burn the mortgage of $2,500.00, stands now as follows:

D. C.	$1000 00
Scott Rachael, Polk, Pa.	5 00
First Brethren Church, Milledgeville, Illinois	41 00
L. A. Baker, Swanton, Ohio	5 00
Scott Rachael, Polk, Pa.
First Brethren S. S., Dayton, Ohio	15 00
G. W. Brumbaugh, Dayton, Ohio	10 00

Your Home Missionary Board is your servant, and we are limited as to results attained in the home mission work by your loyalty or disloyalty, by your standing by us or failing to stand by us. No board can accomplish anything by paying interest in large amounts year after year. That is not good business when it can be avoided. And no church can do her best work with a long time mortgage hanging over it. Every member of the Brethren church will have to say amen to these sentiments. Please say with the dollars necessary to burn this $2500.00 mortgage quickly. Churches, Sunday schools, Sisters Societies and other church organizations along with a thousand individuals ought to respond at once and the smoke would rise. Appeals have been sent to all the pastors and surely if they have confidence in their mission board and in the Washington church there will be no lack of a hearty response from every pastor and church. Hurry up. Send pledges to the undersigned.

G. C. CARPENTER.

Waterloo, Iowa

Following Brother Teeter's editorial suggestion that the reports from the Waterloo congregation be more frequent and less concentrated in form, I shall, at least this once, follow his advice. It was rather a unique experience, however, to have an editor protest against an article being boiled down!

Our Communion Service was held Sunday evening, May 26. The attendance was again the best ever, and brought the attendance of resident members at Communion throughout the year well above the 75 per cent mark.. The service was exceedingly blessed and helpful.

One week of special services preceded the communion. They were very well attended and 13 new members were baptized and received into the church. Ten of these were men and boys, an exceptional proportion. With the 15 who were baptized following the decision day in the Sunday school, this makes 28 additions to the congregation this spring through quiet methods. We thank God for leading these persons unto himself.

The summer slump and the war slump combined have caused a somewhat lesened attendance especially at the Sunday school. The officers and teachers are working faithfully, but the combination mentioned above, together with many wet Sundays, many temporary removals during the summer, and the hard work incident to war conditions, constitutes a condition which we have not yet been able to control.

Every reader of the Evangelist should remember that the abnormal conditions of these days tend toward exerting a relaxing effect upon attendance at religious services. Unless one is very determined the combination of relaxing influences will trick him or her into contributing to a most disastrous situation. While the fight for the Christian elements of our civilization is on the Christian church, which has been the most potent earthly agent in producing these elements, dare not be allowed to become weak through non-attendance. It would be an ironical situation, indeed, if while working for the defense of Christian principles we should allow the church—their great disseminator—to become impotent. More earnestness and consecration than ever before must be put into the support of the church's essential activities.

Twenty-four of our splendid young men have gone, or have already been called into the service of the nation. Others are expecting to be called or to enlist. We pray for them most earnestly. Had the war of 1914—essentially a contest between European nations for power and influence—not broadened out before this into a war for democracy and against war, we could not bear to see them go. In view of that which the war has become, however, and heavy as our hearts are in having them absent from us upon such an undertaking, we cannot be other than proud of them and send them forth with our blessing. They are marching up a Calvary for the welfare of mankind. May the angels of God often come to them and comfort and inspire them, and all their comrades.

The Washington, D. C. Church

"Over the Top" and burn the mortgage at National Conference is the thought that should strike deeply into the hearts of all who are interested in the cause of the Lord at that place, for it is an important factor or arm of the Brethren church.

The writer has been in touch with the work there for a number of years, and knowing the great need of more equipment in the way of room, and the steadily growing of the church and Bible school, he feels impressed as a special duty to make an appeal to the general brotherhood to heed this request and act at once.

The Mission Board has been carrying the weight of this debt for a number of years, and now the Washington City Brethren have promised to pay two fifths of the indebtedness, it behooves the rest to do their best, get busy, and liquidate this debt, and burn the mortgage at National Conference as a burnt offering, which will surely prove a joy and a blessing to all, and will be enough to make the angels in heaven rejoice.

It can be done. Shall it be accomplished? If all will put their shoulders to the wheel the load will move, the way will be clear, the church at Washington will be free of debt, and the "Lord will give the increase."

All Together for the Burning of the Washington, D. C. Brethren Church Mortgage

The recent appeal in the Evangelist by Brother Carpenter of our National Mission Board is worthy of notice and material help by every loyal member of the Brethren church. We are all interested in seeing the cause of Christ and the church prosper and grow in our National Capital.

Let us act quickly so that we may go "over the top" with our contributions toward the liquidation of the debt of the First Brethren church in Washington. The work in that city is being well cared for by Brother Lyon and his faithful corps of workers. It should be enlarged if we wish to see the "whole gospel" have a greater place in the capital of our country. I know personally of the work of the church in Washington and a more consecrated, self-sacrificing and liberal group of members can not be found anywhere. By our help we can relieve them and our mission board from this long standing burden and give the church and the board a larger opportunity to launch out in the aggressive work of soul winning and the cause of Brethrenism in our National Capital.

The First Brethren Sunday school of Dayton, will show its interest by pledging $15.00 towards the cause. I shall also contribute $5.00 as my personal pledge. May we all boost and help our mission board and the church to reach the goal by the time of our National Conference at Winona Lake. In his name and for his glory may all be done.

ANNUAL BRETHREN BIBLE CONFERENCE

Held at Long Beach, California, July 19 to 29, 1918

Devoted to Business, Bible Study, Sermons and Lectures.

Friday, the first day of the Conference was spent in business session. Every church in the district reported a healthy growth during the year. The District Mission Board was able to report the beginning of a new work at Fillmore, Ventura county, population 2,500, where a tent meeting of four weeks' duration was held in May. Two lots have been purchased in a fine location near the center of the town, and it has been decided to begin at once the erection of a $9,000 building.

The election of the officers of the conference resulted as follows:

A. V. Kimmell, pastor at Whittier, re-elected moderator; Louis S. Bauman, vice-moderator; John C. Beal, Los Angeles, Secretary; A. P. Reed Assistant Secretary; T. J. Steves, La Verne, Treasurer; H. V. Wall, Long Beach, trustee for Ashland College. Brother Wall was also chosen as a member of the Executive Committee of National Conference to represent this district.

N. C. Nielsen, Long Beach, was re-elected member of the District Mission Board of which he is president.

Mr. and Mrs. A E. Rollier of Long Beach, were elected as delegates from this district conference to the National Conference at Winona Lake, Indiana. Brother and Sister Rollier expect to start for the "heart of Africa" soon after National Conference, where they will join Brother Gribble and his party in the French Congo.

The Constitution and By-Laws for this district were revised and we include in this report two paragraphs which are deemed important to appear in this connection. They are as follows:

ARTICLE III. MEMBERSHIP. Section 1. Any regularly ordained elder of any Brethren church which is a member of the conference district, who shall present properly signed credentials from his congregation, shall be enrolled as a member ex-officio to this conference. When such credentials have been received by this conference said credentials shall be countersigned by the secretary and moderator of this conference, and returned to the elders to whom they belong. Without such credentials, properly signed and sealed, no elder shall be considered in good standing with the conference. A list of all elders in good standing in this conference, together with their proper addresses, shall be forwarded by the secretary at the close of each conference to the office of the Brethren Evangelist for publication in the Brethren Annual.

ARTICLE V. MINISTERIAL EXAMINING BOARD.

Section 1. (a) This conference shall elect annually from its elders in good standing with the conference, a board to be known as "The Ministerial Examining Board," said board to be composed of one elder from each congregation of the conference district.

(b) It shall be the duty of this Ministerial Examining Board to examine all candidates for the office of elder in any church within this district, with the view of determining the fitness or unfitness, according to Scriptural qualifications of such candidates to be ordained to said office, and to make faithful report as to their findings to the church in which said candidate holds membership. All churches associated with this conference are requested to advise with this Ministerial Examining Board before officially setting forth any candidate for ordination to the office of elder.

(c) It shall be the duty of this board, when requested by the official board of any congregation in this district, to sit as an advisory board for the settlement of any troubles existing between churches of this district, or between members of said churches.

(d) It shall be the duty of this board to faithfully fulfill any other obligations that may be placed upon it by this constitution.

(e) It is distinctly understood that the Ministerial Examining Board of this conference shall possess no arbitrary powers, but is intended only to act in advisory capacity to the conference, the churches, and the members of this district.

Friday evening, July 19th.

The address of the evening was given by Brother Sylvester Lowman, "The Carpenter Evangelist" pastor of the new Brethren church at Fillmore, Ventura County, California, his subject being, "The New Field for Christ or The Brethren Church on the Firing Line."

The Brethren of Southern California now know the intense earnestness of Brother Loman in anything he undertakes and his quick perception of an advantage offered to make success doubly sure. His dealing with this topic was in complete harmony with his usual alertness in all matters that interest him. He said, there is a reason for a Brethren church at Fillmore as there is for Brethren churches everywhere, a need of getting back to the old-time Gospel, a church that will point men and women to the Christ that can save them.

The speaker called attention to the prestige given the work by clean thinking and living on a high spiritual plane. His experience is that there are a lot of people hungry for the whole gospel as preached and lived by those who are truly Brethren; and the high stand we take puts us on the firing line where there is always something doing.

There were no day sessions on Saturday. At 7:30 P. M. there was congregational singing led by Prof. B. P. Stout, of South Pasadena, who had been secured to have charge of the music of the entire conference. Brother Stout's solos are a strong feature of the sessions. All of his selections seem to have a distinct message, having evidently been chosen with that as the chief end in view.

The address of the evening was given by

Chairman A. V. Kimmell, pastor at Whittier, who spoke upon "Sanctification."

This scripture doctrine was treated in a thoughtful manner and was summed up as follows: Sanctification is that work of Christ for the believer which sets him apart for God. It is that work in the believer through the spirit and the word which changes him into the image of Christ. It is that which perfects the believer in the likeness of Christ by his appearing in glory.

Sunday morning, 9:30, the Sunday school session under the direction of the regular officers of the Long Beach Brethren church was well attended. They have a systematic method of memorizing scripture verses which are recited under direction of the superintendent during the opening exercises, which is very commendable.

At 11 o'clock Prof. Stout began the preaching hour by leading the people in singing "Nearer My Savior to Thee."

Brother F. J. Reagan read the scripture lesson from Philippians 1: 1-21. Brother Stout then sang as a solo, "Some Sweet Day." Brother Repple of the Long Beach church who has been attending the Bible Institute at Los Angeles for two years, then led in prayer.

Brother L. S. Bauman then received the morning offering in which was an offering of $300 from Sister Foltz of China and another of $9.52 saved up by a member of the Primary Department of the Sunday school, a little Japanese girl 6½ years old, who had just died.

The choir then sang, "Oh, it is Wonderful that He Should Suffer on Calvary for Me." Brother Stout sang "The Old Rugged Cross."

Brother Francis J. Reagan preached a sermon on "A Victorious Christian Life" as found in Philippians. Brother Reagan is himself the best illustration of his subject. He said the four chapters of this book contain four notes of victory.

First, A surrendered life; we are to count all things loss for the excellency of the knowledge of God in Christ Jesus. See chapter 1: 12.

Second, Lowliness of mind. See Ch. 2: 3, which was also the mind of Christ, as noted in verse 5.

Third, One aim, to know Christ. Ch. 3: 8, also 3: 10. Rather this than seeking to DO something for Christ. Remember Mary at the feet of Jesus.

Fourth, Steeped and saturated in prayer. Ch. 4: 6 and 7.

Conclusion:—Note the result in v 13, "I can do all things in him that strengtheneth me." Paul was a victor. You can be a victor.

The morning service was concluded by singing "Calling Today."

On convening at 3 P. M. the cogregation united in singing "Lean on the Savior's Arms," and "Brighten the Corner." A. V. Kimmell led in prayer, Brother Stout rendered the solo "Praise the Lord, O, My Soul." The chairman, A. V. Kimmell made some announcements and urged the people to make the conference a matter of prayer.

The afternoon address was delivered by P. B. Fitzwater of the Moody Bible Institute, Chicago, subject:—"The Times of the Gentiles and this Present World War."

Dr. Fitzwater stated that to a close student of the scriptures who had a true perspective of God's plans the present world war did not come as a surprise.

He referred to Nebuchadnezzar's image with its head of gold and pointed out the parts and the things for which they stood, and referring finally to the stone cut out without hands that should crush the great image. This stone was Christ. It is not possible to go into all the details of this address. He closed by referring at some length to the false philosophy of German teachers—notably of Nietzsche— that "might is right," and that this is a struggle against the old god of the Huns—a battle between Christianity and heathen philosophy. Also that Jesus taught us it is better to give up our lives for truth than to live without ideals.

At 6:15 P. M. there was a wide-awake Y. P. S. C. E. meeting in which there were several very earnest prayers offered, and in which two sisters were lovingly remembered, one in the hospital and one to go there in a day or two for a severe operation. At the same hour there was a woman's prayer circle in one room and a men's prayer circle in another.

The evening preaching service was begun by such songs as, "What Did He Do?" "Trust and Obey," and "Since Jesus Came Into My Heart." Brother Stout then sang that grand old song "Not Silver nor Gold Can Obtain My Redemption;

The blood of the Cross is my only foundation;

I am redeemed, but not with silver;

I am bought, but not with gold."

At 8 o'clock the address of the evening was given by Brother P. B. Fitzwater, the first of a series on the incarnation of the Christ, under the general heading "God With Man."

The special topic of this address was, "The Incarnation Before Time," or "The Eternal Purpose as to the Incarnation."

1. The Incarnation was not an afterthought of God, but was included in the original plan of the world. Christ's relation to the universe is not a contingent one, but is vital and organic. Eph. 12: 10; Col. 1: 16.

2. The Incarnation foretold by the prophet. Is. 7: 14; 9: 6.

CAMPAIGN NOTES

The report this week has to do with the remainder of our churches in Morrison Cove. These churches are four in number and they comprise a circuit which is being served by Brother Edward Byers. Brother and Sister Byers were both graduates of Ashland College and they were also members of the Faculty. At the present time they are engaged in the promotion of their own school which stands at the edge of Martinsburg. A number of years ago a movement was launched to build a nonsectarian school at this place. A splendid brown stone building was reared and put under roof on an elegant elevation just in sight of Martinsburg. But the movement met reverses and the work on the building was abandoned. Consequently for years this building stood unfinished and unused. But Brother Byers having been born and reared in Morrison Cove and having had a wide acquaintance in the Cove felt that there was a real need for a college in this section of Pennsylvania. Accordingly he purchased this unfinished building and he and his faithful and capable wife have set their hands to the plow in an endeavor to give Morrison Cove a college. By their own efforts they are finishing and furnishing their building as the needs demand. And what they have accomplished in the first year both from the standpoint of completing their plant and in the enrollment of students is next to marvelous. Enjoying as they do the undivided confidence and the highest regard of the people in the Cove I have no doubt at all that Brother and Sister Byers will succeed in their undertaking.

Coming back to my report the churches in this circuit are Bunkerhill, Liberty, Yellow Creek, and New Enterprise. None of these congregations are large—at least one, Bunker Hill is very small. The total result of our canvass in this circuit is $1316. There may be enough more added to this to make it $1400. By churches the result stands as follows: Bunker Hill, $108; Liberty Creek, $232; Yellow Creek, $318; and New Enterprise, $638. All in all I am fairly well satisfied with this resut. Perhaps this field should have yielded more. but as much could be said of every field I have canvassed. And I am glad to say the work in each of these congregations was a real pleasure. I preached to good audiences everywhere and I found fine people. I did not praech in the Bunker Hill church, but I did have a very pleasant visit in the home of Brother Frank Himes who is a member of that congregation. At Liberty the home of Brother and Sister Sid Carberry was headquarters. At Yellow Creek I lodged with Brethren Samuel Price and Harrison Zimmerman. And at New Enterprise I was in the home of Brother Samuel Buck. I am grateful to all of these folks and to all others who showed me kindness during my canvass in their midst.

The first night at Liberty we had a Brethren Ministerium in miniature form. The pastor, Brother Byers was with us, also Brethren J. I. Hall and W. C. Benshoff. We had a good time. Benshoff remained here during most of the campaign giving valuable assistance both at "meal time" and also in the canvass proper. Later, in the Enterprise canvass Benshoff and wife and Brother L. Z. Replogle and wife, and Brother Mose Cashman, all from the Altoona church, came out for one night and gave us fine help. Thanks to all of you, and come again.

New Enterprise particularly impressed me for a number of reasons. First, because it is one of the most beautiful of the many beautiful spots in Morrison Cove. Again it being one of the oldest churches in he brotherhood some of the pioneers of the church were born there. This was the birthplace of the late Brother R. Z. Replogle, also his wife, who was a Furry. And even yet the Replogles and Furrys are somewhat "numerous" in these parts. It was here too that J. Leonard Replogle was born who has distinguished himself and the Replogle name by being called by our Government to fill one of the most responsible possible positions in our nation with relation to the world struggle. And the testimony that comes from every quarter is that he is making good. I was very much interested in the beautiful new High school building in New Enterprise, a very substantial part of the cost of which J. Leonard Replogle defrayed as a present to the town and community of his childhood. Needless to say the people of New Enterprise are proud to own Mr. Replogle as a product of their locality.

As for the beauty of Morrison Cove, if it does not equal Shenandoah Valley it is a very close approach to it. And in the years to come I shall entertain most pleasant memories of the beautiful scenery of the Cove and of the still finer folks I learned to to know there. And in her relation to Ashland College I can testify to my own feeling that Morrison Cove stands four square and solid. The next report will come from Masontown.

In Memory of Elder Walter Clark

William and Almira West Clark, came from New York to Michigan in 1844, as pioneers when their eldest son, Walter, was seven years of age. In this family were eight children, three of whom are now living, Riley, of Missouri, and Albert and Mrs. Daniel Boarts, of this locality.

Walter Clark was born in Chautauqua County, New York, the 23rd of September, 1837; passed to higher life the 4th of July, 1918, aged 80 years, 9 months and 11 days.

In 1861 he was married to Miss Maria Gould. They began home making on a farm in Section 5, Penn township, Case County, Michigan and have always resided on this farm a period of over 57 years.

Their home has been a haven for many. His faithful wife survives him. She has shared all his labors loyally. Whatever his task, it was hers also.

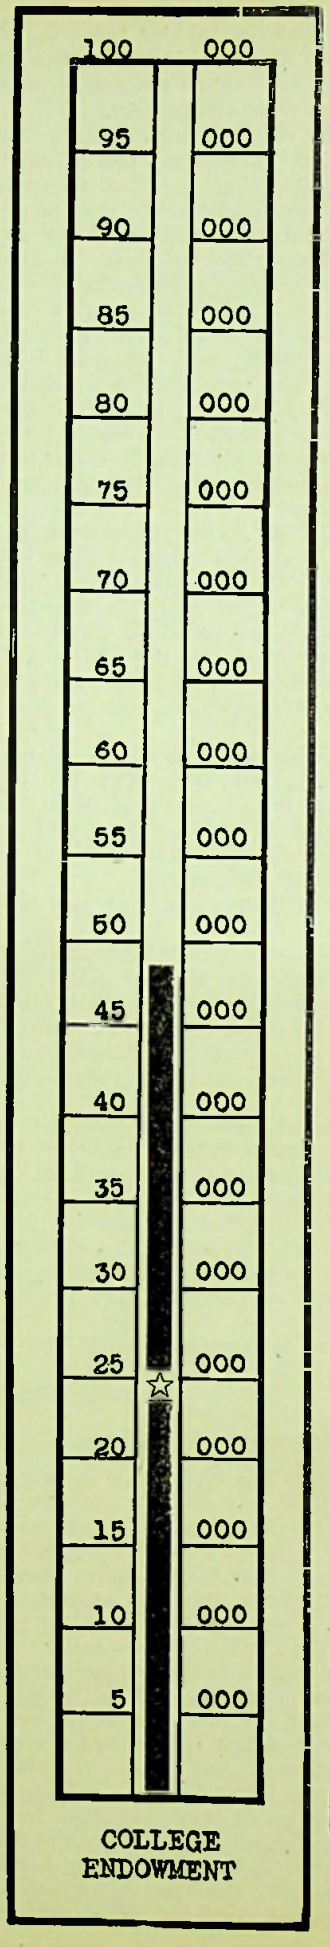
They were the parents of only one child, Almira, first wife of Samuel Rice, whose heavenly birthday for the 29th of December, 1904.

They adopted a daughter, Lottie May, who passed away in 1895.

There is one living grand child, Verna, wife of Mr. Frank Cooper. At their home, Mr. and Mrs. Clark visited the last day of his life.

Mr. and Mrs. Clark united with the Brethren church early in their married life. He was an ordained minister of that church for 48 years. He has given liberally of his time his energies, his thoughts, his means, to the cause of Christ, the prince of peace, indeed he has made many sacrifices. For 30 years he drove 26 miles to a remote church to preach, drove through heat and storm and cold. This is only one of the many sacrifices.

He has always been the Brethren pastor of Bethel church. They will miss him. Bethel Sunday school will miss him. He was always there although in failing health. He had not missed a Sunday this year. He was always there to pray for them—there with his cheerful, cordial greeting, especially for the children.



His class will miss him, his many neighbors and friends will miss him.

Industry has been the dominant factor in his life, and his Christian faith has been the keynote to his character.

We thank the giver of all for this man of strong convictions and the loyalty to follow them.

We thank the giver of all for giving to us Elder Walter Clark.

The funeral services were held Sunday, July 7th at the home church, conducted by Elder J. H. English of New Troy, assisted by T. F. Howell of Dowagiac, Michigan.

The Mind of God in the Commission

Speech is the chief revelation of one mind to another. Again and again was John on the Isle commanded to write, "Hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches." "As the thought, so the speech." And some one has also said, "The Bible, in order to be the Bible, is the record of human language, of God's invariable mind as the standard of human conduct." Unless there is settled conviction that God has spoken his mind, and that we have a correct record of the same in the Book, it will not be long until our interest in things divine shall wane and die. God's mind in the commission is our Lord's last great command and our first imperative duty. It is the definite, abiding, evangelical law of the New Testament. It is intended to bind men. Some governments may regard treaties as "mere scraps of paper," but herein is the one course prescribed by God whose sole right it is to commit the trust here committed, to declare the authority here declared, and to make the promise here made. Anything anywhere that contradicts it is at once to be rejected. There is no room for quibble, no chance for evasion; it is to "Go," "Teach," "Baptize," or to run counter with the divine mind.

"Go ye" is the genius of all missionary endeavor, the heart-throb of every follower of our Lord who makes any pretension of being an obedient subject of our great King. The Christian Life is committed to the supreme business of an enterprise of aggression, invasion, conflict, and final victory of the gospel. To be out and out for Christ is to be thoroughly charged with this restless, evangelistic energy of the gospel. It was this "go ye" that brought Jesus into our needy world, and it is the first thing required of his followers. "Therefore links the genius of all missionary endeavor to that "all power" of Jesus, without which the task would be too great for mortals. If we do not go "therefore," better not go at all. Without the "therefore" of Jesus all Christian work is a pretense, a mockery.

"Teach all nations" presupposes ability on the part of the teacher, and capacity on the part of the taught. Irresponsible people and babies are not within the range of gospel teaching. Teach the nations what? Why, the facts of the gospel—embodied in the death, burial, and resurrection of Jesus. As Paul puts it, "For I delivered unto you first of all that which I also received, how that Christ died for our sins according to the scriptures; and that he was buried, and that he rose again the third day according to the scriptures." Teach the commands of the gospel, "Repent, and be baptized every one of you." Teach the promises of the gospel, and they are embodied in the remainder of the quotation from Acts 2:38, "for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost." Teach them to "Continue thou in the things which thou hast learned and hast been assured of, knowing of whom thou has learned them" (2 Tim. 3: 14). Yes, in things religious, it does make some difference as to "who" said it.

The mind of God is further expressed by the words, "baptzing them." However men may minimize its importance, deny its place in being born again, or teach that it is non-essential, it is in the thought of God. Jesus with the dampness of the tomb upon his sacred garments, and the last enemy under his conquering tread, said "baptize." Baptize WHO is settled. Baptize WHERE is settled. Baptize HOW is settled. Baptize those who are taught. The word of Jesus is "go, teach, baptize." The baptism of unconscious babes can not be included in a command that provides only for the baptism of those who have been taught the gospel. Peter says baptism is "the answer of a good conscience toward God" (1 Pet. 3: 21). There must be some response of the soul to make baptism a Christian act. Jerome says, "They first are taught, then when taught they baptize them." Luther says, "It can not be proven by the sacred Scriptures that infant baptism was instituted by Christ." Bunsen says, "It was utterly unknown in the early church." Turcellus says, "It was introduced without the command of Christ." Meyer, a Lutheran says, "There is no trace of infant baptism in the New Testament." Henry Ward Beecher said that he had no authority from the Bible for infant baptism. He said he had better authority than the Bible; he tried it and found it was a good thing. Protestants quote the same historic authority for infant baptism that the Catholics quote for the monastic life and celibacy of the clergy. What of all these admissions? God as he expresses himself in his word, can settle this. Rome can not. The usurping creed can not. Put away the catechism, it never was, nor never will be authority on this question. Cast traditions to the winds, banish the decrees of men, and rest on the sure foundation of God.

Then baptize WHERE is settled. In New Testament times, and days they went where there was water (Mark 1: 5); they went where there as much water (John 3: 23); they went down into the water (Acts 8: 38); they were buried in water (Rom. 6: 4); they came up out of the water (Acts 8: 39) and thus were resurrected (Rom. 6: 4). The command does not fix the place, but it does fix the how, which in turn fixes the place. Of the hundreds of passages in classical Greek where the word baptize occurs, not a scholar has ever given its meaning as "sprinkle," or "pour." God does not abandon us at sea as to how and where to baptize. We not only have the meaning of the word as used in his day, but we have the practice of the apostles. As immersion is God's mind in the act of baptism, there is now, as there always has been and always will be, a place for the administration of the rite. Stanley says, "In the early age the scene of the transaction was either some deep wayside spring or well, as for the Ethiopian; or some rushing river, the Jordan;; or some vast reservoir as at Jericho or Jerusalem." Justin Martyr says, "The person becoming a Christian was led to a place where was sufficient water to be baptized." Grotius, speaking of the jailer's baptism, says, "It was done within the enclosure of the prison yard." It is said that when Dr. Judson, the grand hero of modern missions, visited an Oriental prison in Calcutta and saw its pool for bathing, in the jailyard, the last difficulty left his mind as to the universal practice of immersion. God's mind as expressed makes clear the how, which will be treated in another article.

From the Editor's View-Point

Thinking Straight

Anybody can shoot a gun, but it takes a sharpshooter to hit a target no larger than a man at a distance of a mile or more with a rifle. In the days of the pioneer in America there were many sharpshooters, who with the old long-barreled, muzzle-loading squirrel rifle, or the larger bored gun intended for deer or bear, could drop their game at the limit of the range of their rifles.

One of the things the soldiers in our modern armies have to learn that our Revolutionary War forefathers didn't have to learn is to shoot, and to shoot straight. It is easy to develop a goodly supply of self-conceit and to think one is a crack shot because one has chanced to hit an occasional bull's eye, but a little actual experience on the "firing line" will soon take out the conceit and show that only the real thing counts here. We have been told that one of the things that goes to make the American soldiers the best soldiers in the world is the wide-spread habit among the American people of shooting, which habit seems to be much more common here than among the common people of the old world.

Now to change the figure. How many of us have thought of it, that thinking is just like shooting? There are a great many people who think, in fact everybody, except an imbecile, thinks, but the question is, How do we think? It is easy to say, I am a thinker, just as it is easy to say, I am a shooter, but what do we accomplish by our thoughts? There is as great difference among thinkers as there is among shooters. Some men seem to be unable to become crack shots no matter how much they shoot, and some men seem to fail to become great thinkers no matter how much they think. Crack shooting is more than pointing the gun at the target and straight thinking is more than fixing the mind upon a certain object. There are certain mental processes that must be followed or observed before right conclusions can be reached. While these processes may come naturally to some people as some people seem to be born sharpshooters, yet as the vast portion of sharpshooters become such through training, so the larger number of straight thinkers become such through mental training. One of the great needs of the present day is more right thinking, more thinking straight. It is not difficult to explain such men as Lenine, Trotzky, Debs and many social agitators and leaders of such organizations as the I. W. W.'s. They have thought and thought until they have become obsessed with their thoughts, but they have not THOUGHT STRAIGHT. They are suffering from mental myopia, astigmatism or some form of squint that prevents a clear mental perception of the right and wrong of certain principles. They think they have thought the thing through, but usually they have started with a conclusion and all their thinking has been circular and has led them back to their starting point.

This principle holds true in an equal extent with many as to their religious thoughts. They have thought and thought and thought, but because they have not thought straight they have become extreme faddists or "ismists." In matters of religion as in anything else, straight thinking is needed.

A Problem in Percentage

While some forms of percentage may have bothered a few of us in our childhood days as we wrestled with the problems in the old "Ray's Third Part Arithmetic, yet we well remember we were always relieved when the percentage was ten. It was easy to grasp that idea. Whether the cipher in the ten represented the common condition of our mind or not it was like meeting a personal friend to come upon a problem in percentage that was represented by a ten.

But whether we think of it in mathematical terms or not, life, after all, is largely made up of percentages. A great many people scan the sporting page of the daily every morning to see the percentages of the various ball teams in the National and American Leagues. The percentage column measures the progress of the season's games and determines the standing of each individual team; it tells of success or failure and as one's favorite team goes up or down in the percentage column so the feelings of the base ball fan go up and down with it.

One may not be aware of the fact, nevertheless it is true, that every man has a percentage column in his life and success or failure is measured by that column; and one of the unusual things about it is that so many things in life contribute to the percentage that is marked up or down for us in that column. It seems impossible to talk or to write or to think in these days without doing it in some way related to the military situation of the world and the most forceful illustrations are drawn from military movements and military sources.

A recent statement from General Pershing gives a forceful illustration of this thought of percentages in life. General Pershing said, "Give me 900 men and a Y. M. C. A. and I will have a more effective fighting force than 1000 men without it." While the army Y. M. C. A. hut does not stand for religion simply as religion, the principles upon which it has been builded are Christian principles and according to this statement from General Pershing, these principles carried out add ten per cent to the effectiveness of his army.

A Difference of Opinion

It is not always easy for one to grant to another a full measure of intelligence or credit him with perfect sincerity when he holds to opinions that are radically different from those held by one's self. One's attitude or convictions may be so clear and perfectly reasonable, to one's self, that how or why any other belief can be held by another seems impossible to understand; but there is always the possibility, though it is not always recognized, that the other view-point may be entirely right and the one held by one's self entirely wrong.

Positive convictions are desirable as they add strength to one's character and power to one's life, but in direct ratio to one's own positveness he may expect to find the opposite view held with equal positiveness by others. Some few people have recognized this fact and govern their own way of thinking somewhat by it. Recently a man of some note gave expression to this thought when he said, "I am so beautiful to myself that I must look very ugly to others." This is a simple recognition of the principle I have been stating, but it is a principle that is true to life, and life will be more tolerable for others and especially so to ourselves, if we will but admit the truthfulness of the principle and govern ourselves accordingly.

A New Serum Needed

Some years ago it was observed that typhoid fever attacked the members of different families where it seemed no germs of such a disease should be lurking. The source of this infection baffled the skill of the best physicians. These cases which from all appearances should not have developed at all occurred with regular frequency over a period of a number of years and then it was discovered that the disease broke out in different families where a certain house maid had been employed, and it was learned that some years before this maid had suffered from an attack of this fever. A scientific test revealed that though she had been pronounced cured, the fact was that during all these years typhus germs had been present in her system and wherever she went she carried the disease with her. To all outward appearances she was perfectly well, but in the light of science she was a menace to society, and after repeated attempts had been made by the best physians in New York to rid her system of these germs without avail, it was determined that for the safety of society she should be permanently quarantined.

Recently some one said, "William Randolph Hearst is a political typhus carrier." Whether we accept this diagnosis of the case or not we must all admit that as a disturber of political equanimity Mr. Hearst has few equals. He has long seemed an enigma to many, while many others simply deny his sincerity, but if the above diagnosis should be true, then scientists should set about to discover some new political serum that will neutralize the effect of the germs spread by Mr. Hearst.

FOUR-YEAR PROGRAM PAGE

NOW THEN DO IT.—II Samuel 3:18

Conducted by Charles A. Bame

Report of Church Extension Department

Section IV: Summary of Needs

Keynote in Prayer

It is obvious the greatest need of a program for extension of Brethren faith is prayer. Not merely conventional prayer or the flow of petition for a multitude of kindred interests of which this is one. We mean engrossing, passionate, intercessory crying of the heart to God under the impulse of an overwhelming sense of importance in our position, urgency in our message, imperative in our doctrine, responsibility in our evangel, conviction in our calling and crisis in our strategy. We mean the burdened outpouring of hearts on whom God has laid a peculiar task as champions of a peculiar doctrine, perpetuated in a peculiar people who for two hundred years have endured as puritan of Puritans, reformers of the Reformation, holding zealously, tenaciously, stubbornly to that fidelity of practice and that purity of essential theology, unformulated, which we feel lies at the heart of the revelation of Jesus Christ the incarnate Son. The prayer we want is of men with a vision, men with a message, men with a burden, men under the marching order of that last Great Commission, the more reasonable as we are the closer to the heart of that great revelotion. Such prayer will bring us the leading that will insure open doors, correct judgments and certain victory.

An Awakening on Literature

After two hundred years we have no literature worthy of the name, either in hymnology, poetry, exposition, exegesis, history, or doctrinal pamphlets. The utter inadequacy of what little we have of the latter no one knows better than the few men who have tried to fill the need. Moreover, the recent Pastoral Survey revealed the fact that the sense of any such need is generally lacking. Scarcely a half dozen pastors expressed any interest in any literary propaganda and an equal number of men frowned upon the wisdom of any such effort. Now, if one's view of our faith is purely quiescent, as being merely a convenient expression for certain inherited religious peculiarities, family heirlooms, so to speak, this will do very well. But, if Brethrenism means the aggressive world religion of Christ in its purity, it will not do at all.

Let us remember that in the organization of new churches we have been at a standstill for about twenty-five years. The new born scarcely equal the dying, and numerical growth through strenuous evangelism has come within the established churches. In this we are rapidly approaching the limit of our fields. Note this: it is doubtful if we will increase beyond our standard for Goal IV, namely 30,000 members, within the next one hundred years unless we widen our base by church extension. I say this in full possession of my sound mind and also of all the facts. Further, there is no prospect of accelerating our present snail's pace in extension till we come out of our complacency and ultra-conservatism regarding the press. As the church extension department forms the backbone of all future progress in all other lines of activity, so the press must become what it is not now and cannot be under present psychological conditions, the main right arm of all progress.

This awakening should be in three lines: First, the venerable conference committee on Literature must be brought out of its hibernation,—as happened to the Committee on Spiritual State of the Churches last year—and be led to throw off its traditional policy of "safety first", which it has inherited and dare not disown, and come out as an agent of militant strategy for the encouragement of a real literature; second, the Brethren Evangelist, which has fair promise of soon being in every home in the church, is on trial before thousands of new Brethren—new to the church—and must be shifted from its points of view of a family affair to the initiated, to that of the enlightening sheet for the uninitiated; third, we must go in for a pamphlet doctrinal propaganda on a vast scale, written, not as an apologetic for the leaders of other churches, but for the hungry multitudes whom it is our task to win.

So important do we consider this general recommendation, that for us it has assumed, during this year's study, the place of chief, immediate, crying need. What we have said regarding the Literature Committee is meant as no reflection on its personnel: that is traditionally impeccable with the thought in mind of safety first. Neither do we reflect on the editors of the paper who produce a sheet true to the spirit of the church and whose editorial end far outranks and outgrades the contribution end. Our business is with nothing less than the spirit of the church itself—the popular point of view. We are not growing; we want to grow; we wish to know what is wrong; the hindrance is absolutely within, so complacent so deeply entrenched, so stubborn, as to make any informed man despair of a transformation.

In a nutshell the case is just this: we and our leaders classify ourselves with the venerable denominations that lumber complacently along, apparelled in an august dignity, moving still on the impulse of a bygone age,—an age of fiery conviction and intense propaganda,—with a mission largely fulfilled. Whereas, our doctrine is still immediate, youthful virile, compelling; our orders are unfulfilled, imperative; our mission to the world impending, future! Consequently, our methodology follows our point of view and is fundamentally wrong and ineffective. Our methodology must rather be that of these denominations when they had an issue, a cause and an imperative. If we are affected by them at all it should be at their source rather than at their present tide. But we do not need to go that far back to find our true parallels. It is in the young, vigorous, propaganda faiths of today which are growing by leaps and bounds—no names need be mentioned—which are meeting their own times with the weapons of the time, discovering the heart hunger of the masses and meeting it with their version of the truth. This is the way our journey lies if we ever expect it to emerge from the byways into the broad stream of the world's formative forces. However rudely it disturbs our dignified complacency, we must awake!

A Source for Propaganda Literature

By this we mean both a source for funds for literature for extension work and a board of review for the subject matter of such literature. The work of the Literature Committee is somewhat more general, so with their co-operation we feel the literature of direct contact for extension work should be passed on finally by the General Missionary Board, because of its representative composition and direct responsibilty. Such a literature should be outlined at once and a special fund set aside every year to keep the stocks up for immediate use by the workers on extension projects. The Foreign Board must exercise some such responsibility regarding the statement of Brethren belief in the work abroad.

Lest the importance of this recommendation should not be sensed by all, let us note that the condition deplored under the caption just above rises largely from the fact that some of our ablest writers avoid expressing themselves doctrinally out of fear of disagreement with their statement in an ultra-congregational, non-creedal church. The opposition of still others to such a propaganda policy is out of fear of the other fellow's statement. This year's survey revealed that conclusively. We make this recommendation as a practical way out of the deadlock.

Specially Trained Workers

The whole scheme of development of new projects requires three classes of special workers.

1. A number of specially trained mature lady visitors and personal workers to assist in the preliminary development of new points in the pre-pastoral stage.

2. Two or three available evangelists who will make a study of prospective work in new points. Owing to the difficulty of securing the time of such men, extension work should be scheduled far ahead.

3. At least two score successful pastors should pledge themselves to be available to put at least one new church on the map. This special service will require from five to ten of one's best years. It is too arduous to expect individual men to continue this as a life work. After such a service the pastor should be allowed to return to the more settled routine of the regular pastorate.

Conference Action

By way of recapitulation we note the following:

1. The election of a Field Secretary of the General Missionary Board to co-ordinate the work with the district boards.

2. The adoption of a settled policy covering the work of all boards in new fields.

3. Setting aside of $1000 for a survey fund to be administered for the saving of dying churches and prospective work in new fields. This fund to be raised a year in advance, to be 20 per cent of the funds raised in the new year and perhaps increased as the work is proven in value.

4. General withdrawal from the present policy of grants-in-aid to district projects and the assumption of preliminary development expense in all districts.

5. Setting aside of a tract fund for extension work and recognition of the General Missionary Board as a board of review for propaganda literature.

6. Instructions to the Literarature Committee as a Board of Initiative as well as a Board of Review, to submit plans likewise on the endowment of the committee under the administration of the Publication Company. This committee should rationally be assigned the task of conscripting the church's ability for doctrinal work in the paper, co-operating with the Editor in this special line to produce a paper having in view the thousands of new and undoctrinated Brethren who will be both hasty and impatient readers.

7. Finally, placing the responsibility for the Church Extension Department of the Four-Year Program in the hands of the General Missionary Board as reorganized with a Field Secretary to insure closer co-operation with the district boards. The present director holds an anomalous position with no power or resources to do more than investigate and recommend and none to carry out. The facts are at hand and the recommendations will produce a working machine. Your director has done his part. Results will depend on the action of the Board, the instructions of Conference and the drastic resolution of public opinion.

The Unchanging Book

BY EDWIN ELMORE JACOBS, PH. D.

The Bible is often spoken of as the unchanging and unchanged book. It is pointed out that it stands unaltered and unaffected amidst a changing world order. Other books change or must be revised for it is well known that books in certain lines of thought are almost useless a decade after their publication and we use them only to get the evolutionary point of view, that is, in order to remind ourselves of what we once thought and taught in certain fields. So the question at once arises, how can a book that never was changed, meet conditions that are ever changing? How can a book written nearly twenty centuries ago meet conditions now that are vitally and wholly different from those of that earlier day? And yet it is regarded as the final and finished revelation of God to mankind. It contains the faith once and for all delivered unto man. Consider therefore four questions with me here.

1 When the Bible was written nothing was known about democracy in government in the modern sense. The Bible is full of the imagery of kings and princes and lords and overlords but not a word is said about senators or representatives or presidents. The divine rights of kings was not questioned. Irsael at its best was autocratic, dictatorial, and theocratic. And later during the middle ages, king rose and fell; empires were founded and wasted away; priests, some of them good and kind, some vile and hateful, lived; kings either dined with kings or cut their heads off, just as suited their pleasure, Christian princes would prey upon Christiau princeling,—all this, and yet they all took refuge in the unchanging book.

Today we hold all this to be wrong. Indeed now some of the best thinking men are saying that they can not distinguish between Christianity and Democracy, so closely are these two forms of human activity bound up with human welfare. We think we are battling for the Lord in this present war that the "world might at last be free." We are fighting in order to overthrow just the very thing these men had builded up with so much care. We are seeking now to subdue the beast that they were feeding and making sleek and powerful. Some of us are willing to endure hardness as good soldiers, even to the supreme sacrifice itself, that institutions, customs, ceremonies and practices hoary with age, may be wiped from the pages of the world's history.

But what was the message to the men of that age and what is it to us now,—the message from the unchanging Book? If Christianity and Democracy are inseparable now, why not then? The first question therefore is, what about the unchanging Book and changing forms of government and of social evolution?

2. Moreover, the same general question may be raised in reference to science and learning generally. When Christ spoke there was no such branch of human knowledge as natural science. Nature in that day was loved, even worshiped, but not understood. Learning then consisted of philosophy, history, linguistics and the like but today the merest high school boy may know more about nature than Aristotle and Plato both put together. In the earlier day, men looked out and saw a storm, a volcano, or felt an earthquake and they said, "it is the finger of the Lord," for does he not walk on the wings of the wind? Are not the clouds his chariots? He toucheth the hills and they smoke. The Lord thundered from heaven and the most high uttered his voice.

Today, we may say not only as much, but vastly more. If I am Christian I must not only see God in his world, but I must seek to understand it, not only for the sake of human knowledge, but that I may enter more fully into the great command to subdue and use the earth for human welfare. But earlier it was not so. The world was peopled with ghosts, and demons and witches, those creatures of the mind. Did not Saul have a real experience with the witch of Endor? Did not the so-called Salem witchcraft have its origin in a church, which I saw a few years ago still standing? Indeed, much of this form of error had some correlation with the Book. We have discarded this now in our modern culture but the Book still stands unchanged and unchanging.

And furthermore, from the days of Galileo to Darwin, scientific theories have undergone changes and are still bound to undergo further change. The quarrel between theology and Darwinism was nothing less than disgraceful and is not yet wholly over so that in the final stages, adherents of both sides accused each other of impiety. Can it be that a book that gave comfort and courage before the days of evolution can do so now? Is it true that if we revise our opinions regarding some of the phenomena of nature that then we have to surrender the old Book? Is it true that if I see that some of the Bible is historical while some is allegorical, that then it all becomes false to me? In a word, can the Bible give dynamic and comfort to those who are learned as well as to those who are not? Can we expect great scholars to have as deep and as abiding faith in the Bible as the novice? Is it true, and if it is true is it natural, that much learning doth make one mad? Is it true that to educate is to blast at the Rock of Ages? In a word, what of the unchanging Book and changing standards of learning?

3. Moreover, our standards of right change. The moral sense we are fond of believing has advanced in every civilized nation of the earth. And the faster our ethical standards move up, the more we are approaching the Christ ideals. It is not the mark of supreme wisdom to have a static standard of morals, but of utter folly. Truth is a leaven and it will leaven the whole. The very fact that our legislatures are ever busy, indicates clearly that new aspects of right are ever coming to the surface and must be dealt with. You can recall, doubtless, scores of things that a decade ago were considered right that now we know to be wrong. I am fond of believing that now we are allowing situations, customs, standards, and laws to exist that a decade of years from now will be considered as wholly wrong and will be looked back upon as real relics of barbarism. And I am constantly cheered and strengthened by the thought that some time the ethical standards of America will be so nearly in accord with those of the Christ of love and justice, that these things will not be. If we are not at least moving in that direction, then much of the struggle is in vain. I for one want to believe that we have not yet attained but that we are pressing forward that we may attain. One can not be even a superficial observer of the present day and not see that many things are now wrong and that we are allowing conditions to form that will take nothing less than a mild revolution to undo. Might must not always make right. Sin in high places must be burned out. And on many of these conditions many in America are profoundly asleep while those in the vanguard, see! Now what of the unchanging Book and changing standards of right?

4. More important, however, is the question, what about the unchanging Book and changing and developing personality? I am a boy of fifteen. I have joined the church. I am disturbed and tempted. I am told to read the Book. I do and find even more strength than I can now fully recall. So far so good. But now I am forty. I am again in school. Again I am troubled and again I go to the Book. But now the troubles are no longer those of the boy. They have assumed a man's proportions. Now I am dealing with matters of social justice, property rights, natural history, astronomy, ethics, the doctrine of evolution and the like. What now about the strength that a man of forty needs? Yet again. I am seventy. My faith is not just what it was at forty. You say this is unreal? It is the realest thing in human experience. No normal soul can go through life and not develop. Only the dead do not change.

Moreover, this is a universal experience. If there is one expression which I have heard more than any other from the lips of our own preachers it is this, When I was younger, I thought this passage of scripture meant this; now I think it means otherwise. This, too, from those who believe that we have the last revelation finished and final. Now a book or creed that does not meet conditions of the mature mind and novice alike, which does not meet the wants of early man as well as later man, such a book or creed in just that far fails, does it not? But Christianity does not and has not failed.

All four of these questions to my mind may be answered at once and that is that the Bible presents a progressive revelation to mankind. Recall the all too little understood words of Christ when he says that those who do his will shall know of the doctrine. Or in other words, the more we enter into fellowship with him, the more are we able to do so. This must be what is meant when we say that the unregenerate can not know God. This is surely implied when we say that only those already pure in heart can see God. This means that Chistianity is a thing to be won, more than a gift to be bestowed. It is a conquest, a victory, a prize, not at the beginning but at the end.

Surely this progressive revelation must be implied to the command to feed the young on the sincere milk of the word. St. Paul, must mean the same thing when he says that as a child he thought as a child, but when he became a man, he had a man's mind. This is implied when we speak of growing in grace. It must be the supreme meaning when we say that Christianity has not yet been fully tried but that it is just now dawning on the world! Christ must have meant this when he said, that he had many things to say but that the disciples could not yet receive them.

If the church o fthe middle ages had but looked up and caught one glimpse of the Christ of purity and justice, all subsequent history would have been changed. And if America would ever come any ways near practicing the principles of the same Christ, it would never return to the old and lower way. Christianity is conquest after conquest. Neither society nor the Bible can be expressed by a static equation. Goodness is cumulative. And this is how the path of the just shineth more and ever increasingly more unto the perfect day.

Quantity and Quality

BY A. L. DE LOZIER

With apologies to Gugielmo Ferrero, the great Italian historian, I will choose this subject for a few lines. One cannot help but do a little solid thinking these days when the world seems almost to have lost its balance.

Despite the vast amounts expended for Y. M. C. A. and other great and worthy work, notwithstanding that productions of art sell high in some quarters, people have lost their interest in higher things. As a pastor, and one who is trying to reach those who most need the Gospel, I am frank to say that the great mass does not want to be bothered with religion.

On the other hand, in brushing up against socialists and other classes of free-thinkers, I have to admit that the church is almost capitalistic—especially in my own city.

Fond hopes of being able to evangelize the "stranger within our gates" have almost vanished before the already entrenched club life and pleasure resorts.

These peoples who came from Europe were devoutly religious at home, even though in great error there. Here they swing from superstition and tradition to free-thinking and open ridicule of things Christian.

That the church is losing out on quality is evident from the fact that many pastors in this vicinity are drinkingmen . I personally know one man who left his church because the pastor openly frequented the saloon. A certain woman said recently that she was going to cut off her subscription to the church because she didn't care to furnish more drinking money for the one who was called (?) to preach the Gospel (?) in her church.

We have a fine public library in our city, but people are not after quality in things intellectual, for the best books are not so much read. I have carefully examined the dates stamped by the librarians when books were taken out. The real worthwhile books have made only a few trips out, and sad to say, some came back the same day.

Not long ago I heard a conversation in corrupt German between an Austro-Hungarian Jew and a Pennsylvania Dutch woman. The Jew was telling what great professors they had in Austro-Hungary and how the teaching porfession flourished there. The woman immediately replied that teachers in America have little encouragement. She knew whereof she spoke, for she had a brother teacher in New York.

Today many teachers are leaving the professions and pastors are being called upon to fill the vacancies.

Pastors are taking on plenty of side lines today. A certain country pastor in Arkansas is: chairman of county chapter of Red Cross, campaign manager of Red Cross War fund, district secretary of Y. M. C. A. war fund, first lieutenant in Home Guards, member of state executive committee of Y. M. C. A., chairman of foreign mission committee of his church district, chairman publicity committee of War Savings Stamp campaign, member of council of defence committee, of Jersey cattle club, etc. etc.

Now everyone seems to agree that efficiency means concentration. Extensity is purchased at the price of intensity. Quantity is gained by the sacrifice of quality.

Now to come back to Ferrero, the first chapter of his late book: "EUROPE'S FATEFUL HOUR," is entitled: "QUANTITY AND QUALITY." It consists in a comparison of Europe with the Americas. Some estimate Europe ahead of the Americas, while others put the Americas ahead of Europe. Now according to the Florentine, whose book I quote, it all depends upon the standard by which you measure. Quantitatively speaking, the Americas deserve first place. Qualitatively considered, Europe claims the honors.

Mr. Ferrero raises this question: "Why have the Americans, who have spent such fabulous sums on beautifying their towns, never succeeded in building a St. Mark or a Notre Dame?"

The answer is that America has the money, the artists and even the desire to create the beautiful. But there is lacking just one thing: TIME. A New York Architect is quoted as saying: My compatriots are quite ready to spend one hundred million dollars on building a church as beautiful as St. Mark's in Venice, but they would insist on its being finished in eighteen months."

This statement of the architect seems to be a very good analysis of the situation. In America time is not education, or growth into the image and likeness of Christ, but time with us is just ordinary metal—"Time is money," dice il popolo Inglese. We are in one great rush to transmute time into "cold cash."

We don't care for quality, but we want quantity. This is not said with a prejudice against Fords either.

So says Ferrero: "The world of intellect of today seems out of touch with the world. Is there a single priest who has not asked himself in moments of discouragement of what use it is to preach the Christian virtues to a century whose power lies in overweening pride and an almost delirious greed of possession?

What intelligent historian has not wondered from time to time to what purpose he persists in recording the events of the past to a generation which only looks to the future?

What philosopher has not felt in this age, so wholly absorbed in economc realities, as if he had strayed into this world from some other planet?

What artist, whose ambition is not confined to money making but who strives after a high standard of perfection, has not often cursed the frenzied whirl in which we all live today?"

And so it goes. We are thinking in terms of quantity until we have forgotten that there is such a thing as quality.

The great Italian professor's treatise closes thus:

"What will be the use of filling our museums with Greek statues when the world no longer appreciates their beauty, or of publishing perfect editions of the classics when only a handful of specialists can read them? Just because in the great continent of America fire is once more about to become the lord of the earth and the supreme deity of man, as it was at the dawn of history, the law of equilibrium demands that in both Europe and America there should be a select few devoted to the worship of the Muses and capable of appreciating the harmonies of Virgil even amid the deafening whirl of modern machinery."

And may I humbly add: That there be a select few devoted to the worship of God and of the Christ and capable of praying, as Henry Drummond would say, "communing with the spiritual environment," even amid the deafening whirl of modern pleasures, isms, and what not.

The Brethren church is seeking quality in the gospel, else we would—like others—be dropping most things therein recorded and commanded and driving for quantity rather than taking the time for quality.

May God help the Brethren church to adhere to qualtiy. And the only real quality is the Whole Gospel for which we stand.

American Church Official in France Tells of War Work of American Churches

Cablegrams recently received from Rev. Charles S. Macfarland, special commissioner to France for the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, describe the large and enthusiastic public meetings which have been held in various cities throughout France. At one of the most recent of these, in Nimes on July 23, there was an audience of three thousand. In many towns the town officials presided at the meetings. Troups of Boy Scouts served as a guard of honor and hundreds of school children lined the roads, singing and cheering. In several towns in the Cervennes moutains schools, factories and stores were closed in honor of the occasion and the Catholic priests gave their parishioners permission to attend the meetings held in Protestant churches. One very interesting meeting was held in the open air in the historic Huguenot desert, Dr. Macfarland speaking from the old portable pulpit used by the persecuted Huguenot preachers. At some meetings the attendance has been as high as six thousand.

Speaking at Nimes, Dr. Macfarland said: "With the work of the Young Men's and Young Women's Christian Associations, the strong arms of our churches, you are familiar. Immediately upon our President's declaration of a state of war, the Administrative Committee summoned the whole Federal Council, which ordinarily meets only once in four years, to a special session at Washington, from whence issued its call to the religious forces of the nation. The Bureau of Army and Navy Chaplains was set up; movements to get the churches behind the Red Cross and relief movements were immediately multiplied many fold. Our churches, Protestant, Catholic and Hebrew, are supporting the nation, not blindy but resolutely. The Liberty Loans, the Red Cross and the work of the Young Men's and Young Women's Christian Associations have become our missionary causes. The moral and religious welfare of our army and navy have become the objective of our evangel. Measures have been taken for the physical and spiritual care of the wives and children of our defenders. Our churches are seeking to meet with Christian sympathy and social wisdom our industrial needs which have assumed such serious proportions.

"More recently, a committee of the churches, called The National Comittees on the Churches and the Moral Aims of the War, has been sending hundreds of our most gifted speakers from one end of the country to the other in order to deepen and clarify the moral convictions of our people. To this Committee came the great message of your fallen leader, Charles Wagner.

"The Federal Council has declined to ask any exemption for either theological students or preachers. Figures from some of our local associations show that more than half of their preachers are engaged in specific war work. We are supplying chaplains faster than the army is ready for them.

"Recognizing that the war has placed on the nations and the churches an obligation for the most searching self-examination, the Federal Council has constiuted a Committee on the War and the Religious Outlook, to consider the state of religion as affected by the war with special reference to the duty and opportunity of the churches.

"I well know the unspoken question that seeks its way to your lips: Is other help also coming from across the seas? Are we to have men to take the places of our tens of thousands who have fallen? My answer to this is that we have multitudes of men willing, ready, restless to come. It is only a question of ships in which to bring them."

The French authorities are deeply conscious of the importance of such a mission as Dr. Macfarland's. M. Pichon, Secretary of Foreign Affairs, said very strongly, in an interview with Dr. Macfarland, that moral help from America is just as important as troups and supplies. France has felt from the beginning, he said, and must continue to feel the moral and spiritual power of America.

The Ministry of the Church in the Time of War

The ministry of the churches of Christ in America to the soldiers and sailors, to the country itself, and to the nations engaged in war, has been so varied, and withal so natural and unobtrusive, as to escape the attention of many.

The churches of every communion, with exceptions so few as scarcely to be worthy of mention, have been loyal and patriotic, early recognizing the moral issues at stake, denouncing the abrogation of treaty rights, the spoliation of the helpless, the wanton destruction of the innocent, and the resort to barbarian methods of warfare; and by encouraging men everywhere to defend the principles of democracy and the liberties of people both small and great have rendered an immeasurably valuable service in upholding the morale of the nation.

Through the Young Men's Christian Association, the Young Women's Christian Association, and other similar bodies, which are the offspring and agents of the church, and through the agency of the devoted service of Army and Navy Chaplains, and the Camp Pastors the church herself has been ministering, giving of her workers and her money, and imparting her ideals and her sacrificial aims.

The church has responded to all calls of the nation. Out from her membership, forth from her Sunday schools and allied organizations, have gone her young men to fight the nation's battles, and her young women as nurses and in specialized service, as the Service Flags, dedicated in many places of worship, bear silent and impressive testimony.

To the Red Cross and all movements for succor and relief she has given not merely millions of money, but, more precious still, thousands and thousands of workers, taken from her clergy and from amongst her most efficient laity. There are denominations whose clergy has been more than decimated through enlistment in the national service, military, naval and civilian.

As the needs of war work become more urgent, not simply for the soldiers and sailors who gather in great camps and cantonments and go abroad, but also for the great industrial populations which are sustaining the nation through the production of munitions, accoutrements, equipment, and food supplies, the church has undertaken a new form of ministry. The Home Missions Council, which is composed of representatives from thirty-five different home mission bodies representing twenty-three different denominations, and the Council of Women for Home Missions representing women's boards have joined with the General War-Time Commission of the Churches and the Home Missions Council." This committee, consisting of seven members from the Home Mission Council, two members from the Council of Women for Home Missions, and five members of the General War-Time Commission (leaving two vacancies to be filled,) organized on July 15, 1918, with Mr. John M. Glenn, of the Russell Sage Foundation, Chairman; Rev. Alfred Wms. Anthony, of the Home Missions Council, Secretary; M. William T. Demarest of the Reformed Church in America, Treasurer; Rev. Worth M. Tippy, of the Commission on Church and Social Service of the Federal Council, Executive Secretary; and Rev. Howard R. Gold, of the National Lutheran Commission for Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare, Assistant Secretary.

The program of the Committee includes (1) the investigation of conditions through adequate surveys in the communities affected by the concentration and speeding up of war industries; (2) the organization and strengthening of the churches in these communities and, where necessary, the creation of new churches for the religious and social welfare of the vast population which is migrating to these centers; and (3) that difficult and delicate task, yet needful and not to be avoided, of allocating responsibility to the co-operating boards and churches, so as to avoid wasteful competition and duplication.

In its investigations the Committee already has complete surveys, made by the Commission on the Church and Social Service of the Federal Council, of fifty-one places in which some form of helpful agency, either local or national, has been set at work. In forty-seven other places surveys are now in progress; and twenty-four places are listed which are to receive attention in the immediate future. Other communities are reported almost daily. Lumber camps, mining centers, oil fields, and seamen's communities are included within the scope of the Committee's work.

The places requiring attention are of three distinct types. First there is the altogether new development, apart by itself, planted by the sea or in the midst of a great plain, which has sprung up for some specific industry connected with the war. In many instances these are Government Reservations,—camps to all intents and purposes, neither military nor naval, but civil. In other instances industries have been builded and settlements created along side of old communities, and the new attached to the old in some loose yet contiguous way, require special ministrations which the old are helpless to render. The third type is the old settlement with so many new industries come into it that it is congested, almost overwhelmed, with its unprepared-for prosperity,

The Sunday School

Moving Pictures of Sunday school Life in Japan and Philippines

How the world lives is always an interesting study. Moving pictures bring these facts from afar. Some exceptionally fine moving pictures have recently been taken by Rev. J. L. McLaughlin, Sunday school Secretary for the Philippines, representing the World's Sunday School Association. The first lot was made in the Islands where Mr. McLaughlin has worked for a number of years. This film shows the large city school, and the country "barrio" Sunday school. Teachers are pictures as they leave the morning church service and then proceed to some outlying station to conduct a Sunday school. They take with them the needed lesson supplies as well as the baby organ. That large adult Bible class in Manila is seen as the members march out at the close of their session on the day when 717 were present. The class began with 20 and after calling themselves "We Brothers of 99" started out to grow. One of the thrilling parts of the film is when the audience sees the special train of Sunday school delegates on their way to the great convention in Manila. Sunday school parades are shown as well as games of the children and many native scenes. That film closes with a fascinating "Thank you" by a little Filipino girl who is expressing appreciation for all the help given by the Sunday school friends in America.

The other film is plotted in Japan and shows the life of a sweet little Japanese girl from the time she is awakened in the morning until she returns from her Sunday school. Her mother comes to awaken her and then arranges her toilet. She is so shy when she eats before others that she can scarcely convey the food to her mouth with the chop sticks. On the way to school she meets a little playmate and they go together to the class room. Her big sister is also shown both at work and at play. Scenes in and about Tokyo are presented which add interest to the pictures. It is fun to see the babies tied on the back of "little mothers" and then to watch how active these little caretakers are, who are thus weighted down.

These films are the property of the World's Sunday School Association and will be used in presenting the work of that organization. They will be shown especially at state Sunday school conventions and other large gatherings of Sunday school workers, and usually when some one from the office of the World's Sunday School Association can be present and tell the story of the pictures. The World's Association has stereopticon pictures showing "Sunday schools in Many Lands" which can be rented for a nominal charge of $1.00 and express charges both ways. A descriptive lecture is loaned with these views.

Another reel of moving pictures is now on the way from South America. These pictures portray Sunday school activities in and about Buenos Aires, Argentina, and were taken by Rev. George P. Howard, Sunday School Secretary for South America, representing the World's Sunday School Association. The reels of Japan and the Philippines were used at the International Sunday School Convention which was held in Buffalo in June. The audiences were most enthusiastic. Nothing of the kind had ever been shown before in America. Other pictures showing Sunday school work will be taken in Egypt, China, and Korea in time for the World's Convention in Tokyo which will be held within a year after the war is over.

Pictures and Dressed Dolls for Overseas

Soldiers in France as well as missionaries everywhere are asking for large Bible pictures such as are used in the children's department of nearly every Sunday school. Recently Mr. W. H. Danforth, of St. Louis, well known in organized Sunday school work, who is now in Y. M. C. A. work in France, asked for some of these pictures for the huts and dugouts abroad. Of course they were forwarded promptly. Mr. Danforth just sent the following in his letter of thanks: "Picture rolls and wall mottos, which you mention in your letter will carry a message to our soldiers which will be vital and in their name I want to thank you. I just hope they will come through all right without any delay."

Every foreign missionary always wants those large picture rolls. The Surplus Material Department of the World's Sunday School Association has been helping to supply these during the past years and has placed more than 28,000 in the home land in touch with missionaries abroad. But the missionaries never have enough pictures for their work. They also want the small Bible lesson picture cards. Even post card scenes are wanted. Since the pictures are already in hand the only cost to make the gift possible is that of postage, which is 2 ounces for one cent, and since not more than 4 pounds should be placed in one package it is hard to spend more than thirty-two cents at one time making a splendid gift to any mission station. A missionary in the Philippines is very enthusiastic as he writes: "We have about 20 Sunday schools in our district, all of which are using some kind of 'surplus literature, cards, quarterlies, papers, picture rolls, etc. If any are willing to do some work they can dress dolls which the missionaries will distribute at the coming Christmas season. The dolls should be sent by Parcels Post some time in October. The dolls should be about 10 inches long and have go-to-sleep eyes. This is delightful summer work and will bring much blessing abroad next Christmas. For all information write to the Surplus Material Department, World's Sunday School Association, 216 Metropolitan Tower, New York City. Be particular to indicate your denomination in full as a card of introduction to one of the same church abroad when that is possible. There are also many requests for co-operation from interdenominational organziations, such as the China Inland Mission.

REVIEW OF

The Thought and Work of the Church

August 28 to September 2. Yes, that is the date. The date of what? Why the most important meeting of the General Conference in years. Of course the place is the mecca of the Brethren church, Winona Lake, Indiana. These are portentious days through which we are passing, and in the work we are trying to do as a church we need counselling one with another. There are interests that are vital to the life and the growth of the Brethren church that are passing through evolutionary changes and they need the very best of attention to make them count most effectively for the kingdog of God.

These may be strenuous times from a financial standpoint, but they are also strenuous times from a religious standpoint, and they are deserving of the sacrifice we may find it necessary to make in order to be present. We may think the expense of travel is too great since the increase in the railway fare, but it has been our lot to take a number of short railway journeys lately and we have observed that the trains are crowded as never before, so people do travel, when they want to, regardless of the price of a ticket. Pastors and church officials should earnestly endeavor to impress upon the congregations the importance of sending delegates to the Conference.

While the growth of the church may be slow at the present time, yet we are occasionally reminded that it is growing, and growth is the natural function of the church. As a partial realization of one of the goals of the Four-Year Program the building of the new church at Ardmore Heights, a suburb of South Bend, Indiana, and the early dedication of the same as announced elsewhere in this paper, will be a cause of rejoicing to the whole brotherhood. We should be able to say of this achievement as was said of one of the early disciples, "And when he came and had seen the grace of God he was glad." Dr. Furry has been called to dedicate this church on Sunday, August 25th and to conduct a week's meeting previous to the dedication.

The first sentence of C. F. Yoder's report from South America struck us with a peculiar force of the irony of the situation as his communication was received on one of the hottest days in the history of Ashland. But we are glad for the good work that our missionaries are now accomplishing during the South American winter months.

Brother Yoder has also sent us a translation of a communication from one of the native helpers he has enlisted in the cause of the Brethren in Argentina. We certainly welcome Brother Barrio as a contributor to the Evangelist, and while our readers would not understand his native tongue we are glad Brother Yoder is willing to furnish us with a translation.

In accordance with the announcement received from Brother Sands several weeks ago I. D. Bowman has been giving a series of lectures at Sergeantsville, New Jersey. Brother Bowman has also become a tiller of the soil for the summer through the kindness of the membership and the local preachers of the Whole Gospel Mission of Philadelphia.

After a rather extended silence Brother Jennings comes to our columns once more with his Travel Notes. He has been upon the Pacific coast for some months and wrote his notes just after the Brethren Bible Conference at Long Beach where he had been in attendance as one of the speakers on the program. At the time of this writing Brother Jennings and wife are on the way home and to the Winona Conference.

G. T. Ronk's final contribution of the series he has been furnishing our readers as Director of Church Extension is undoubtedly one of the strongest papers he has furnished us during the year. It is no small matter for a church to develop a working literature and it is a matter that dare not be neglected. Our readers will remember that we called attention to this matter in our Around the Editor's Table notes some weeks ago. The matter must receive attention, and it must receive it NOW. Read every word Brother Ronk has written and then read it again for it is important to both think and to act along the line of his suggestions.

The second installment of the report of the Southern California Bible Conference as furnished by A. P. Reed appears this week. We will say nothing more about it than that it is as interesting as the first installment was and deserves reading by all our subscribers. Brother Reed has promised still one more installment of the proceedings of this conference which seems to have such great influence over the Southern California churches.

J. A. Garber makes an announcement on another page concerning Expert Endeavor classes at Winona that will be of interest to all active Endeavor workers. These classes are conducted along the modern lines of condensing and concentrating a great deal into a very short time and space to meet the requirements of the strenuous days in which we live and in which we must do our work.

Brother Carpenter is "going to fight it out on this line, if it takes all summer," or at least till Conference time, to enable the Washington church to "Go over the Top" with that mortgage that has hung like a cloud over the work for so many years. But it is a cloud that can be turned "inside out" so that the silver lining can be seen, but the Brethren from all over the brotherhood must furnish the silver. A good start has been made, but it is not in the beginning, nor in the middle, but at the end of the race that one wins the prize. What shall the end be in this race against debt and time?

The value of Expert Endeavor training as given during the Conference at Winona Lake is indicated in the letter from Mrs. Grosse, Altoona, Pennsylvania, who completed the course last year. We know Sister Grossse is a REAL Endeavorer by the way she has taken hold of the work as representative of the Brethren Evangelist for the Altoona church and by the number of subscriptions she has sent in. We will always say Amen to that kind of Expert Endeavor.

The pledges for the Kentucky Mission work have been paid only "fairly" well during the past year according to the report of Secretary Carpenter. Fifty unpaid pledges at this season of the year are too many. Every effort should be put forth by those who gave these pledges to make good before the Winona Conference. The work in Kentucky is going steadily forward, but it must have the support of the whole brotherhood. There are also a number of workers needed for this field. Calls have been made, but these calls have not yet been heeded. Who will answer NOW?

Freeman Ankrum finds many of the same conditions to be met in the rural church at Garwin, Iowa that confront our city churches. The war has taken fifteen young men from this one country church, but the remaining workers will prove steadfast and carry double burdens to make up this lack of workers. Brother Ankrum has been called to continue as pastor of this charge.

Brother Alvin Byers, Canton, Ohio, who did such effective evangelistic work for a time last winter, but was compelled to discontinue the work on account of the serious illness of Sister Byers is now situated so that he can again take up that line of Christian service.

We have just gone over the new edition of the constitution and by-laws of the National Brethren Ministerial Association and have also gone over the list of names of the membership. This was interesting to us as we were the secretary-treasurer of the organization from its beginning in 1893 until 1908, a period of fifteen years. One thing impressed us as we went over the list of names, and that is that THIRTY-THREE of the charter members are still living and retaining their membership in the Association. When it is remembered there were less than fifty charter members twenty-five years ago it is all the more remarkable that so many are still living. It is also to be noted that only twenty-five members have been lost by death in the twenty-five years of the organization.

Around the Editor's Table

Loving our Enemies

One of the problems that constantly confronts the present day Christian is how to love his enemies and still lend his assistance to the Allies in the winning of the war. That an apparent inconsistency exists here can not be denied, and yet it seems to many that the inconsistency is not as real as it may appear to be.

While Germany may be considered the enemy to all civilization and freedom of all kinds, the Christian still wonders just what his duty toward the Germans is. To express the feeling of the American religious press on this point, The Biblical World (Chicago) tells us that we can love our enemies, but "we can not like them." This authority insists that Jesus did not insist on the condoning of evil, and then proceeds to tell why in the following language:—

"To love people is to treat them as we should like to be treated, and to wish them well. If their enmity to us is due to our own wrong-doing, we must remove the cause, cost it what it may. If it is due to their wrong-doing, we must try to get them to abandon their practises. If they then refuse to be reconciled, they are to be ostracized.

"That is the plain teaching of Jesus.

"Can we love our enemies while we are at war with them? Not if our love means affection for them or indifference to their wrong-doing. Love for enemies does not mean that we should suffer them to do others harm; that we should approve their brutality, condone their atrocities, or submit to their oppression. We have a nation to preserve, a civilization, political ideals, and liberties to safeguard.

"We shall love the Germans in the sense that we shall be reconciled with them as soon as they convince us that we have done them wrong or they are converted to a regard for human rights and international justice. If they refuse such reconciliation, persist in robbing other nations, justify rape, massacres, deportations, starvation and terrorization in the name of patriotism, love for them will not lead us to neglect love for their victims. If they threaten the world with the sword, we shall protect the world with the sword.

Love for our enemies is not moral if it deadens our indignation against the crimes they perpetrate."

We shall not be kept from killing our enemies though we love them, "if they compel us to choose that as the only way in which our love for their victims can find expression," and The Biblical World recalls that we did not choose the method, for we were forced into war when we sought peace. Yet we need not hate Germany in the sense that we wish it ill, and we have no desire to crush the nation because it is unchristian, for we will not "soil our souls by vengeance," and

"German women shall not suffer at our hands because Belgian women have suffered unmentionable injury from German soldiers. German civilians shall not be shot because Belgian and French civilians have been shot in batches. German workmen and farmers will not be made slaves of martial law because the workmen and farmers of Belgium, France, Poland, and the Ukraine have been deported and maltreated. Germans need not fear we shall violate treaties because they have made a mockery of treaties.

"Christians do not hate because they fight. We seek not vengeance, but international justice. When peace comes we shall ask no indemnities or punitive suffering. We shall help Germans when Germans will let us help them. Our sense of justice will extend to them as to all the world.

"But such love will not excuse their brutalities or make us indifferent to the danger of the repetition of German crimes.

"We shall love our enemies, but we shall not disarm until they are harmless. If they repent and bring forth fruits meet for repentance, we shall welcome their return to civilization.

"Until that day we shall fight them. For love that seeks to do men good is cowardice when it refuses to prevent them from doing wrong."

What Do We Stand For?

This question may not be formulated according to the best rules of the English language, but it expresses a query of the utmost importance to every denomination of the Christian church. In these days of federation and consolidation unless a church can show distinct reason why it should continue as an organization there is little hope for its future progress.

The continuous agitation of the question of "organic union" by one of the largest denominations in America seems to have reacted on the church, and according to a writer in The Presbyterian (Philadelphia) this tends to give the "feeling that the church doubts her own specific mission and fears her own exhaustion, and therefore seeks affiliation of strength and security." Concerning this policy of the Presbyterian church this Philadelphia paper seems dubious, and gives expression to its feelings in the following words:

"No body seemingly so regarding itself can be attractive. After the Presbyterian church is through with her present efforts at organic union, it might be wise to wait for propositions rather than to make them. The fine balance has been marred. There has been a tendency to minimize faith and conviction of the truth, and to put in its place mere emotion and activity. There is now a tendency to magnify the physical interests of men over the intellectual and spiritual life. There has also been an increase of the formal over the simple in our mode of worship, and in some cases it has become cold and mechanical. Our position of marked influence is still maintained. In certain parts and congregations of the church, catholicity has gone to seed, and been carried to the extreme, and they are fellowshiping with those who deny the Bible, and the Deity and Divine work and teachings of our Lord. We have very greatly weakened our emphasis and value of Christian eduction. We still have a number of Christian colleges, but they are poorly supported, and our people are inclined to send their youth to State or non-evangelical institutions, with the result that they return unbelievers, and are lost to the church. Our family life has been very greatly reduced and neglected, causing a decrease of the growth of the church from within itself. We are still the leading evangelistic church, but some methods have been introduced which weaken reverence and the fear of God, and as a result the new communicants go out of the back door nearly as fast as they come in at the front door. Moreover, large emphasis on mass-meetings has chilled our enthusiasm and activity in personal work. Our greatest defection is in the seminaries. We have some thoroughly loyal seminaries, but the church has never given the full acknowlodgment due them, but has subjected them to the same investigations as the less faithful ones. Some of our seminaries give out German poison-gas, and the church has not restrained them. The church is still outspoken in her loyalty to the Bible, but some of these seminaries seek its destruction, and the church acquiesces in silence. Some seminaries send their men out without proper homiletic training, and they fail to bring the truth within the reach of the people. As a result, they weaken their own service. Until these defections are corrected, the church can not reach her full vigor."

Lessons for Us

In this experience of the Presbyterian church we may find justification for the continuation of our "peculiar plea" for existence as a church. The Brethren church was founded as an expression of a firm conviction of the need of just such an organization to preserve the teachings and principles of Jesus Christ unsullied by human additions or detractions, and in the strength of this conviction our forefathers contended for the peculiar doctines of the Brethren which have been the source of power in the church for two hundred years.

If the Brethren church of today has no such conviction for which to contend, it has no claim upon modern society and should disband or become benevolently assimilated by some larger body for these are days of conservation of every kind of energy. But we believe the Brethren church has a mission to the world that is just as distinct as it was two hundred years ago, and that the maintainance of its organization is just as essential as it was at that time, and while we would welcome a union of forces with any other body that holds to the same convictions we do we should not forget the tendency to weaken our own position by a too insistent attitude in regard to this matter.

Let us invite others to unite with us, but only upon the adoption by them of the same principles that gave to us our right to a separate organization in the beginning, and which right we have never abdicated, and which we dare not and still claim the support of the believers in the Bible, the whole Bible and nothing but the Bible as a rule of religious faith and practice.

Items Gleaned from The Missionary Review of the World

A Japanese Christian Official

Hon. Soroku Ebara, who was elected a representative in the first Parliament in Japan, re-elected several times, and a few years ago made a member of the House of Peers, has also had a striking career as an educator. He organized the first school for modern military instruction. He visited America, studied our institutions and returned to Japan to engage in regular educational work, feeling that modern education would be fundamental to making Japan a strong state. He invited a missionary to become a teacher in his school.

A few years later a Canadian missionary school was about to be given up because of the government regulation with reference to the teaching of religion. There were 400 boys in the school and he did not like to see them turned out into the street. A few Japanese friends joined with him to take over the school and Senator Ebara became the principal. Since then all the debts have been paid and the number of students has grown to 800. Meanwhile the new principal became a Christian and joined the Methodist church. Each morning he reads the Bible and talks to the boys in chapel. Many of the distinguished men of Japan have passed through his school.

A Leader of Japanese Women

An interesting visitor in the United States during the past few months has been Miss Tsune Watanaba, of Japan, President of the Congregational Women's Missionary Society in her native land. Miss Watanaba has had a teaching experience of some twenty years, several of which were spent in connection with the Women's Missionary Society. The W. C. T. U. also claims a large share of her interest and she is the president of the Kobe Branch. One object of her visit is to study the methods and interests of missionary women in America, that she may utilize them as far as possible among her own people.

A Japanese Business Man's Generosity

Ginjire Katsuda is renowned in the business world of Japan because he has become a multi-millionaire through shipping since the beginning of the war. In 1915 he heard of one dire need of a mission school, Aoyama Gakuin, of which he is an alumnus. The roof of Goucher Hall needed repairing, and immediately Mr. Katsuda contributed five thousand dollars for this purpose. In January of the following year, says Mrs. Jennie Vail Bishop, plans for the expansion of the school were made public, and Mr. Katsuda pledged ten thousand dollars toward this project. In June he learned that the equipment was far from adequate for the greatly increased number of students, and he promised an amount sufficient to erect a suitable building and five thousand dollars for the President's home.

Nearly thirty years ago (in 1888 or 1889), young Ginjire Katsuda joined an expedition to the Kurile Islands, but was obliged to turn back for lack of funds. He pawned his watch to pay his fare back to Kyushu and on the train met President Honda (Bishop Honda) and Rev. J. O. Spencer. They learned something of Katsuda's history and advised him to enter Aoyama Gakuin. This he did, and was graduated from the Acaemy in 1892. He was converted and was baptized, but after leaving the academy was lost to view until he loomed up as a rich man and the school's benefactor.

A Korean's Opinion of Missions

"Whereas the distinguishing mark of Oriental ethics is to honor man and despise woman, Christianity has brought the notion that men and women are sons and daughters of God on equal terms." This, in the judgment of a native contributor to The Korea Mission Field, is one of the great contributions which Christian missions have made to Korean civilization. Previous to the entrance of Chrstianity, the writer states, politics were corrupt, industry and finance were disorganized through a whirlwind of graft, bribery, extravagance, dishonesty. Into these conditions the missionary brought a high ideal of life and the dignity of virtue. Where premature marriages flourished and re-marriage was frowned upon, the church has contributed a legal age for marriage and given to Korean women a "precious freedom."

Another point made by the Korean is that common schools of both lower and higher grade have followed the establishment of Christian schools, which were making the only attempt at educating the people up to seven or eight years ago. Even now a church with two or three hundred members has a primary school, as a rule. Thus the Christian Church is credited with having laid the foundation of Korea's new system of education.

The Deacon's Restitution

..A missionary in Korea was examining a candidate for baptism. "What did you do about your sins when you believed in Jesus?" "I was sorry for them and mended them." "How did you mend them?" "By not committing them again." "If I break this pencil and resolve not to break it again will that mend it?" "No." "What must I do to mend it?" Make it as much as you can like it was." "Have you done that with your quarrels, debts and so forth?"

As deacon Kim sat and listened, an arrow of conviction pierced his heart. He went home, took some money from the box, went to the drugstore and said to the proprietor: "Here is money for that medicine I bought a month ago, and promised to pay for in a few days. I beg pardon for not keeping my word." The druggist replied: "I have been watching you Christians to see if Christianity is any different from these other religions we have. Now I believe it is better, it gives power to its follower to do what it teaches, and gives humility too."

New Movement in Abyssinia

Through the Swedish Evangelical Mission a remarkable religious movement is reported from the interior of Abyssinia. This has taken hold of the Moslem population so that in the last six years some 10,000 have been baptized into the Christian church. The apostle of this movement is an ex-Sheik, Zaccaria, who has changed his name to Noaye Kristos, a person of great influence in Sokoto, in the Amhara country where he lives. The movement has sprung from Scriptures distributed by the British Bible Society in Abyssinia, and is evangelical in character. Indeed these new Christians are so dissatisfied with the dead forms of the Coptic church that they are organizing classes for Scripture study and have mobilized some 500 men, who are serving as teachers.

Serious Floods in Africa

Word has come that Zululand has been cut off from Natal by serious floods, which have washed away bridges and spread death and destruction over a great area. The Umvoti River, in Zululand, without warning of rainstorm or other sufficient explanation, but possibly, it is thought, because of a cloudburst near its source, came down in a wall of water seventy feet high, drowning many Europeans, Indians and natives. At the same time occurred a storm at Beira, the American Board's station in Mozambique territory, which actually carried the mission house out to sea. Fortunately it was not occupied at the time, Mrs. Maxwell and her boys being temporarily at Natal, where she was making plans for going home, because of Mr. Maxwell's recent death.

The Nyasaland Mission

The Nyasaland Mission which was founded in 1890 by the late Rev. Andrew Murray, D.D., is laboring in Nyasaland, North Eastern Rhodesia and Portuguese East Africa. Its annual report, recently published, shows that, in spite of the many hindrances due to the present world war and the Chilembwe Rebellion near Blantyre, 2,874 members were received into the church during the past year by baptism, and 1,370 adults broke with heathenism and were admitted into the baptism classes. The gospel has been preached every week to 42,000 adults and children. The work of translating the entire Bible into the native language, the Chinyanga, has just been completed by Rev. W. H. Murray, assisted by Rev. Mr. Napier, of the Presbyterian church. This task which has required ten years of active labor on the part of Mr. Murray, gives a million people the entire Bible in their own language.

Through the sacrificing efforts of the church in South Africa, the missionaries on the field and the native Christians, a deficit of about $5,000 has been wiped out and a goodly balance left in the mission treasury. The North American Council transmitted about $5,000 during the past year from the supporters of the work in the United States and Canada.

Telephone Girls in France

When the first group of American women telephone operators arrived in Paris in March they found awaiting them comfortable living quarters which had been made ready by the Young Women's Christian Association. Miss Mary George White, writing from Paris of this work, says: "The Association accepted gladly the responsibility offered it by the Army. Before the girls arrived, the Signal Corps officer in charge of the first group came with a request for help. It was easy for the telephone operators assigned to Paris to live at the Hotel Petrograd, our Hostess House there. Those assigned to the interior were cared for by secretaries in certain other places.

Soldiers Who are Neglected

A committee on War Time Work of the Home Missions Council calls the attention of churches and of helpful people everywhere to the needs of the smaller groups of men in many parts of the country. These needs are summarized as follows: "The big cantonments are being looked after, l lesser camps, such as small aviation camps and groups of soldiers guarding bridges and property, are being neglected. These little camps are often near country churches which could render great service to the lonely men. These men are not protected from temptations as are the men in big camps, and life for them is monotonous.

Training Classes in General Conference

While General Conference is largely inspirational it is not wanting in the practical. For several years now the departmental sessions have approached schools of methods. In addition there have been classes in Teacher Training and Expert Endeavor.

Similar provision will be found in the program of the coming Conference, August 26 to September 2. Young people who are desirous of rendering Christian service through the Sunday school and Christian Endeavor society will find it much to their advantage to avail themselves of this training for leadership. The schools and societies of nearby states, at least, will find it very profitable to send one or more representatives. Those expecting to pursue these courses will find it helpful to read in advance Expert Endeavor or some standard Teacher Training text, but such pre-study will not be made an entrance requirement. Inquiries will be cheerfully answerd.

A Personal Testimony with An Appeal

I wish to write a word regarding Expert Endeavor. It was my privilege to finish the course at Winona during our General Conference of last year. It was understood, of course, that the result of my study was to be brought back to our society.

Perhaps you will ask if the result justified the effort put forth. If you only knew the happy hours spent in passing the work on to others you would not want to ask such a question. I have received a thousand times more out of it than I put into this inspiring work.

While teaching our class I found as did the students that we were only in the primary class of Christian Endeavor. So fascinating was the study that many times they would stop in the middle of the lesson and talk over different parts which would be of benefit to our society. The chief benefit is eight Christian Endeavor Experts. From these, at our last election, we chose our president, vice president, secretary, pianist and chairman of the most important committees. Besides the study inspired us to organize a Junior society from which we expect to reap great gains in coming years.

But we are happy to note other advances. The Brethren society was the first to graduate a class in Altoona. And so far as is known we lead the county, there being no other Experts except two or three county officers who qualified as I did in some denominational convention. Then Expert Endeavor has been the means of bringing us into closer relation with the county and state work.

Recently I attended the State Convention, and was surprised at the small number of Christian Endeavor Experts. The State Secretary urged the importance of having a class in every society. Surely, they are needed, and the best way to get them is to send some one from your society to General Conference where, let us pray, a large class of leaders will complete the course. It involves a small effort for your society or those who go but both will be abundantly repaid.

KENTUCKY MISSION NOTES

Krypton Bell Calls to Prayer

Brother Cook writes: "For several weeks I have had this on foot, the ringing of our church bell at six o'clock as a call to prayer for three definite things, (1) An outpouring of the Holy Spirit in this community, (2) that God will bless our government and nation, and (3) for world-wide peace."

Teacher and Matron

Brother Mullins has been drafted and will have to go soon in obedience to the call of his country. He has been teaching at Lost Creek. Brother Akens who is now teaching at Krypton is willing to take the place of Brother Mullins at Lost Creek, if a young lady can be secured for his place at Krypton. Send us word at once if you will take this place. No one has responded to the call for matron and the need is pressing. Who will go?

Evangelist Thomas at Krypton

Word from Brother Cook is as follows: "Meetings are fine. Have had seventeen confessions to date. Look for several more."

The Year

Conference is almost here and another year's mission work is drawing to a close. The pledges that are unpaid must be paid at once in order that the year may be closed "free of debt."

The Future

Every organization that wants to have a part in the Kentucky mission work the coming year should decide on the amount to be given and then authorize someone to present the pledge at the Kentucky session on Thursday evening of the Winona Lake Conference, when Brother Beachler will ask for "The Stuff Sufficient."

About fifty pledges remain unpaid at this writing. These must be paid if we are to close the conference year "free of debt." This is the fourteenth year of our mission work among the hills of Kentucky and every year thus far has ben closed "free of debt." This notice ought to be sufficient to bring the cash by return mail. Do it now.

News From the Field

Rio Cuarto, Argentina.

We are now in midwinter in Argentina and although the weather is much like October in Kansas, yet there are evenings when it is not any too comfortable to sit in houses without fire. Our congregations are affected a little, but not much by the weather. The people sit with their wraps on. We have a stove but only use it when absolutely necessary. Wood costs about $13 a ton here.

Since the visit of the Bible coach here Brother Bock and Brother Barrio have been doing considerable canvassing from house to house and have placed Bibles in many homes. Some new people are interested and some have professed conversion, while several who have been attending for several years have desired baptism.

We have received from the Bible House of Los Angeles 120 Testaments besides a number of gospels. We are making good use of these and wish to express our thanks to Sister Wimer, of Topeka, Kansas, whose generous gift of $20 to the Bible House made this grant of Testaments possible. We get our best tracts and literature from this place and brethren wishing to help us with literature will do well to remember the Bible House with their gifts.

We have also received a draft of $100 from Sister Woodhead, of Lawrence, Kansas, to be credited to the church at McLouth which we will use in printing some tracts of our own which we are preparing and for which this help comes as of the Lord.

At this point I wish to humbly beg pardon of Brother Porte and the Dallas Center church for an unintenional omission in my report of the churches visited to mention Dallas Center. As a matter of fact I enjoyed one of the best receptions here and the offering was $23.50, not the least by any means. Owing to circumstances over which I had no control my visits with the churches had to be extremely brief and that at Dallas Center was one of the briefest of all, yet one of the most pleasant.

We are planning for some special meetings here in July closing with Decision Day in the Sunday school.

I will add a translation of a report written by Brother Barrio of his work with us since March.

C. F. YODER.

To the Editor of the Evangelist,

Dear Brother:—This is the first time I am sending any report of my activities in our church in Argentina and I hope that this will be of some interest to the readers of the Evangelist.

After having been busy for some weeks with the propaganda of the gospel in connection with the dedication of our new hall in Pueblo Alberdi, a suburb of Rio Cuarto, I had the privilege of visiting the Gaychet family who live near Las Acequias, about thirty miles from Rio Cuarto. I went with my wife and we spent four days there during which time we held meetings with good attendance. All were very much interested and the believers had prayed for these meetings. Their prayers were answered, for God saved there a young man who had been an enemy of the gospel and a grief to the family. It was a great joy to all to see this man seeking salvation. We taught them some hymns and choruses which they learned readily and it was a joy to hear in the mornings this young man and the workmen singing as they hitched up their horses and went to their work. Several of the workmen were awakened. One promised to accept Christ and another bought a Bible and asked this young convert to teach him to read that he might follow the teachings of the Bible. To God be the glory. We left everybody happy in that place. God grant that all may remain faithful.

In regard to our work in Pueblo Alberdi, I can also say that God is working to awaken many from the lethargy of sin. Several have already manifested their sympathy with the cause of the gospel, and though this is not all yet it gives us encouragement to go on with the propaganda.

We must contend here with two enemies, fanaticism and indifference. I believe that the latter is the worse. But some are interested and two are converted. Our Sunday shool is well attended and we hope for rich fruit from it.

I hope to send other notices another time.

JUAN BARRIO.

Rio Cuarto, June 20, 1918.

Ardmore, Indiana.

May we have just a little space in the Evangelist to let the brotherhood know that we will soon have a new church at Ardmore Heights near South Bend. The building is almost completed and we are planning to hold a week's meeting beginning August 19. Dr. W. D. Furry has very graciously consented to preach for us during that week and on August 25 he will dedicate the church.

The Brethren at Ardmore became active several months ago through the efforts of brother M. V. Garrison. Brother A. E. Thomas held a successful meeting later, and then an organization was effected by brother A. T. Wirick. The building itself was made possible through the generous and loyal spirit of brother David Augustine who gave the organization the privilege of tearing down the old Fairview church building which had been closed for seven years, and of using the material in the new building.

We have some good, loyal workers at Ardmore and nearly all the Brethren who formerly attended Fairview will be with us. Brother G. W. Rench, of the South Bend church has very kindly given us a guiding hand in the work here and his fatherly advice has been a great help to us.

We are planning on a great meeting during the week that Dr. Furry will be with us. For several years he was our pastor at Fairview and when he comes to us on the 19 he will be greeted by many of his former friends and helpers.

We wish to invite through the Evangelist the brethren of neighboring churches to attend these special meetings and also the dedicatory services on August 25.

We will be glad to give you a report of the meeting at a later date.

A. G. CARPENTER.

R. D. 3, South Bend, Ind.

Bowman At Sergeantsville.

I am here in Sergeantsville delivering some lectures upon the Prophecies.

Sunday morning I preached upon the subject, "The Second Personal Coming of Christ An Essential Truth for the Christian Life." Last night, "The Present War In Prophecy." Tonight, "Armageddon and the Last Antichrist." Tomorrow night, "Twenty Prophetic Signs Preceding the Second Coming of Christ." We are having good crowds and an excellent interest. Brother Sands seems to be the right man here and is giving good service.

The Whole Gospel Mission voted me two months' vacation. A unanimous vote. I asked for one month and they gave me two. I receive the same salary I did five years ago and it takes about twice as much to live as it did then and they, not being able to raise my salary, gave me this vacation and I am spending most of the week days trucking in Jersey.

Last year I did the same and yet did as good pulpit work as when I remained home and averaged more than one visit a day and it was too hard on me physically. Hence this year they gave me a vacation, the first I ever had in my life. The local preachers pledged themselves to do all that they can to push the work on and to work in unity and they are doing splendidly.

Brothers Ray, Tressler and Bowers divide the work equally and freely without any cost to me or the mission. They are giving some splendid sermons and are holding the congregation as well as could be expected for the summer.

I have been preaching every two weeks at night at Tenth street below Dauphin. They have had no pastor since Brother Epley resigned, but they will have one immediately after General Conference.

Tenth and Dauphin seems to be keeping up well for having no pastor. In the Whole Gospel Mission Brother Bowers preached a great sermon, so all said, last Sunday night and had two confessions. We feel that when the summer slump is over our work will go better than it has for some years.

The finances of our work have been our greatest trouble. Three months during the summer the work always goes back more or less, then my going away about three months in evangelistic work to even up finances has been a hindrance; but since we have three able local preachers who are willing to stick to the work and help to build it up if they will remain with us and continue to push the work as they are now, I think this fall and winter we will be able to put this work financially upon its feet, and if so, there will be no trouble then to make forward strides in all the departments of the church.

I hope to go to General Conference this year, but after the church giving me two months' vacation they will be unable to pay my way, but the Lord is opening up the way and I will be so happy to see my brethren in conference again after being absent for several years. Pray for us and our work.

Travel Notes

On the second day of June the battle was launched at Whittier, California, in the First Brethren church against Satan. Brother A. V. Kimmel and people were in most excellent trim for the fight and in his great name we marched out on the battle fields to win, and we won in the faith and power of our great God. To him we strive to give all honor and glory.

A more willing band of workers I have never met than at Whittier. Nothing too little and nothing too big for the Whittier people to undertake for their Lord and Master.

A. V. Kimmel is the shepherd of these good people. His Godly life, his cheerful disposition, his sincere activity as preacher and pastor, and his deep interest in the welfare of his flock are some of the characteristics that have won their hearts. Brother Kimmel's judgment was very sound in launching a Brethren church at Whittier, in fact, he is a natural born organizer and builder and a preacher with business qualities. The work in southern California which God has enabled him to do is the manifestation of his efficiency.

The revival has been reported and has gone down on the pages of history in the past, but never will the writer and the wife forget the kindness of Brother Kimmel, wife and people. May the blessings of the triune God be theirs forever is my prayer.

Los Angeles, California

This was our next battling ground in the Compton church with J. C. Beal and co-workers. Brother Beal has an exceedingly hard field but he and his band of trained workers have labored very hard to get the field in good condition for the sickle and from the dawn of day until the blue vaulted sky could be seen all aglow with star light, he and those faithful ones worked with us. "He that winneth souls is wise." And another beautiful promise, "They that turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars forever and ever," brought high courage into our souls and unhesitatingly we yoked up with our Master in the work and to be sure, working with him we expected to win and did in his great name. No battle is too hard to be fought in the strength of our unfailing friend and our coming King of glory, Jesus.

Brother Beal is another unselfish minister and a man of God. It is always a great pleasure to work with such men of God. Brother Beal has passed through some deep water and through the fire since the writer helped him in a battle at Sunnyside, but I state a truth when I say he is brighter and deeper in love with Jesus and has a greater love for the home of the soul. What a beautiful thought that some sweet day after the toils of life are over that we can go home to be with him we love and with our loved ones who have gone on before where an endless day of pure delight rolls on in its splendor and where the shadows of night never fall on a peaceful redeemed soul, redeemed through Jesus' precious blood. Won't that be glory?

While at Compton church we had our home with Sister Mary Trapp. It was indeed a splendid home and we were most graciously cared for in every way. We shall not forget the courtesies in her home and in the many others in which we entered to enjoy fellowship and their hospitality. May the sunshine of God's love ever beam in the souls of the pastor and people and may they be kept in perfect peace until Jesus calls "Come home."

Long Beach, California.

While in Spokane, Washington, the writer received an invitation from Brother Kimmel, moderator of the Southern California conference to attend the conference which convened at Long Beach and to assist in the good work. We began to plan to do so and at the close of the meeting with Brother Beal we joined the brethren in a ten days' conference at Long Beach which was a feast of good things long to be remembered. Many were the guests of the Long Beach people, but they were prepared to take care of them which they did most cheerfully. The Long Beach church is not a myth but a reality. God has in no uncertain way blessed L. S. Bauman and his heroic workers. The church is looked upon as a power house and a light house by the people of Long Beach.

Notwithstanding the writer has attended some mighty great religious conferences, I never attended one where such a sweet spirit of unselfish love prevailed in the hearts of the people.

The climax of the conference came on Monday evening as it closed with the largest love feast the writer has ever attended, when six Brethren churches were represented all in one place with one accord. It seemed that heaven had come down to greet our souls. We felt like St. Peter we wanted to remain on the mountain of love and light. God has his hand upon the work in southern California. He has called some men like Aaron and Hur to hold up the hands of Brothers Kimmel, Bauman and others. Brothers N. C. Nielsen and H. V. Wall are giants in planning and starting new churches. They not only have a vision of the work in their home church but other places and they not only give their money but themselves as well. Wife and I stayed in Brother Neilsen's home during conference and although a business man, yet the church and the work of God was the chief talk in the home. They have Jesus as their partner in business just as every one should have.

While writing these words we are in the home of Brother and Sister Shively. We are here resting for a week before starting back east and it is an ideal place to rest. The front of the house faces one of the most beautiful parks in Los Angeles—in fact their front lawn runs out into the park shaded with pepper, black acasia and palm trees. I said the other day to Sister Shively, "A home like yours would tempt one to stay here for ever." She quickly replied, "I am ready to turn my back on this home any minute to be with him in the homeland of the soul." Thank God, the mansions over there and heaven's great parks will appear throughout all eternity in undying perfection and beauty while these are fading away.

When these lines reach the readers of our Evangelist we will be on our way back east. We expect to tour back with Brother and Sister Platt in their auto, leaving here Tuesday, August 6, if God permits. As we congregate together at Winona Lake as a big family to attend together another conference, may love, peace and harmony prevail from beginning to the end and if all meet in the spirit of prayer this will be realized.

I close thanking the many ones for their prayers in our behalf, begging their continued interests, I remain, your brother in the faith.

N. W. JENNINGS.

Garwin, Indiana

Perhaps a few words from this congregation as a partial summary of the year's work will not be out of place. First there is a correction we desire to make in announcing the Easter offering from this place in the Brethren Missionary columns of the July number. Garwin is entitled to a star for having reached the goal set, and in common terms of the day "Went over the top" with the Easter offering. We were not given credit for the eight dollars and seventy-eight cents given to Brother Yoder the third of December while here. The offering Easter day was announced correctly, but the other offering was not credited to us for some reason. In behalf of the congregation I make this correction. We might add that we had the first contribution in mind, and if it had been necessary to have gone over the goal set without that, we would have done so.

As we look back over the year as it draws to a close it seems of short duration. Being busy at all times, the passing of time goes unnoticed. The year has been good, while, we are always able to look ahead and see something to do, we are encouraged by what has been done.

Financialy, this was the first year of the budget system, a larger budget was made than any amount set in past times. Even though it was necessary to raise more money than during any previous year we are coming out ahead for the year. I have been told by some that the finances were also easier raised. We have reached a number of goals of the "Four-Year Program," and have contributed some two hundred dollars to the work of the church at large. At the final business meeting held the last day of July we were given a unanimous call to labor with these people during the coming year. Even though the year does not close until the first of September, the budget was mad out for the coming year and a large amount subscribed for the work of the new year. Plans have been completed for our meeting this fall. Brother Coleman and singer are to hold the meeting commencing the second Sunday of October.

Our attendance for services has been extra good in the morning and also good in the evening. Our evening crowds are smaller. A number of our young men have been called and before the month shall have passed we will be entitled to 15 stars in our service flag. We are sorry to lose so many of our workers but we would not keep them from their duty. We are looking forward to the work of the new year, and desire the interest of the brotherhood in order that much may be accomplished for the kingdom.

FREEMAN ANKRUM.

"Over the Top" for Washington, D. C.

Brother Edwin Boardman, Jr., writes: "Enclosed please find $10 to help burn the Washington, D. C. mortgage. Might as well pay this now for I believe the mortgage will burn. This may help to start the blaze. I send the money instead of the pledge card." We are not asking for the cash, only pledges, but we appreciate Brother Boardman's faith in this worthy project.

Word just came from Brother Stuckman of Falls City, Nebraska, saying: "Put Falls City down for $50. We are autoing through to Winona." Let every Brethren church follow the example of Falls City and the $2500 mortgage will burn quickly.

The First Brethren Church of Washington, D. C. has shouldered $1,000 of the indebtedness and Brother Lyon states in a letter just received, "I asked each member of the church to pray over this and then to make a free will offering and not wait to be solicited. Several have reported to the pastor, one a lady of very moderate circumstances reported with a pledge of $25. This morning a young couple with very modest income, and two children to support, and buying a home, came and placed $50 in cash into my hands to be aplied on the church debt. It is needless to say they are tithers. And so day by day I am loking for my people to report voluntarily until the $1000 is made up. It seems a real pleasure for most of the people in the little church in D. C. to give to the Lord's work."

The many friends of the Washington church and all the churches of the brotherhood are hereby asked to send us voluntary pledges. Let us hurry up and beat the Washington church to the goal. They are after $1,000 and we are after $1,500. Send your pledge now.

The fund at present is as follows:

Previously reported	$175 57
Jacob Cassel, Lansdale, Pa.	5 00
Mr. and Mrs. H. B. Lehman, Glendale, Ariz.	25 00

Pray about this and send your pledge at once. Let every pastor give his church an opportunity to help. Your Mission Board is anxious to unload this mortgage and thus stop paying out good mission money for interest.

ANNUAL BRETHREN BIBLE CONFERENCE, Long Beach, California
Monday Afternoon Session
July 22, 1918

This session was opened by singing "I am a Sinner Saved by Grace," followed by prayer by Alan Pearce. Prof. Stout and Miss Leila Neher then sang a duet, "When I Shall See Him Face to Face," the congregation joining on the chorus. Brother Stout then sang "The Holy City."

P. B. Fitzwater, D. D. of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago delivered the second of his series on the incarnation, "The Incarnation in Time," or "The Virgin Birth of Christ."

1. The act of the incarnation. Luke 1: 35.

2. The fact of the Incarnation. 1 Tim. 1: 15; John 1: 14.

3. The purpose of the incarnation. John 1: 18; Acts 17: 27; Job. 23: 3; Heb. 2: 16; Rom. 8: 19-22.

The birth of Christ was not the origin of his personality, but its entrance upon the condition of human life.

The only one who could choose his mother chose one in the middle strata of society, nearest to the rich and nearest to the poor.

The human nature of Christ was created by the Holy Spirit. See Matt. 1: 18, 20.

He was a real man because he was born of a woman; he was sinless because he was conceived by the Holy Spirit. He did not cease to be God when he created for himself a human nature, neither does he cease to be what he became. From henceforth he shall be known as the God-man. He reveals the father and bridges the chasm between God and man.

Following the address Brother Stout sang "A Ship was Tossed in the Midst of the Sea," based on the incident when Jesus stilled the storm. All then joined in singing "True Hearted, Whole Hearted, Faithful and Loyal."

J. C. Beal, pastor at Compton Avenue, Los Angeles addressed the conference on "Tithing; God's Method of Financing Christian Activities."

It is not conceivable that God would establish a church with all other things furnished perfectly and have no financial plan. It was taught in Old Testament times and endorsed by Jesus and the apostles. It did not originate with the Jewish law as shown by the story of Moses and Melchizedek. 1 Cor. 16: 2 proves the principle. A man who is under grace should not give less than the one who lived under the law. We must realize that we are stewards, that we are not using our money and goods but God's. Results show that it results in a deepening and quickening of the spiritual life of the church.

Monday, 7:30 P. M.

All joined in singing several familiar gospel songs. Prayer was offered by R. E. Darling, pastor at Turlock, California. Brother Stout sang, "When You Stand Among the Faithful You May Tell Them You Saw Me in His Army."

After announcements and an offering for conference expenses the choir sang "Answer 'Yes' When He Calls." Evangelist N. W. Jennings preached the sermon, subject, "The Power of Purpose." Dan. 1:8.

Our brother gave a word-picture of the City of Babylon and of the prophet Daniel, and showed how by his purpose and strength of character he was faithful to the true God which resulted in Daniel's exaltation and success, to deliverance from enemies and the final proclamation of the king that Daniel's God should be worshiped. The lesson is that through heart purpose and faith in Jesus we can conquer a sinful world and at last enter triumphantly the Eternal City whose walls cannot be battered down as were those of Babylon.

Tuesday, 9:30 A. M.

After the singing of a song by the audience, a solo by Brother Stout and devotions, the first mesasge of the day was given by Thos. H. Broad, pastor at La Verne, subject, "The Christ of the New Testament Seen in the Song Book of the Old Testament." Luke 24: 44.

Of 75 quotations from the Psalms in the New Testament more than 50 of them refer to Christ. Almost every phase of the life of Christ is shown in the Psalms. Note particularly Ps. 22; Ps. 84, Ps. 91 and Ps. 119: 154.

Brother Stout sang some scriptures set to music entitled, "Ye Have Done it Unto Me."

After a brief recess all united in singing "I Believe On the Son of God."

Next was the third in the series by Brother P. B. Fitzwater on the incarnation, "The Incarnation Tested," or "The Temptation in the Wilderness."

1. The purpose of—

(a) Negatively. Not a preparation for his work. Not to see if he would stand fast. To say that failure was possible would show that God's plan of redemption was contingent, unsettled until after the temptation, and render God guilty of setting up redemption on the basis of a possible overthrow.

(b) Positively. To demostrate the supreme fact that no sin was in him, and that failure was impossible, and on him we could rest our faith with unshaking confidence.

2. The method of—

(a) Attacked as son of God; as to whether he was divine.

(c) Attacked as Messiah; Satan tries to get him to adopt his methods, thus obviating the necessity of the cross.

3. The issue of—

(a) Satan vanquished.

(b) Reality of the incarnation demonstrated.

Tuesday, 2 P. M.

All Joined in the song "Jesus I Come to Thee," after which Brother Stout sang "Well I Remember the Old Gothic Church."

R. E. Darling, pastor at Turlock gave the first of a series of addresses on prayer, "Why We Should Pray." "Pray" or "prayer" occurs in the Bible 360 times.

Not so much more preaching needed as more prayer. On the Divine side prayer is commanded. Matt. 6: 6; Phil. 4: 6; Lu. 11: 9; Lu. 18: 1, etc. It acquaints us with God. It purifies us. It glorifies God. On the human side it is the natural longing of the soul. Job 23: 3-5. It is the life of the soul. Lu. 18: 1; 1 Thess. 5: 17. It brings peace to the soul. Jno 16: 24, "That your joy may be full."

After a five-minute recess the audience sang "The Name of Jesus is So Sweet."

Elder J. P. Dickey of La Verne College (Church of the Brethren) gave his first study on I Peter. After giving a vivid word picture of the author and his characteristics, he disclosed Peter's teaching on sanctification, "which is the leading of the Spirit." When we do the things well pleasing to God. Note the following phrase, "Unto obedience and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus." Resulting finally in an "inheritance incorruptible, undefiled and that fadeth not away." "Reserved in heaven for you." (1 Pet. 1: 4). When you have a reserved seat, it waits for you, and you do not worry about it. "Who are kept," does not depend on your achievements. God keeps you through faith. (v. 5).

Chairman A. V. Kimmell urged a careful study of the Bible by books, made the necessary announcements and closed the session with prayer.

Tuesday, 7:30 P. M|

All sang "If Jesus Goes With Me, I'll Go" and "I Walk With the King." Prayer was offered by J. C. Beal. All heartily sang "Brighten the Corner." Prof. Stout then sang, "I Shall Be No Stranger There."

After another song by the audience "The Name of Jesus is So Sweet," the Fillmore Mission church was presented by L. S. Bauman. He gave an extended account of the starting of the work at Fillmore, Ventura County, a town of 2500 people, 65 miles northwest of the City of Los Angeles, where a four weeks' tent meeting had been held during the month of May and where Elder Sylvester Lowman had been placed in charge by the District Mission Board. Neatly printed $25.00 "bonds" were distributed among the people who were urged to assist in raising money for a church building, the two lots in a central location, having been already secured. These "bonds" are made payable at the rate of $1.00 a month. A litle more than 1000.00 in pledges and cash were given in this offering.

After the regular offering for the evening and a song by Prof. Stout, the regular address of the evening was delivered by Dr. P. B. Fitzwater from Heb. 4: 15, the fourth in the series on the incarnation, "The Moral Glory of the Incarnation," or "The Sinlessness of Christ."

The doctrine of Virgin Birth and sinlessness of Christ go together. When God embodied himself he did not lose personality Since he is incorruptible, bearing the sins of the world did not contaminate him. He never offered sacrifice. He never prayed for forgiveness for himself, though he did for others. (Lu. 23: 34). He openly challenged all to convict him of sin.

2 Cor. 5: 21 "Knew no sin." Heb. 7: 26. "Holy," "Guileless," "Undefiled." Heb. 9: 14. "Offered himself without spot to God." 1 John 3: 5. "In Him is no sin." Judas even said, "I have betrayed innocent blood."

A song, "Nearer, Still Nearer," and prayer by L. S. Bauman, closed the last session of the day. A deep spiritual feeling pervaded the Conference as all separated for the night.

Wednesday, 9:30 A. M.

All joined in singing "Higher Ground." Elder Trostle, pastor of the Pasadena Church of the Brethren lead in prayer. Prof. Stout sang "The Heart that was Broken for Me."

J. P. Dickey of La Verne College gave his second address on "Studies in I Peter." He spoke of the great cost of our redemption, even the precious blood "as of a Lamb without spot," and this is one reason (great cost) why we should live the Christian Life. Giving this "precious blood" was not a matter of caprice, but was a well thought out beforehand eternal plan. The old idea of God (He that terrifies) was compared with the Christian conception of God (He that loves), so that he that scares became he that loves.

After singing "The Better Land" by the audience and a song by Prof. Stout "I am Serving the Lord in My Weak Way" and announcements by Brother Kimmell, a recess of five minutes was given.

R. E. Darling, pastor at Turlock gave an address on "What Are Some Helps to Acceptable Prayer?"

First, posture was considered as a help, and the different postures in prayer were presented.

Fasting is a help. Examples Acts 14: 23. Acts 13: 1-3, Mt. 17: 19-21.

The attitude of the soul. (1) Persistency. (2) Fervency. (3) Definiteness.

Submissiveness, or, subject to his will, a help. Examples, Matt. 26: 42 and 2 Cor. 12: 13. How know his will. (1) Read his word.

(2) Pray to know it. Jas. 1: 15. For our prayers to be acceptable—

(1) We must have faith. Matt. 11: 11-24.

(2) We must be obedient. John 13: 14.

(3) We must be pure. Tim 4: 8.

(4) We must be sincere. Ps. 17: 1.

(5) We must be humble. Ps. 10: 17 and

(6) We must abide in him. John 15: 7.

The best point, perhaps, in the discussion, was brought out in answer to the question, "What is the purpose of prayer?"

Answer: "To glorify God."

Wednesday, 2 P. M.

After all had joined in singing several familiar gospel songs, Prof. Stout sang a touching selection, "Descriptive of the death of P. P. Bliss." In that connection he related the account of the tragic death some years ago of Mr. and Mrs. Bliss when the bridge at Ashtabula, Ohio, went down and the train fell into the river.

Dr. Fitzwater gave the fifth address of the series on the incarnation, "The Unveiling of the Incarnation," or "The Transfiguration of Christ."

See Matt. 17: 1-21 and Mark 9: 1-29.

(1) The occasion.

(2) The person. His Deity flashed forth. (1 Pet. 1:16-18).

(3) His character. Declared to be the beloved son in whom God is well pleased.

(4) His mission. Luke 9: 31. The supreme purpose of the incarnation was in order to die. His death was not accidental.

(5) His position. 2 Pet. 1: 16-18.

(6) Purpose, "Before them." The disciples needed such a vision.

The conference was then given a recess of five minutes for relaxation.

After singing "Where He Leads Me," Elder E. M. Cobb delivered his address entitled, "The Land of the Fig Tree Sign." This is a fine discussion of the land of Palestine as the promised home of the Children of Israel. It is published in neat form by the Bible Institute of Los Angeles at 5c a copy or 50c a dozen.

The session was closed by a brief prayer by Dr. H. S. Dowling, Superintendent of the Bible School of the Church of the Open Door of Los Angeles.

Our Dead

BALL—Mrs. Jessie Asquith Ball was born near Hudson, Iowa, but moved with her parents to Waterloo when yet a young girl. After attendance at the local high school and business college she taught school for 3 years. In 1890 she was married to Melvin O. Ball, from which union there are three children: Robert, Harold and Elsie, all of whom are members of the Waterloo congregation. At the age of 40 she departed this life on April 27, 1918. She was a highly respected member of the Waterloo congregation, a noble mother and Christian. She suffered greatly but patiently, from asthma, before her death. The funeral was conducted from her home by her pastor,

H. L. GOUGHNOUR.

MOCK—Robert Kenneth, the only child of Robert and Mary Mock of Roaring Springs, Pennsylvania died February 13, 1918, aged eight months. Funeral service by Rev. Berkey of the Lutheran church, assisted by the writer.

POWELL—Mrs. Edna Powell, of Altoona, Pennsylvania, passed to her reward March 18, 1918, at the age of 22 years and 8 months. Sister Powell had been for a number of years a member of the Brethren church. She is survived by her husband and two children. Funeral service by the writer.

FISSELL—Neal R. Fissell died March 24, 1918 in his fourteenth year. Brother Neal was one of the promising boys of the Altoona church and Sunday school. We miss him much. He is survived by father and two sisters. Funeral services by the writer, assisted by Rev. VanOrmer of the Lutheran church.

MOORE—Martin Moore, of Altoona Pennsylvania, died June 14, 1918, at the age of seventy years. He was a member of the Lutheran church, and is survived by wife and ten children. Funeral services by the writer, assisted by Rev. G. F. Snider of the Lutheran church.

MERRITTS—C. A. Merritts, of Altoona, Pennsylvania, died July 16, 1918, aged 69 years. He was for three years a member of the Church of the Brethren. He is survived by a son and two daughters. Funeral services by the writer.

May the Lord comfort the friends of these departed ones.

W. C. SENSHOFF.

SAYLOR—Mrs. J. M. Saylor, a highly respected charter member of the Waterloo congregation, passed peacefully to her eternal home on June 24, 1918. She was born in Somerset County, Pennsylvania, being a daughter of Daniel Buechley. At the age of 25 years she moved with her husband, who still survives her, to Black Hawk county, Iowa, near Waterloo. After 30 years on the farm they retired and moved into Waterloo.

A daughter, Mrs. W. D. Schrock, and a son, Daniel Saylor, both members of the Waterloo congregation, also mourn her loss.

Sister Saylor was more than 81 years of age. For several years she has been confined to her home with rheumatism, which, in her hand developed into tuberculosis of the bones. She was a patient sufferer, a beloved neighbor and friend. The funeral at which Miss Etta Lichty, our church visitor, sang hymns which she had often used when visiting her, was conducted from the home by her pastor.

H. L. GOUGHNOUR.

COOK—Miss Eva May Cook, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Thyucus Cook of Elkart County, Indiana, departed this life July 14, aged 23 years, 3 months and 2 days. Miss Cook was a member of the First Brethren church of Elkhart in which she lived a devoted and consistent Christian life. May God richly bless the parents, brothers and sisters in this their loss of a daughter and sister in bright young womanhood of life.

Funeral at the home of the writer, assisted by Elder Krider of the Elkhart Valley Church of the Brethren.

ENTERTAINMENT AT WINONA

The Inn offers to entertain our people at the rate of one dollar per day, two in a room. The meals are prepared and served after the home-cooking plan. While the Inn lacks certain accommodations we may experience certain advantages, both immediate and remote, by cotinuing to make it our headquarters.

Those who desire better accommodations as to rooms and equipment will find these at the Winona Hotel. Mrs. Compstock, who was at the Inn last year is in charge here, and offers to entertain our people at the rate of a dollar and a half per day, two in a room.

While the rates at the several cottages may vary slightly most of them are entertaining at about one dollar per day.

These unexpected low rates should be an attraction to our people who were being deterred in their plan to attend Conference on account of the increased expense. Seeing that you can live at Winona about as economically as at home, make an effort to share with us in General Conference over August 26th to September 2nd.

and its unassimilated conditions. The help rendered must be fitted to the community. In scarcely any instances is the community, unaided, able to cope successfully with the sudden problems thrust upon it. These are problems vitally related to war production and labor turnovers and to national welfare.

In addition to communities which contain large populations the Committee proposes also to do all that seems possible, through regular church agencies, in sustaining the rural morale, recognizing that agriculture and all the homely arts of peaceful industry, must, in times of national peril, be placed in the category of practical righteousness.

The central office of the committee is at 105 East 22d Street, New York City, where its officers may be addressed.

How Can the Church Be Patriotic?

We have ceased to think of the church and state as antagonistic institutions, fidelity to one of which unfits us for service to the other, if we ever had such views. Both are essential to the well-being and progress of mankind and the work of each is necessary to the fulfillment of the mission of the other. Mutual recognition of the other's rights and claims and mutual cooperation is the only path that leads to mutual success. The state should be the strong right arm and protector of the church and the church should be the inspirer and purifier of the state. In view of this, what ought the church do or what can the church do best to help the state in this hour of her travail? Or, how can the church be patriotic?

Some churches buy Liberty Bonds and War Savings Stamps in an effort to show their patriotism. While the buying of bonds is a perfectly legitimate thing to do in itself, yet two considerations make it questionable in my mind if that is the proper patriotism for the church to show. First, it is difficult to find the church that is really alive to its spiritual responsibilities that has any money to loan; it is hard to secure funds enough to prosecute its own distinctive work, a work that looms up with increasing bigness and urgency under the stress of the times. And second, the government never has asked and does not expect from the church financial support.

Some churches try to show their patriotism by their support of the Red Cross and the Y. M. C. A., and I believe it is right for all churches to do this. Here is an opportunity for the churches of America to bind up the wounds of those who have fallen among thieves, and to render them every needed aid possible. It should give of its funds and cooperate in every way possible with these organizations, so long as it does not have to become a party to gambling devices and unchristian revelries to do so. But after all, this is not the church's supreme opportunity of helping the state in its time of stress.

The state needs the spiritual work of the church now as never before. The church in order to exemplify the truest patriotism possible must show herself the most efficient possible in her own recognized field of endeavor. To a group of ministers offering their services to the government and enquiring how best they could serve it, President Wilson said in effect, "Go back home, work your task hard and bring your chuches up to the highest possible efficeincy." There is need of character building, soul saving and evangelization during war times as much or more than any time. And men need the steadying influence of religion very sorely. He who is not held steady by a religious anchorage is in danger of being wrecked on the rocks of bitter skepticism. A strong faith in the benevolence and final victory of God, our heavenly Father's plans and purposes, in the abundant grace and saving power of Jesus Christ and in the ever-present, upholding, comforting power of the Holy Spirit is the only sure safeguard of the individual and consequently the nation in the time of terrible disaster and suffering.

The church can show her patriotism by combating the propaganda of pessimism that is being so vigoously prosecuted in many quarters. I refer particularly to the theological pessimists who say that the devil has gotten the upper hand of God in the world; that men are growing continually worse; that the church is failing and soon all will be turned over to the devil to work out his good pleasure. They talk mysteriously about these being "the last days" and tell us that such things are what we can expect in "the last days." Oh, say not "These are the last days." They are the first days—still the first days of God's growing kingdom. And let us pray that under divine guidance we may do what we can to make them the first days of the new era of human rights and brotherhood, of international confidence and permanent world peace. And God is not defeated in his plans and purposes. He is working them out in his own way. He can not ge defeated; things are not going to the bow-wows; the world will not end in a smash-up. If God seems long in bringing his plans to completion, just remember that he waits the cooperation of time and man. His days are long, long days and man is slow and late.

The church can be truly patriotic by endeavoring to counteract the tendency to hatred in these days. As we contemplate the brutal and cruel war metohds of Germany there is danger that we shall allow anger to flame out and hatred to burn in our hearts. But that won't help the cause of the Allies nor make us truly patriots. It will simply bring us to the German level, for they are cultivating that spirit. It is almost unbelievable that such words of hatred and self-conceit could come from this age as those utterances of German pastors, editors, professors and officers collected in "Hurrah and Hallelujah," by Dr. Bangs, of Denmark. Because they teach hatred shall we do so? Remember, hatred hurts the hater more than the hated. It will make us less efficient and less worthy to prosecute our cause. We can not be the highest type of patriots and harbor hatred in our hearts. The instuctions sent out to the twenty thousand "Four- Minute Men" by the Committee on Public Information of Washington, warn the speakers not to indulge in hatred in their speeches. The administration wants no "Hymns of Hate," in America. "The Bulletin" says: "Hatred many say, is an emotion necessary for war. The soldier, they say cannot fight unless he hates. Let them ask the soldier; let them talk to the veteran who has given and received wounds, and they will find that the greater hatred is among civilians. Passivity makes for an emotion of hatred; a busy man thinks mostly of his job. Furthermore, the characteristic of good fighters is that they are 'good sports.' They know the other men are ordered to fight as they are ordered, and the best soldiers are often those who thoroughly respect their foe. * * * Preparing ourselves to pour out the life blood of the nation on behalf of ideals, we must not besmirch the ideals by the vulgar methods to which the war lords for centuries have resorted." That is the government's attitude and the church's should be even higher. As Christian leaders and as churches we should not only seek to discourage hatred in others and refuse to tolerate it in our own hearts, but should encourage and practice prayer for those whom we may be inclined to hate. Thus may we be both Christians and patriots.

Again, the church can be patriotic by planning big for the advancement of Christ's kingdom, the dissemination of Christian ideals and the spiritual welfare of the boys who shall return when the war is over. We must cease our small, mean, half-hearted, selfish way of doing things for God and men. We give so niggardly; we work so lazily; we pray so feebly; and we plan so childishly. We talk of sacrifice, but we know not what it means. We can see sacrifice in Europe, but the church of America has not yet experienced it. And our little Brethren church has even been hesitant about entering her Gethsemane. It will require sacrifice to plan big things and do them in a big way. But let us neither expect nor hope to avoid it. Let us take up the cross and carry it even to the place of sacrifice, that when the state has made the world safe for democracy, the church may have made democracy safe for the world. The church is the only institution that can save democracy when it has once won the victory from becoming as pernicious and degraded as autocracy itself. To save it we must Christianize it, and to Christianize it we must plan big enough to meet the needs of all its constituents. Let us have great plans and a great working of our plans.

G. S. BAER.

From the Editor's View-Point

The Powers that Be

When the Apostle admonished the early Chrsitians to "be subject unto the powers that be," he undoubtedly had reference to legal and recognized authority. With the small number of professed Christians that then made up the church and with the attitude of the world toward the followers of Christ there could be no other course open to them. They would not revolutionize society or the state of which they were then a very infinitesimal part, but by their consistent conduct and their faithful manner of life they could influence society in a manner that it had never known before.

For the early Christians to set themselves against the government of their day or for them to refuse to recognize the authority of the Roman government would be nothing less than to bring down upon them the wrath of the "powers" at once that later came upon them under such rulers and emperors as Nero, so the admonition of the Apostle urging them to submit to the government of the day was all in harmony with the wisest plans for their growth and development.

However all submission is not willing submission and we would not say that it should be, but on the other hand all the powers that be in this modern world can scarcely claim to be ordained of God, though they may exist by his sufferance. There are times when it seems that the greatest powers and the greatest influences in a nation are not the regularly and legally constituted authorities, but rather powers that have been developed by men in the interests of their own selfish purposes.

The monied interests of a country sometimes become more powerful than the government itself and many people who know their duty as representatives of the people are afraid to do anything in behalf of those whom they represent.

One of the greatest forces for good in America should be the press and undoubtedly it would be, if it were free and untrammeled. But the condition of the American press was tersely stated by Senator Hiram Johnson when he said, "There is a cowed press today and you know it." The world needs freedom from such influences.

Where There Is a Will There Is a Way

While this is one of the oldest and most common sayings of the people it is very frequently overlooked and sometimes denied. We have often observed that people generally find a way to do the things they really want to do. They may not do it immediately, but if they have the persistency of a half a man or woman they keep at it until their goal is reached. But on the other hand a great many things that people should do and yet that they do not want to do are passed up with the excuse, it can't be done.

This principle is sometimes illustrated in the most common things of life, and it has been given expression by a recent writer who said, "When a woman says she can't come to lunch, it is because she doesn't want to." Can't is one of the easiest excuses one can offer but it is one of the most difficult "to get away with." It is difficult because we know and all men know that it is one of the words that has almost lost its place in a modern American dictionary. It is hardly wise any more to say anything can't be done.

When the American War Board adopted a certain model of gun carriage for large guns that is in use by one of the Allies it was found to consist of entirely too many parts, especially in the construction of the wheels, to suit the "short cut" American way, and the head of a great steel mill said we will cast these large wheels in one piece. The order was given to the production department of an Ohio steel mill, but the superintendent and head men of that department said, "It can't be done." The president of the mill said, "All right, you fellows get out, and we will put some one in charge of this department that can do it," and they did. So today the American big guns are mounted upon large one piece wheels that "couldn't be made," but they were made and they are being made every day.

It may be well enough to say, "I do not see how it can be done," but it is no longer safe to say anything "Can't be done," for where there is a will there is a way. This principle has been the making of America.

Some Strange Physicians

The science of medicine has undergone some revolutionary changes since George Washington was bled to death by the physicians in an attempt to cure him from a severe attack of pneumonia, but the changes have not yet come to an end. There is very little that a layman can say intelligently of this great profession. His chief function is to become a patient and then to pay the bill.

Two different doctors recently made statements that indicate the progress of the medical profession. Dr. H. D. Cox said, "The fewer remedies you employ in any disease, the better are your patients." And Dr. James Johnson said, "I declare as my conscientious conviction that if there were not a single physician, surgeon, midwife, chemist, apothecary, druggist or drug on the face of the earth, there would be less sickness and mortality than now prevails."

These are radical statements, especially the latter one, but we do not know anything about the standing of these two physicians, whether they are numbered among the elect of the profession or whether they are only "faddists," but we are sure that it is coming to be recognized more and more that the chief office of the physician is to teach us HOW to live and not to try to cure us when we have broken down our bodies and minds through a system of wrong living.

The old saying: "an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure," was never more true than it is today, and apparently no one knows it better than an up-to-date physician.

Society needs physicians, and it needs them badly, but there should be some way by which they could be compensated for teaching every individual how to care for the body and not to wait until sickness and death overtake one before they can receive any pay for the years and money spent in preparation for their great work. The race needs regular livers more than liver regulators.

How Victories are Won

Napoleon is reported to have said on one occasion, "God is on the side of the heaviest artillery," which is one way of saying mere physical power will win all the batles of life. There was a time when a great deal of deference was paid to the expressed opinions of Napoleon, but we doubt very much if his views are as greatly cherished now as they were a generation ago.

Since the breaking out of the European war and since the ruthless methods of warfare followed by the Huns have been put into operation on the principle that "might makes right," and that physical force and that alone can win battles between the armies of nations, we doubt very much that the opinions of these "brute force" generals and emperors are held in very high esteem.

Of course it is usually a century after a man has died before a real perspective view of his life can be had and there is always the possibility that the next generation will reverse the judgment we may have passed upon the character or life of some living man or hero; but the ideals of living men have undergone so great changes that we are willing to take our chance on some of them any way.

Just now we are willing to concede to General Foch of the Allied armies greater military foresight than Napoleon ever possessed. We believe he has a better understanding of the principles of warfare and of the influences that win or lose a battle or more particularly a war.

Recently General Foch said, "The victory always goes to those who win it by superior force of intelligence and will." Then it is not the heaviest artillery nor the biggest guns that shall win the war, but rather the more significant force of intelligence and will, both God given powers. Of course we take it for granted that superior intelligence recognizes the right of a conflict and because of this recognition in time right will win over any might that men may develop. Then after all the lowest forms of victories are won through the use of the highest powers that God has given to man, and these same high powers will give to God his rightful place in the affairs of man.

FOUR-YEAR PROGRAM PAGE

NOW THEN DO IT.—II Samuel 3:18

Conducted by Charles A. Bame

Some Reflections on the Four-Year Program

BY J. L. GILLIN

At last the church has definitely set before itself several aims. For twenty-five years we have been going along without driving any stakes toward which we endeavor to move. Clearly defined objectives are desirable by every organization. Vagueness of aim is the enemy of efficiency. Therefore, in the history of the church's life it means progress that we have definitely defined certain goals which we shall endeavor to reach.

It is better to have a goal and fail to reach it than not to have any at all. Long ago Emerson said, "Hitch your wagon to a star." By this he meant to encourage us to have our aims high.

The goals which we have set ourselves for the next two years are sufficiently high if we count height in terms of the efforts necessary to reach them. Most of the goals are worthy of the utmost endeavor. Certainly the goal to secure a substantial endowment for the College is worth while. Certainly it is commendable that we should endeavor to get the church paper into a very much greater number of our families. It is highly desirable, too, that we should have a larger number of our members at the communion service. It is also desirable that we should have an increasing percentage of our members regular contributors to the various purposes of the church. It is important, also, that the contributions of our people for missions should grow. All of these things and the others not mentioned are important goals.

I wonder, however, if in endeavoring to reach these goals we have asked ourselves the question whether the goals are ends in themselves or are they only steps by which we reach ends to be desired? Why do we wish to have forty new congregations? Why is it desirable to have the church paper go into more of the homes? Why is it important that the College should have a better endowment? What is the use of having more of our people at the communion table? Why should more money be contributed for missions? What is the end and purpose at which we are aiming in putting forth the strenuous efforts that we hear about to accomplish these things? Is it worth while simply to gather money in order that we may make a record? Is it of value that we should have a College with better endowment unless at the same time we aim at a better college? Do we desire to have the paper in 75% of our homes in order that the paper may have a greater income? Are these great efforts to increase the number of churches simply in order that we may glory in the progress that we are making as compared with other denominations? What is the purpose—the ultimate, the justifying purpose of all these efforts? What is the great ideal behind these goals that we have named in our Four-Year Program?

Let us remember that these goals are not ends in themselves. They are means whereby the great purposes of the Kingdom of God may be accomplished. If they are not, let them forever perish and may our efforts to attain them fail! If we forget in the endeavor to attain these goals that behind each of them is one great shining purpose, we shall blind our eyes to the real object for which the church exists, and fail in our real purpose. Unless the larger endowment means better teaching, a more clearly conceived mission for the College, and a greater passion to develop leadership, it will all be in vain. Unless we see behind the $100,000 or or $150,000 the outstanding fact that the reason we are struggling for that endowment is in order that there in the sacred precincts of that institution, men may be developed to be the leaders in the Kingdom of God, it would be better if our campaign failed. If we do not see clearly that the purpose of the church paper is not merely to make expenses, but to help to make our people more Christian, more in step with the march of the Infinite, and more keenly alive to the purposes of God, then it would better go into bankruptcy. What will it amount to if we succeed in our endeavor to establish forty new churches and increase the membership of the present congregatoins by a certain percentage if all we seek is numbers? Numbers are desirable, it is true, but more than numbers we desire men and women as members of the church who know and understand the purposes of the church With all our getting, let us not fail to get understanding in the Four-Year Campaign.

When we have got the college endowment, when we have the paper in 75 per cent of the families, when we have a missionary contribution of 30, 40 or 50 cents a member, when we have a larger porportion of the members at the communion table, when we have reached every one of our goals,—then our real work will have just begun. The new members must be taught the great objects of the Kingdom of God; the new churches must be manned with trained leaders; those who go to the communion table must be informed of its great purposes and learn to carry out in their lives its teaching. When we have the college endowment, then we must set ourselves the very much greater task of making the teaching which that endowment provides vital and conducing to leadership. In short, when the church shall have reached every one of these goals and the shouting of our triumph shall have died away, let us not sit down with folded hands thinking that our task is done, but let us remember that the great spiritual purposes for which the church exists must then be brought to accomplishment. That purpose cannot be stated in statistics—perhaps it cannot be adequately described in quantitative terms, but that purpose will be the only reason for the effort which we put forth to reach these goals. Let us never forget the main purpose!

The Growth of the Early Church

BY C. H. ASHMAN

To take anything or condition at the present time and go back to its origin or beginning and trace the same to its present condition is most interesting. It is interesting, indeed, to go to the source of any river and follow it to its mouth. One can hardly comprehend its growth, either in size or power. When we contrast the source of a river with its mouth, we can hardly realize the possibility of anything so seemingly insignificant, growing to be so great and powerful.

Tracing such mammoth streams as our own Mississippi, the Rhine, or Amazon, we may see examples of great things growing out of small beginnings.

All moral and social enterprises have had like beginnings. So with all great revivals, they have had their beginnings with a few of God's people, as was the origin of the great Swiss revival. Even so was the origin of our beloved Protestant church. It was conceived in the mind of one man—Martin Luther.

So the early church had its beginning on the Day of Pentecost, and as we trace it through its growth, and see it passing through and over many trials and conquests, all of which have had their influence on the church, we find it developing into the mighty institution of today. No one could have conceived of the present day church, had he stood at its origin. Jesus, however, had an accurate conception of the church of 1918, when he uttered the parable of the Mustard Seed. Indeed the early church has grown to be the most potent institution on earth.

Some elements of the early church were for it and it only, while others were for us as well as for it. One element which was for it only was community of earthly possessions.

The early Christians might, if they so desired, sell all or part of their possessions and place the price with the treasurer, Peter, who paid all local expense therefrom. This was not obligatory, however, as was proven by the incident of Ananias and Sapphira, who came voluntarily to the disciples and said they had sold all and wished to place it in the common treasury. The results of the falsehood you all know. But this element was never intended to be permanent.

Among the elements of the early church was the quality of permanency and of being possessed of the Holy Spirit. Notice Peter before and after conversion. Before, unstable and fickle, after, he was strong and permanent.

Nothing could change the faith of the early Christians. Even their persecutions were the making of their strength and permanency. As a result of their persecutions came churches in all directions.

If there was any element of the early church that the church of 1918 needs it is that of permanency and possession of the Holy Spirit. When God looks lown upon his church today, me thinks I can hear him say, " One thing my church needs is permanency and stability."

It would be a grand condition, if all persons saved would remain so. Every church has two doors, and needs two ministers, one as evangelist and one as pastor.

The second element of the early church was the acceptance of a set creed. Some poople always throw up thir hands in horror at the phrase a set creed, and will allow their pastors to preach only on points on which they all agree or else the preachers will do this voluntarily. It is because people have no set creed or belief that they can live in one church just as contented as in any other. And those who can do that can live about the same life out of all churches.

The first article of belief of the early church was loyalty to Jesus Christ. It is creed after all that brings churches of like creed together. The man who says he can live in one church as well as any other is sorely in need of being indoctrinated Sweet fellowship was another element of the early church, which was characterized in the Lord's Supper. Those who neglect meeting around his table miss a great portion of this sweet fellowship.

This sipirit of fraternity is brought about by realization of common citizenship and common danger. Common danger, as unbelief and satan himself ought to bind us closer. Pride and division of classes always fall in the presence of common danger.

Our common task of defending the gospel, of evangelism, in training souls in the likeness of Christ should cause sweet fellowship. Also our common hope and faith of eternal life tend to cause sweet fellowship. Men and women who hope to live together in heaven will work earnestly in this common hope.

A fourth element is that of true genuine worship, sincere prayer and praise, not mere formalism. Too much worship of today is illustrated in the story of the two sinners on a raft on a stormy lake, who were in imminent danger. ' Realizing this danger they also realized their need of religious service. So the first suggested that the other preach, pray or sing, but to no avail as neither had been practicing along this line. So, as a last resort the second suggested the other take up a collection. While the last when known as an offering is essential, yet true genuine worship is the element.

The word says: "They broke bread with gladness." Why were they glad? They had caught the vision of the love of God. Again it says: "They continued steadfast in prayer." Our present day church is losing her heritage of prayer and it will only be when she realizes the riceness of this heritage that the church will make the progress that the King's business demands.

Brethren, what the world wants today is not formalism and entertainments, but an expression of the old apostolic church, not expression in words, but living. If we are not out for business, we have no business to be out.

An Open Letter

To the Reader:—

For some time the writer has been solicitous about our workers for the coming years. The demands of the nation for men have called many from the cherished and consecrated determination to prepare for the ministry. Even under normal conditions too few men entered our seminary. Under the stress of the times we must be more energetic than we have hitherto been. I want to call all to a serious and prayerful consideration of this impending crisis in our church life and activities. When the war is over we must be ready to meet the conditions and do the work that will demand attention. Unless we can in a measure meet the emergency with a force of well-trained and efficient workers we will suffer irreparable loss as a church. My appeal is just this:

1. Let every church at once in prayer and work give herself to the serious consideration of calling workers into service.

2. Let the young men who have been planning to enter upon preparation for their life's work, especially that of the gospel ministry, not hesitate to do so. Your life is far longer than the war, we hope. And if preparation should be interrupted you can more easily after the war resume it.

3. Men who are older and not subject to service in a military way must be aroused to the recognition of the impending need. Such men should at once plan to prepare for this work and come to Ashland this Fall. There are many men of this class in the church and they should be brought face to face with the obligation to their Lord and the church.

4. Many young women should seriously consider the work of the church and the many new opportunities for service. This may include even the pastorate. Many a trained young lady may save the pastorless church in the emergency that is facing us in the years just before us. Such should at once come to the Seminary for their training.

Dear reader, please consider this matter. Get it before the people, brother pastor. We just must be awakened or we shall never be able to meet the hour that will strike opportunity for our church.

J. ALLEN MILLER.

A Letter to the Pastors

Ashland College, Ashland, Ohio.

Dear Co-worker:—

The educational institutions of our country and the denominational colleges in particular are facing the most serious crisis in their history. At a time when their service to the nation and the world should be of the highest character their efficiency is imperiled by the withdrawal of teachers and students in ever increasing numbers to the defense of the colors. In consequence of the proposed lowering of the draft age very few of the young men who completed the high school last year will enter college. The future leadership alike of the church and nation is threatened. Thoughtful men everywhere appreciate this situation and a movement is now on foot seeking to encourage young men and women to enter school and remain until called to the service by the country. The United States government has also proposed a plan whereby young men who enter college this September may be placed in class V and remain in school until their course of study is completed. Ashland College is asked to co-operate with the movement and I am writing you for your co-operation.

On June 10 Ashland College closed a good year. Two hundred and five students were enrolled in the different departments. In consequence of the liberality of our friends the year closed with no alarming deficit. But doubtless more serious times are ahead. The Christian College will suffer first and most. A number of Christian Colleges will not open their doors in September as usual. Others are thinking seriously of doing likewise. But Ashland has no intention of closing her doors nor need she if the church will come to her support. I am appealing to you as pastor and leader to come to our support now. August 25th has been proposed by the Association of Denominational Colleges to bring this matter to the attention of the young men and women of the church and will you preach a sermon appropriate to the day and report results to me? If I can be of any service to you in preparing for the day I shall be glad to have you command me.

The leadership of the church and the nation alike must be trained in our Christian Colleges if the world of tomorrow is to be made better than the world of today. Many demands have been made upon the church since the war began, but I make bold to say that no appeal has come to the church or to any one of us so replete with greater possibilities for good to the generation ahead of us than this appeal for the support of our educational institutions. The most strategic point of attack if we would make our world a better world in which to live is where plastic youth with all its high hopes is crystalizing into character, where young men and women under the inspiration of Christian teaching catch the vision of the conquering Christ and the redemption of the world through him. The cause is urgent. The opportunity is imperative. The future of the church and the nation wait upon your action. The future of a redeemed humanity depends upon your fidelity. You are the key man both to the local and to the general church. Will you join with the Christian pastors of the world in placing before your young people the challenge of a college education under Christian influences? Doubtless many of them do not think a college education is within their reach. It is. Encourage them to write me. Any young man or woman however limited their financial resources can today secure a college education. I shall be glad to have some word from you regarding your disposition of this call for service in behalf of your own young people, of the future leadership of the church and nation and in behalf of Ashland College.

Fraternally,

Can I Do Nothing to Be Saved?

BY ALVA J. McCLAIN

"Absolutely and literally nothing. You must take salvation exactly as the thief on the cross did. He could not turn over a new leaf; his last wretched leaf had been turned in reviling his Savior. He could not do any work for God, for there was a nail through each hand; he could not run in the way of God's commandments, for there was a nail through his feet. And until you stand still and realize that there is a nail through all your self-righteous activity, and a nail through all your carnal agility, and accept salvation for nothing, knowing that you are saved simply on the authority of the bare word of God, you will never be saved. We do not look inward to what we feel, nor outward to what we do—but to the Son of Man lifted up, and to God's account of how well he is pleased with the Lord Jesus."—W. P. Mackay, in "Grace and Truth."

"To weigh the evidence and embrace Christianity as the true religion, is the part of a fair and prudent man; but salvation is God's work altogether. The blessing is not for the apt scholar, but for the outcast and lost. It is not for the clear head, but for the contrite heart. Not for the clever reasoner, but for the self-judged and guilty. Not for logicians, but for sinners; not for the wise and prudent, but for babes....."

"Salvation is within the reach of all, but it is as suppliant sinners they must receive it. Grace does not place either the Savior or the gospel down at the bar of human judgment; that is the arrogance of infidelity. Grace is based upon the cross, and assumes that man is guilty and lost. It does not place him in the dock, but it finds him there: it does not brand him as ruined and lost, but it comes to him thus branded already....."

"We are saved through faith, but faith is not our Savior. If faith had intrinsic value and could bring blessing with it, hell would be imposible....." Salvation is the gift of God, given on the principle of grace, and received on the principle of faith. And how does faith come? "Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God."....

"The cross has been set up, not halfway on the road to heaven, where man's unbelieving heart would place it, but right down in the market-square of the City of Destruction, that men look and live. Such are "the exceeding riches of his grace in his kindness toward us through Jesus Christ."

—Sir Robert Anderson, in "The Gospel and Its Miinstry."

Are There Christian Soldiers

BY H. B. LEHMAN

There has been a great deal said and published in our church papers regarding the present great world war, and not any more than there ought to be. Our soldier boys ask questions for their own benefit who have been taken from their homes suddenly and rushed to military camps, who prior to their being drafted had not given the non resistant principle much thought; but since this subject is forced upon them no doubt many a one is at sea about the matter of knowing just what to do in regard to militaryism so as to do the right thing. There is a great difference between a civilian and a military man. Christ's and the apostles' work was all among the civilians and not among the military men. Christ said, "My kingdom is not of this world, if it were, then would my servants fight." You see, his kingdom was not established by the literal sword. For that reason his disciples were ordered to "put up the sword."

All other kingdoms, such as the nations of the world are established by the literal sword and it seems they are maintained by it, our nation not excepted.

Now, what was John the Baptist's attitude toward the soldiers, the military men? The soldiers demanded of him what they should do. You see the answer that he gave to the common people and the Publicans did not meet their condition; therefore they asked him in regard to their condition. John replied, "Do violence to no man, neither accuse any falsely; and be content with your wages." Did he tell them to leave their occupation? No, he does not command them to lay down their arms. Do violence to no man, that to civilians; do not put people into fear by the sword of war. Shed not the blood of war in peace nor have any in the barbarous devastation that armies make. They must not accuse any falsely to the government., and be content with your wages.

Now, what was Jesus' attitude toward the military men in Luke 7:2? A centurian's servant who was dear unto him was sick and ready to die, etc. This centurian was a Roman soldier and a Gentile. He had heard of the fame of Jesus and had faith in Jesus. Although he was a soldier he sent some of the elders of Israel to Jesus entreating him to come and heal his servant. Jesus said I will go and he did go and when he came in sight of the captain's house the captain sent other messengers out to meet Jesus and to tell him that he should not come to the house for he was not worthy to receive Jesus under his roof, but speak the word only and my servant shall live. Now this was a military man, a soldier. Did his position as a captain of an army debar him from having faith in Jesus? No, Jesus turned to the crowd and said that he had not found so great faith in Israel. Do you see how the kingdom of God entered the captain's heart through faith prior to this occurrence? This occurrence was an outgrowth of his faith that he had received prior to this event.

And now I come to the greatest question to me in all the New Testament. Why did Jesus choose a Roman soldier, a captain in the Roman army to be the first one of the Gentiles to be led officially into the kingdom of God? My puzzle is right here, as we have been taught non-combatant principles. Would any of us go into our armies today to find a typical or a clean religious man, a Christian? But what about this Cornelius? I have the 20th century New Testament before me from which I write. There was then in Cesarea a man named Cornelius, a captain in the regiment known as the Italian, a religious man and one who reverenced God with all his household. He was liberal in his charities to the people and prayed to God constantly. One afternoon about three o'clock he distinctly saw in a vision an angel from God come to him and called him by name. Cornelius fixed his eyes on him and in great alarm said, "What is it, Lord?" Your prayers and your charities, the angel answered have been an acceptable offering to God and now sent messengers to Jaffa and fetch a man called Simon who is also known as Peter. He is lodging with a tanner named Simon who has a house near the sea. When the angel who had spoken to him had gone, Cornelius called two men servants and a religious soldier who was one of his constant attendants, etc. Acts 10:1-8.. There we have a religious captain and a religious soldier in a Roman army which were an abomination to Jewish worship. There is no intimation given in scripture that these soldiers left their occupation. They were the first Gentile converts baptized into the kingdom of God and if the kingdom of God opened its doors for the Roman soldier, is it closed for the soldier of today?

Six Cents

BY J. S. C. SPICKERMAN

I read in the Evangelist that the churches are expected to contribute six cents per member for the superannuated ministers. Isn't that rather extravagant? Six cents! and picture show tickets and other necessities are higher than ever before; and some of us haven't got our new automobiles yet. Church membership is becoming an expensive luxury, what with local church expenses and home missions, and foreign missions, and Kentucky missions, and Ashland College; and now, on top of all that we must dig up six cents apiece for the old ministers. My, won't some of them live high when they get their share of that fifteen hundred dollars!

Who are these men for whom we are expected to sacrifice six cents apiece? They are the men who were preaching the gospel while the rest of us were making money. Some preached at their own charges, making a living at secular labor, and taking time to prepare good sermons and do pastoral work and build up the churches. Some gave their time to the churches at a section hand's wages (or less). Now, after they have thrown away their chances of laying up money, we are called on to divide with them to the tune of six cents each per year.

Joking aside—as the book agent said to the man who had kicked him down stairs—isn't it about time we got our church business off a picayune basis?

The war is teaching us to think in terms of millions and billions instead of nickels and dimes. Why should not the Lord's cause share the benefit of our enlarged vision? It is due to the self-denying work of these ministers that we have a church in which we can observe the ordinances of the New Testament without being subject to the traditions of men. The Four-Year Program committee must have been sadly lacking in nerve to ask only fifteen hundred dollars, but that need not be the limit. Why not go over the top, and raise enough to enable these veterans of the Cross to pass their last days in comfort? Some of them could be living in luxury if they had used for their temporal gain the time, talents and energies which they spent in building a whole gospel church. If they have sown unto us spiritual things, is it a great thing if they shall reap our carnal things? I Corinthians 9: 11. Esteem them exceeding highly in love for their work's sake. I Thessalonians 5: 13. How highly? Six cents' worth?

Around the Fireside

Father's Raise

Mr. Bacon brought the news out at the dinner table with a flourish of trumpets, as it were.

"I'm to have a raise!" he said.

Four pairs of eyes looked at him with an interest seldom accorded to the little father.

"A raise!" echoed one and all.

Father beamed around with the pride of a showman.

Mother broke the delightful silence with a doubting question. Mother had heard of raises before.

"Are you sure?" she inquired.

Father threw out his chest, and assumed some of the swagger of Roland.

"Surest thing you ever saw," he answered, even breaking into Roland's speech.

"Well, that's good news," said the mother with a sigh of relief. "Goodness knows we need it."

"Good for you, dad," chimed in Roland. "This family has been in the market for a raise for the longest kind of a time."

"I'm glad it came in vacation," Eleanor observed.

All had had their say except Lucy. That was quite often the case, however, and no one noticed—no one except father.

"What has my girl got to say about it?" he asked, turning his dark eyes to meet another pair very like them.

Lucy smiled. And when she smiled one saw that the resemblance to her father did not end with the eyes.

"I'm so glad!" she said. "Will it be easier on you?"

Father answered before stopping to think.

"Harder, rather," he said. "But nothing that I can't do, and that is the main thing."

Lucy's face clouded.

"That takes all the good out of the raise," doesn't it?" she asked, looking around the table.

"Pretty hard to take the good out of a raise, my sentimental cherub," observed Roland.

"Yes," smiled the father, "it's pretty hard to take the good out of as good a thing as that. I won't have to work to kill myself, anyway. And the little bit harder that the work will be will more than be made up in how much easier other things will be. That's the way to look at it, Lucy."

Lucy answered his smile with one as bright.

"Yes," she said, "You won't have to worry so. . And that is something."

"What will the difference in the pay envelope be, dad?" asked Roland, the practical.

"Seventy-five—a big seventy-five," father announced proudly.

"That will be two hundred and twenty-five a month," Mrs. Bacon reflected aloud. "We must move to a better neighborhood right away."

"That's why I was glad it came in vacation," Eleanor said. "We all can help with the choosing, and everything. It will be lots of fun."

Father's bright face fell. Suddenly he looked the full number of his years.

"We're very comfortable here, it seems to me. What do you want to move for?"

"This place," observed Mrs. Bacon, in her very best society manner, "is unbearable—to me, at least. I have merely tolerated it while I had to."

"But what's the matter with it?"

Father tried to speak with his usual patience.

"Too far out, dad, for one thing," explained Roland.

"But that makes it so that we can have our garden. I thoughtt all of you liked that."

"There are gardens in better neighborhoods. And I suppose we could still have one, if you liked."

"It isn't for myself," protested fahter. "I don't get much time to work in it, or even to see it. Of course, I like flowers. I thought all of us did."

"You can buy them cheaper than you can raise them," Mrs. Bacon went on. "Besides, being far out isn't the only objection to the place."

"I should think not," Eleanor broke in. "There are more things against this place than for it. Every single thing about it is old-fashioned. And it's dreadfully inconvenient every way."

"We've managed so far very well," persisted father. "And I don't see why we can't go on just as we are."

"Well, we can't," said mother, with a snap in her even voice.

Father drummed on the table-cloth with his fingers.

"I thought—I hoped," he began, as one thinking aloud, "that the raise meant a measure of ease and of peace. If we eat it up with more rent, what good is it?"

"Lots of good," exclaimed mother and Eleanor together. "We can live a little as we go along. It will be good for the children."

That argument usually clinched matters with father. But now he looked mildly obstinate.

"It's better for them here," he argued, "than it will be in a place where they'll expect to be up all hours of the night. This is a nice home, even if it it's far out. I had thought we might be able to arrange to buy it someway when I got my raise. Once we own our own home, our troubles will be over."

"Buy it!" cried mother, scornfully. "The idea! Who would want to buy a home in a place like this? It's bad enough to live here, without signing up to stay forever."

"At the same time, I'm inclined to think we'll do very well here, for a time at least."

Even Mrs. Bacon looked surprised that father did not capitulate. And the others were wide-eyed. Roland smiled discreetly behind his hand.

"Never knew him to stand up before mother before," he thought, half proudly.

The mother caught the hidden smile. Otherwise she would have been content to let the subject drop. But it nerved her to blunder on.

"We'll move as soon as you get the raise," she said. "When is it to be?"

"We'll do nothing of the kind," father answered, with a firmness he had never shown. "We'll stay right here, and try to get a little ahead. I'm tired of living up to every cent."

"We'll move," mother averred calmly, a little red spot mounting to either cheek.

"We'll do nothing of the kind," father answered, pushing back his chair and getting up.

"We will!"

The words echoed after him as he left the room.

Evrybody looked uncomfortable. Lucy did not raise her eyes. Roland and Eleanor looked grave. The mother's eyes were not far from tears.

"I wish there never had been, never would be, a raise, Lucy thought.

The uncomfortable night was but the beginning of other uncomfortable nights and days. Never before had there been dissension in the family. No one could settle to anything. There was no gathering around the big table in the living room at night. Home had turned, all of a sudden, into an uncomfortable place, from which all were glad to absent themselves as much as possible.

"That wretched raise!" Mrs. Bacon often thought to herself. "We were happy enough before it was proposed."

Worst of all, father sulked. At least, if not sulking, it was something very like it. He did not speak unless it was absolutely necessary. He looked bent and old. Often as they watched him their hearts went sick with fear.

"If father got sick! Worrying makes people ill sometimes," their frightened eyes said to one another.

The month drew to a close. But no one looked forward to the time when the larger pay envelope would be forthcoming. No one thought of it without a shrinking distaste.

"It brought us nothing but trouble," each thought.

But nobody thought of saying that aloud. Even Lucy did not try to right matters, but just looked wistfully on at the muddle things were in.

Mrs. Bacon tried a peace-offering with father's favorite dishes. But he did not appear to relish them much.

"A dinner of herbs," Lucy quoted softly to herself, as she watched him push away the scarcely tasted food.

At last the first came—the first, which was to bring the official notice of father's raise. Every one thought of that while they waited for father. He was late. Lucy ran ot the gate again and again. At last she came running back.

"Father's coming!" she cried. "And he looks just like himself."

Roland looked out.

He's piking along at a great rate," he said. "And he has his hat swinging in his hand. He really looks young again."

Every one ran to the window to see father looking young again. He smiled up at the little group, and waved his hand. All waved gayly back, and then ran to throw the door wide.

Father came in.

"Hello, everybody!" he cried cheerfully, bending to kiss mother.

He said no more till they were gathered around the dinner table.

"About that raise—" he began.

"Oh, Amos, don't!" cried the mother.

"This is good news," he smiled at her. "I'm not to get the raise—"

"Good!" they interrupted him. "The miserable thing!"

"For two months," continued father. "Lawrence has decided to stay so much longer. But Stebbins has promised it to me then. And, I'll tell you, we'll make things hum with that extra seventy-five," he promised, with a glance at mother.

"We'll—make them—hum—right here," mother promised back.—Christian Endeavor World.

REVIEW OF

The Thought and Work of the Church

Once again the HONOR ROLL of churches that have placed the Evangelist into every active home of the congregation is brought to the view of our readers and one of the good things about it is there are two churches to be added to the roll this week. These churches have done nobly in this work, and if still others will do as well it will not be a very long time until the Evangelist will have a subscription list and will pay weekly visits to enough Brethren homes to make it a means of Brethern propaganda that is worth while.

The churches that receive the honors this week are New Paris, Indiana, and Fremont, Ohio. This is the second church composing the circuit of Brother Ora Oxley that has won this distinction which marks a worthy achievement for him and also for the New Paris Brethren Sunday school which, under the leadership of its superintendent, John Smoker, paid the bill. And it is a great achievement for the Brethren mission at Fremont, Ohio and for Brother Oberholtzer to whom the mails seemed too slow to convey the news and he called to his assistance the lightning and sent us the news by wire, but the large list of subscribers came on the next mail and will receive this week's paper. What a rejoicing there would be if two more churches could be found to win this honor before we make our report to the Conference on next Wednesday evening!

An error common to the printing business slipped into the report of the funds received for benevolences by Ohio's secretary, E. G. Mason, as reported in the Evangelist of August seventh. Canton, Ohio should have been credited with $27.44 instead of $2.00. We are glad to make this correction for no more loyal church exists in the brotherhood than the Canton church and there is no pastor more anxious to have his church contribute to every Brethren interest than Brother Belote.

One look at the College thermometer will reveal the happy fact that the mercury is half way to the top, and when Brother Beachler gets back into old Pennslyvania again in September there is no telling where it will stop. We are already convinced that before Brother Beachler gets through with his campaign we will have to add a second story to the thermometer or else substitute a Ford speedometer in its place. But let it go Brother Beachler, we will find some way to register the results of the canvass no matter to what lengths or heights it may go.

The Compton Brethren church of Los Angeles has recently gone through a blessed season of refreshing with N. W. Jennings helping the Pastor, J. C. Beal in his labors. The real metal of which the Compton Avenue church was tried out in this meeting and they came out more than conquerors. Twenty-four persons either re-consecrated themselves to the work of the Lord or made the geat confession for the first time during this meeting. All but three of those making the confession have been baptized and received into the church. Several others had been recived into the church recently but before the special meetings were held.

The announcement concerning the hotel rates and accommodations at Winona Lake during the period of the General Conference as made by Brother Garber reached us too late to receive mention on this page. So we take this opportunity to call the attention of prospective visitors and delegates to the notice which appeared on page sixteen of last week's Evangelist. The rate is a remarkably reasonable one for these days and should be the means of persuading some who have hesitated to decide now that they will be in attendance.

Dr. J. Allen Miller recently reported the happy occasion of the dedication of the new church at Krypton, Kentucky and this week the pastor, Brother Cook reports another most blessed occasion, that of the revival services conducted by Evangelist Thomas. During the two weeks of this meeting seventeen made the good confession for the first time and more than forty reconsecrated their lives to the service of the Master.

Again our readers are favored with items of interest concerning the work of Sister Detwiler. She tells of the splendid prospect for a Brethren work in Baltimore, Maryland, and also tells how some pastors are able to be of assistance in work of that character because they have kept trace of the members of their church who have gone into the large cities and have kept in touch with them and have thus prevented loss to the Brethren cause. However Miss Detwiler hopes to return to Spokane and the great North West to continue her work in this land of opportunity immediately after the General Conference.

There is to be no let up on the drive to go "over the top" for Washington, D. C. mission and to raise the amount of money necessary to relieve the property from the burden of the mortgage that has been hanging over it so long. The Berthren might as well realize now as at any time that when Brother Carpenter undertakes a task like that they will have to "come across," if not before Conference meets, pretty soon after it is over, so they might as well DO IT NOW and have it over with and help to speed up the day of rejoicing.

The Editor enjoyed the opportunity of visiting the Rittman, Ohio mission on last Sunday and of preaching for these faithful Brethren both morning and evening. It was our first trip to this point, and as it was an easy trip to make because of convenient train service we improved the opportunity. We are always glad to visit any of our churches whenever we can do so without interfering with our work in the office.

The Brotherhood will be grieved to learn that on account of the health of Sister Cook, Brother Cook will be compelled to give up the splendid work he has been doing at Krypton, Kentucky. We know the Brotherhood will join in the prayer that Sister Cook may be restored to health and that a worthy successor may be found to take up the work Brother Cook feels he must lay down.

Dr. Gillin calls attention to some vital principles that underlie the whole Four-Year Program of the Brethren church. If due recognition is given these principles when the goals are reached then the effort will have been worth while. If the achievement of the goals is to be the end then it is not worth while to make the effort to attain them.

Brother H. B. Lehman in his short contribution asks some pertinent questions and shows that he is having some real difficulty in reaching a sane conclusion in regard to the matter; but Brother Lehman is not alone in this matter as there are a great many others who have the same difficulty in answering these questions satisfactory to themselves.

This is the LAST APPEAL we can make to the churches to send as many delegates to the Conference as they possibly can. This will be one of the most important conferences the church has held in years. There should be a large attendance even though car fares have been advanced.

Around the Editor's Table

Do You Know:—

That the National Government urges all churches to be as efficient as possible?

That no church can meet the requirements of the day that does not wisely plan a program of procedure?

That all the great denominations have held larger and more enthusiastic National Conferences and Assemblies than in other years?

That it will be a really patriotic service to attend General Conference next week and help plan the work of the BRETHREN CHURCH to meet the emergencies of the day?

That the BRETHREN CHURCH can not fully meet her obligations and responsibilities by "lying down on the job" under the guise of patriotism?

That LOYAL BRETHREN will be at Conference at Winona next week?

Religion and State

We would not have a state religion, but we would like very much to see a religious state. The evils attendant upon a union of state and religion were fully manifested before the day of Martin Luther and even at the present time, after all the centuries have passed since the Reformation there are still a few states or nations that are tied up with religion in a manner that is neither good for the state nor its religion.

The church of Jesus Christ is not a political organization nor are the things with which it has to do primarily political, but when the principles of Christianity are in real operation in the hearts and lives of men they effect in a salutary manner all the political movements of the state.

Political movements can not work out the salvation of man any more than purely social movements can, but they can make life a great deal more tolerable for those who are seeking to "work out" their salvation according to the plans of the Father. And the religious life of a people and the theology of the leaders of a nation have a great deal to do with the character of the political institutions of the nation.

For many years artists, musicians, physicians and preachers have thought if they could bear the stamp, "finished in Germany," they were in as high class in the professions of the world as would be a piece of fine cutlery bearing the brand once famous but now infamous, "made in Germany." But it is being pointed out by a great many leaders of the thought of the world that this very "finishing" in Germany, especially of the theologians, is very largely, if not altogether responsible for the great conflict in which the world is now engaged.

The very principles and the very facts of the gospel of Jesus Christ which have been used of missionaries under the power of God to raise up heathen and savage people from a state of barbarism are the facts and principles that German made theology and philosophy have denied and as a result Germany has gone back into barbarism while many barbaric people have come into the blessings of a pure and unadulterated gospel. The deity of Jesus Christ, his vicarious atonement and his victorious resurrection and a number of other of the vital principles of the gospel that Germany has sought to destroy, have come into disrepute among certain theologians of the Protestant nations, and seemingly in dircet proportion to which these views are held the spiritual and religious lives of the people have weakened. The fine moral and spiritual character founded upon the old fashioned teachings of the gospel has been largely wiped out, but the pendulum seems now to be swinging the other way, and after the war is over we do not believe the American people will listen to the teachings of philosophers and theologians and preachers who bear the mark, "finished in Germany," any more than a patriotic school boy of the present would make a display of a pocket knife bearing the "made in Germany," brand.

The Age of Goals

That this is an age of goals is not to be denied; that all the goals now before the people of the world are worthy is open to question. The goal of Germany WAS Paris, we don't know what it is now; and the goal of the American troops in France is Berlin, and we can't help wishing they may reach their goal before Christmas. But nations and armies are not the only organizations that have set goals for which they are striving. Business organizations, churches and educational institutions also have their goals, and many of them are most worthy ones. While some of these goals may never be attained, or even though many of them are beyond the possibility of attainment, it is yet a method of "hitching one's wagon to a star," and the effort will be worth while.

It is not our purpose to discuss the specific goals set for attainment by the Brethren church in its great Four-Year Program, but to speak briefly of one thing that is receiving more and more attention in the Brethren church as it is in many other churches, and that is the matter of religious education. It used to be thought that about the only class of people that needed special training in religion was that class devoted to the ministry or to missionary work or to other definite Christian service, and to them the rest of the world looked for religious instruction. It has now come to be recognized that the preacher can not have the opportunity in these modern days to impart the religious instruction the world really needs through his pulpit work alone. It is coming to be believed that every child, every man and woman should be taught the principles of religion and especially the Christian religion in a systematic manner. The need of religious instruction is apparent, just how to meet the need is one of the present day problems. We would not lower the standards set for the education of the head as adopted by our schools, but we would raise the standard set for the education of the heart. The goal of all systems of religious education should be something more than a mental grasp of the facts about religion, it should be a grasp of the heart as well as the head which will lead to a conviction of sin and to an application of "the blood of Jesus Christ, his Son which cleanseth from all sin." A religious education which stops short of this goal is after all of no material or spiritual value to the human soul.

Full of the Spirit

When the early church found its organization inadequate to meet the needs of the times and some of its members came to the apostles with their problems they were told to choose from their number "seven men, full of the Spirit and of wisdom," to attend to the matters of business that were worrying the church.

The "truth that is golden" of a recent Sunday school lesson was briefly stated by a writer in these words: "We cannot be practical Christians unless we are Spirit-filled." This statement, if true, upsets all the theories of some men who have sought to excuse the shortcomings of certain religious workers by saying they were "so spiritual minded that they gave no thought to matters of business and the world." In fact, on one occasion a prominent church worker stated to the writer that he did not believe a spiritual minded man could be a good business man." This was said in defense of a minister who left debts for other men to pay wherever he ever held a pastorate, but who claimed to be all wrapped up in spiritual things.

Such claims can be nothing less than disgusting to any one who has high ideals of the Christian life and of the power of the gospel to make a man honest and sensible even when he is most devoted to the cause of Christ. Every Christian ought to be practical; and every Christian ought to be spirit-filled, and a man who is really spirit-filled will become one of the most practical men imaginable. One can not think of the Spirit of God leading men into unpractical methods of living or of doing business, and there is no business in all the world that should be conducted along more practical lines than the "King's Business."

The Most Important Organization on Earth

We suppose the Kaiser used to think the most important organization in the world was the army of Germany, and all the world will have to admit that it was the most effective fighting machine the world had at that time seen. We also take it for granted that there are those in America who believe that when Uncle Sam's army once is thoroughly organized and equipped it will be the greatest organization in the world, and it will be an organization that should cause any nation to think twice before it decides to attempt any injustice to the American people; but while these may be the greatest military organizations in the world they lack a great deal of being the most IMPORTANT organizations. The real value of some things is not always realized at the time they are rendering the greatest service and in many ways this has been true of the greatest and most important organization the world has ever known, namely the church.

Just now the church is being overshadowed somewhat by the Red Cross and by the Y. M. C. A., but it should be remembered that without the Christian church there would never have been a Y. M. C. A. or a Red Cross organization. These are but the fruits of the church. And can the fruit of a tree be greater than the tree that bears it? We are willing to give all praise and all credit that is due both these organizations, but it should never be forgotten that they are but special agents, appointed and organized to carry out the principles that are underlying the work of the church and for which the church has stood through all the centuries. We will admit that the specific work of these organizations is being conducted along lines that the church simply as a church could not conduct it, but after all the motive that is back of it all and the power that makes it possible is that secured through the teaching and the influence of the most important organization of all, the church. Nothing is gained for either by belittling the influence or power of the other.

Items Gleaned from The Missionary Review of the World

The Political Future of India

It is difficult to define the political situation in India or to exaggerate its critical character. The British government has declared that the policy to be pursued is to prepare India to govern itself and an installment of self-government is to be expected at the close of the war. The Secretary of State for India has recently visited that country with a view to learning the wishes of the different sections of the people and his report will have a far reaching effect on the future of that land. The National Missionary Council has decided to issue an open letter to missionaries, calling upon them to consider afresh the great ideals for which, in the providence of God, governments exist; and to let those principles dominate and control their own thinking in these times of controversy and, when occasion requires, to make these principles clear to others. The Council declares that it is as much an ideal of good government to provide for every one of its subjects the opportunity for the development of his personality as it is to provide for the whole body politic the blessings of order, peace and justice. The missionary body is called upon to commit the issues of the present time to God in the full confidence of faith and hope, knowing that he who called them to be fellow workers with him is working in them and others toward the fulfilling of his eternal purposes of good.

The present situation is made more difficult by the fact that not less than one hundred of the missionaries in India have left their stations to engage in active war service, some as combatants, some as chaplains, and others as doctors and nurses. A number of medical men and nurses have also offered themselves to the government for local service, thus setting free others to go to the front. The missionaries realize the significance of the war and are loyally helping the government and have rejoiced to take their humble part in advancing the cause of human freedom.

The future of German missions in India is a most difficult and delicate matter. When present arrangements were made, it was hoped that the war would have been at an end before this, but conditions have so greatly altered that many have grave doubt whether Germans will for many years be permitted to work in India. The great work that German missionaries have accomplished must be conserved and extended. It is, therefore, necessary that steps be agreed upon as to the course to be adopted as soon as the terms of peace are made known. The National Missionary Council is uannimously of opinion that those in temporary charge of German missions should discuss the matter with Indian pastors- and see if some working agreement can be reached.

Foreign Missions In Great Britain

In Germany, foreign missions have died from lack of nutrition during the war. Some believe that after the war Germany herself must be evangelized. French Protestant missions have become weak and almost lifeless because of the drafting of men and money for the great European struggle. In America, while some societies have suffered there has been a general increase in giving; the Baptists have launched a million dollar campaign and the Methodists have adopted an $80,000,000 centenary program.

Great Britain, with its great missionary enterprises, has been called upon to make immense sacrifices. Men and money have been poured out like water to redeem Belgium and establish a worthy peace. The missionary societies have naturally faced many difficulties and some have large deficits. Nevertheless the outlook is wonderfully hopeful. There is no drawing back but rather a forward program. Many of the German stations are now cared for by British missionaries and some new fields are twenty-one Protestant societies having their to be occupied as soon as possible. Of the headquarters in London about one-third report a decrease in incomes——the C. M. S $100,000, the Baptists $35,000 and the Friends $6,000. Others, however, show an increase in receipts. The Wesleyans report an advance of 5 per cent.; the Bible Society has had the largest income in its history; the Tract Society, Presbyterians, and Mission to Lepers have received substantial increases and the China Inland Mission, with $35,000 more than last year, has had one of the best financial years in its history.

The reports from many British mission fields are also encouraging. In spite of unrest in China, the China Inland Mission alone reports 4,629 baptisms during the year—the second largest in its history; the London Missionary Society reports increased self-support among its churches in the South Seas; the South American Missionary Society has found many new open doors in Latin-America; the C. M. S. reports Christward movements among Moslems in India and many societies are planning for new advances after the war.

The British Mission Secretaries report that they have every reason to thank God and take courage. With the nation putting every available man into the battle line, spending thirty million dollars a day for the war, and facing large advances in the cost of food and clothing, Christian people are still maintaining the work of God for the unreached millions abroad.

Social Reform In Porto Rico

The Committee on Social Reform of the Evangelical Union of Porto Rico has issued a most interesting report. The triumph of prohibition in Porto Rico, which took place a year ago, was celebrated this year on March 2nd by means of parades, meetings and addresses in evangelical churches and Sunday schools.

The "traffic of women" is recognized as an outstanding evil in Porto Rico, and innumerable unhappy girls, almost childern, daily fall victims to this evil. Misery, lack of education, bad treatment in the home and above all the wickedness of men, cause the alarming increase rather than the decrease of this evil.

Municipal authorities are asked to pass laws to prohibit the establishment of houses of ill fame and the exhibition of unfortunate women in parks and plazas and other public centers. The Legislative Assembly is asked to pass a law like the one now in force in California, punishing the owners of houses of ill fame. Christian pastors are also urged to instruct their young people concerning the dangers and awful consequences of immorality.

Gambling is aonther evil dealt with in the report. The plan to combat it is through the Sunday schools, through literature and personal work among young people. An educational campaign for social reform is also to be conducted by means of lanterns and moving pictures. Slides of educational value are to be provided by the churches and young people's societies.

The committee further recommends that churches give particular attention to Porto Rican soldiers going into the war, enrolling them in an honor roll conspicuously placed in the church and helping to look after their moral and social life in the camps.

The Evangelical Union also proposes to establish a new union theological seminary for Porto Rico, in which it is expected that eight churches will cooperate. These are some of the effects of the transfer of Porto Rico from Spanish to American control and from Roman Catholic to Protestant influence and ideals.

A Presbyterian Program of Progress

A "New Era Expansion Program" was launched by the Northern Presbyterian General Assembly in Columbus, Ohio, in May. The details were not decided upon but a large representative committee was was appointed and expect to formulate a comprehensive plan to include emphasis on evangelism, religion in the family, Christian education, missions, social service and stewardship. Among the features suggested for this program are a million new members in five years, a seventy-five million budget for advance work, the enlistment of returning soldiers and Y. M. C. A. workers in Christian service and the adoption of a higher ideal of stewardship.

The Presbyterian Assemblies, north and south, and the United Presbyterians also took further steps toward union, though no definite decision was reached. In the northern assembly the committee on "Church Co-operation and Union" was continued and resolved to overture other evangelical churches of America to join in a conference looking toward the organic union of Protestant forces. The Assembly furthermore declared their "profound conviction that the time has come for organic church union of the Evangelical churches of America."

The General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of the U. S. (South) meeting at Durant, Oklahoma, voted to continue the Committee on Union and Federation. While the Assembly was opposed to organic union at this time they approved the idea of Federal union of all Presbyterian and Reformed churches of the United States.

The United Presbyterian church, at their General Assembly in Pittsburgh, was sympathetic toward church union and will no doubt join in the conference which is to be held sometime this year. Unity is more important than union and co-operation than combination, but it is time for Christians to get together.

Sharing the Seaside

Benny Bark and Patty Purr were great friends. And everyone thought it very surprising. But it was not, for they had grown up from puppyhood and kittenhood together. Besudes being friends with each other, Benny Bark and Patty Purr were friends with Daisy and Dan. And nobody thought that at all surprising, for Diasy and Dan were good children.

It had been raining that morning. Now the sun was out again, but the rain still lay along the road in little pools, which were trying to catch a bit of white cloud. They were already full of blue sky.

Daisy and Dan left their shoes and stockings indoors and went out to play seaside. They brought their pails and shovels. And because they had always shared everything even the seaside, they brought Benny Bark and Patty Purr.

You have no idea what fine places to play those puddles made. Daisy and Dan paddled up and down. They filled their pails with pebbles and gathered flowers for shells. And when your feet are wet all over, even oceans can wet them no more.

Benny Bark considered the sport to be great fun. He dashed ahead into the pools and made the biggest splash of anyone. He got the wettest of anyone, too, because he did not have to stop at the knees, and he had twice as many legs as Daisy or Dan.

But Patty Purr did not care to be splashed. She stepped along the road in the driest spots she could find. She backed away from the pools as if they were planning to drown her. And when Benny Bark shook a few drops over her for fun, how she did jump.

Daisy and Dan looked up when they saw Patty Purr jump, and they knew at once that she was not happy.

"She's so little," said Daisy, "that it makes the pools seem big."

"She's afraid to go wading alone," added Dan.

So Daisy and Dan tried to coax Patty Purr into the water. They told her how pleasant and wet it was. They promised not to let her drown. But Patty Purr preferred to stay where it was dry.

"Look at Benny Bark," they said to her. "He knows what fun it is to go in wading."

"Bow, wow, wow," cried Benny Bark joyfully, by which he meant, "Yes, indeed, it's the best fun in the world. Try it!"

"Maiow!" replied Patty Purr. "Maiow!" and that meant, "Wade if you like, but please let me alone."

"You're a bad kitten," said Dan severely.

"Not to want to be clean," added Daisy.

That was hardly fair, for Patty Purr scrubbed herself much better with her little pink tongue than all the rain puddles could have bathed her. Benny Bark had to be scrubbed now and then, but Patty Purr was all the time tidying up.

"She'll like it, once she's in," said Daisy and Dan.

So Daisy tried to push Patty Purr into the pool. But Patty Purr humped her back and drew away. Then Dan picked her up and dropped her splash! into the water. But she did not stay there. She sprang out, and alighting first on Dan and then on Daisy, and giving each of them a smart scratch in passing, she landed, wet and cross, in the road. Benny Bark was there looking on; so she drew her claws across his nose, and then went flying toward home; and her manner said as plainly as words, "No more seaside for me!"

Daisy and Dan and Benny Bark looked after her; then they looked at one another and rubbed their scratches.

"I don't believe she liked it after all," said Daisy and Dan.

"Bow, wow, wow!" Said Benny Bark. And his tone meant as plainly as words, "I'm sure she didn't."

So Daisy and Dan and Benny Bark finished their play at the seaside and went back home. They were wet and they were muddy, but they were happy.

And there on the porch sat Patty Purr, washing the last drop of muddy water from her beautiful, soft coat. She rose to meet them, purring, for, now that she was clean and dry again, she was happy.

"The next time we play seaside," said Dan, "Benny Bark may come into the sea with us, because he likes it."

"Yes," said Daisy, "but because Patty Purr does not like it, she may stay at the side.

So they share the seaside, and all are happy. There is always happiness in sharing things.—Youth's Companion.

A Dog That Won the Victoria Cross

One of the most famous regimental pets that ever lived was "Jack," who was found when a poor little puppy by a sentry outside St. James' Palace. Snow was on the ground at the time, and the dog had evidently been ill-treated, so the kind-hearted sentry picked it up and fed it.

The dog eventually became very much attached to the sentry, whose regiment, the Scots Guards, adopted the animal as a pet.
